This valuable reference book not only presents 500 additional concise synopses and essay-reviews with critiques of important works from many ages, but also features an over-all index for all four series, thus making the whole set much easier to use. The works covered here range from Xenophon and Lucian to John Updike and William Golding. American, English, European, and other fiction and drama are well represented, and there is stress on poetry and nonfiction so that all categories are now admirably and more or less equally represented in the four volumes. Virtually every piece of literature studied in high-school and college literature courses is treated in the four books. Two thousand ten works by 973 known and 28 anonymous authors are included.

As always, Frank N. Magill as general editor has had the valuable assistance of top-flight professors in colleges and universities throughout the country. All entries have been checked and rechecked for accuracy, clarity,

PREFACE

WHEN the Third Series of MASTERPLOTS appeared in 1960, the editors and staff believed that the series was complete. 1,510 outstanding books from world literature had been summarized or reviewed including, in addition to novels and plays, works in the fields of poetry, philosophy, history, and biography. However, the poetry and nonfiction essays of the Third Series, a new development in the project, were accorded such wide acceptance that an enlargement of these categories seemed called for. Thus we tentatively began a Fourth Series, to be devoted largely to poetry and nonfiction.

The deeper we delved into the possibilities, the more we began to realize that it would be no problem at all to find five hundred additional representative works to include in Series Four. Indeed, the abundance of fine literature we had not previously covered was really surprising. Not yet included were Andrić and Barth, Bellow and Cheever, Hawkes, Morris, and Updike. What about Durrell's ALEXANDRIA QUARTET, Golding's LORD OF THE FLIES, and Powell's A DANCE TO THE MUSIC OF TIME? And those British authors C. P. Snow, J. R. R. Tolkien, and T. R. White, not to mention Ivy Compton-Burnett, Iris Murdoch, and Muriel Spark? What about PALE FIRE, DR. ZHIVAGO, or young Günter Grass? And speaking of fiction, we had not covered the short stories of Hemingway, Lawrence, Forster, Eudora Welty, Flannery O'Connor, and numerous others.

This series, however, was to be devoted mainly to poetry and nonfiction so we had to move along, though we did find room for some drama, including WHO'S AFRAID OF VIRGINIA WOOLF?, LOOK BACK IN ANGER, and THE CARETAKER.

Poetry accounts for about one-third of all the material in this new series, with articles on the works of Aiken and Cummings, Dryden and Jonson; Roethke, Stevens, and Williams; Moore, Wylie, Wordsworth, and Lowell—Robert as well as James Russell—and even the seventeenth century Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Altogether there are 115 articles on "The Poetry of . . ." in addition to studies on the lyric poetry of Byron, Milton, Spenser, and articles on specific works such as IL FILOSTRATO, MEN AND WOMEN, ESSAY ON MAN, PERSONAE, THE BRONZE HORSEMAN, CHICAGO POEMS, THE PRINCESS, LE LAIS, ECLOGUES, and THE LAY OF IGOR'S CAMPAIGN, to mention only a few.

PREFACE

The nonfiction range is also broad. There are discussions of the essays of Beerbohm, Chesterton, Hazlitt, Huxley, and Pound, and the letters of Emily Dickinson, Scott Fitzgerald, Madame de Sévigné, Frost, Wolfe, and Pliny, among others. Interesting journals by Boswell, Thoreau, Dostoevski, Gide, Dorothy Wordsworth, the Goncourts, and Lewis and Clark are also included. Adding breadth are discussions of individual works such as Van Wyck Brooks' AMERICA'S COMING-OF-AGE, Johan Huizinga's THE WANING OF THE MIDDLE AGES, Alexis de Tocqueville's DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA, John Ruskin's THE STONES OF VENICE, George Trevelyan's ENGLAND UNDER THE STUARTS, and THE RISE OF AMERICAN CIVILIZATION by the Beards. Works of special literary interest include Berdyaev's DOSTOEVSKY, Dryden's AN ESSAY ON DRAMATIC POESY, Eliot's DANTE, Goethe's POETRY AND TRUTH FROM MY OWN LIFE, Hawthorne's two Notebooks, Johnson's PREFACE TO SHAKESPEARE and his LIVES OF THE POETS, and Richards' PRINCIPLES OF LITERARY CRITICISM.

One aspect of a literary survey often overlooked is the ever-expanding nature of the body of literature. The creative process is a continuum without seasons, and any year produces many worth-while volumes that eventually take their place alongside the standards from earlier times. Much of the work in the Fourth Series was not even in being when the First Series appeared in 1949. This concept had much to do with our inaugurating an Annual Volume starting in 1954, in which we began an attempt to record objective evaluations of one hundred outstanding new books published in the United States each year. In the intervening years we have published essay-reviews of thirteen hundred books covering nonfiction and poetry as well as drama and fiction.

A surprising number of these titles have been selected for inclusion in the Fourth Series. For example, Marguerite Yourcenar's HADRIAN'S MEMOIRS, a beautifully styled presentation of the life and deeds of the grave, serene pagan emperor whose imprint on the Roman world is still in evidence, appeared in the 1954 Annual. Yukio Mishima's THE SOUND OF WAVES, from the 1957 Annual, brought to American readers a sensitive story of two present-day young lovers thwarted by Japanese tradition. The same volume included a book called PROFILES IN COURAGE, whose author was then a mere U.S. Senator.

Among the novels of more than passing interest in the 1958 Annual were John Cheever's THE WAPSHOT CHRONICLE and the first volume of Lawrence Durrell's ALEXANDRIA QUARTET, which focuses on Justine. This Annual also took note of England's "Angry Young Men" by including John Osborne's LOOK BACK IN ANGER. The most discussed novel in the 1959 Annual was Boris Pasternak's DOCTOR ZHIVAGO. Perhaps the most important work of that year from the standpoint of American literary scholarship was THE LETTERS OF EMILY DICKINSON, which had been preceded three years earlier by a three-volume edition of her complete poems, edited by Thomas H. Johnson. The 1960 Annual was noteworthy in that it carried the word announcing the violent end of Flem Snopes. The 1963 volume included Katherine Anne Porter's long-awaited SHIP OF FOOLS along with a number of other outstanding works of fiction. The promising young German writer Günter Grass was represented for the first time in the 1964 Annual with two novels, THE TIN DRUM, his first, and CAT AND MOUSE.

All the Annual titles mentioned above have been included in the Fourth Series and are now a permanent part of the overall project. Although a few titles from the most recent years are included, the staff, feeling uncertain of the objectivity of its appraisals, became more cautious in designating titles for inclusion as we approached our own point in time.

Printed in the Fourth Series is a Cumulative Author Index which lists every author and title represented in the four series. There are 220 new authors and 500 new titles in the Fourth Series, bringing the total number of authors in the entire project to 973 plus 35 "Unknowns." The number of titles comes to a total of 2,010. In the cumulative index titles new to the series—and their authors—are accompanied by an asterisk, a procedure which, in effect, furnishes the reader with an index for Series Four only, as well as the cumulative index. In this series, as in the other three, certain authors and titles that may seem obscure to some observers are included for historical reasons.

With the publication of the Fourth Series this project, begun more than twenty years ago, is completed. Although annual volumes will continue to provide an updating service, no Fifth Series is contemplated for the future. As usual, we wish to express our sincere appreciation to the staff members, some of whom have been active since the very beginning of the project. The outstanding contributions of these dedicated individuals provide the base on which the entire series rests.

Also, we acknowledge with thanks the permissions granted by certain publishers and agents for our use of various works still in copyright. Credit lines and copyright notices appear as footnotes accompanying titles, where appropriate.

Although the future is all one has left, the average person is likely to desert the new wave on occasion, and look back with fondness on something which has occupied the past twenty years of his life. I am normal in that respect.

THE ADVENTURES OF AUGIE MARCH

Author: Saul Bellow (1915-)

Time: c. 1920-1950

Locale: Principally Chicago

First published: 1953

Principal characters:

AUGIE MARCH, the narrator and protagonist

SIMON MARCH, Augie's older brother

CHARLOTTE MAGNUS, Simon's wife

GEORGIE MARCH, Augie's feeble-minded younger brother

WILLIAM EINHORN, Augie's friend and employer

MRS. RENLING, a woman who wants to adopt Augie

THEA FENCHEL, Augie's sometime mistress

STELLA CHESNEY, Augie's wife

Saul Bellow's The Adventures of Augie March, which won him his first National Book Award for fiction, is a novel which quickly impresses the reader that he must be ready to read and understand the book at several levels, each of these being meaningful in itself and yet unmistakably intertwined with the others.

At the simplest and most obvious level of reading, the novel is in the picaresque tradition, telling the adventures, often comic, of a rascal born out of wedlock to a charwoman, reared in the poverty of a down-at-heels Chicago neighborhood, and early addicted to taking life as it comes. Augie March the adult, thus seen, is a ne'er-do-well hanger-on to people of wealth and, at times, a thief, even a would-be smuggler. As a child of poverty he learned from the adults about him and from his experience that a ready lie told with a glib tongue and an air of innocence is often profitable. Growing older, he learned that many women are of easy virtue and hold the same loose reins on their personal morality as Augie himself. Love of a kind and easy money seem, at this level, to be Augie's goals in life.

While he may dream of becoming a teacher, even take a few courses at the University of Chicago and read widely in an informal way, Augie stays on the fringes of the postwar black market, where he finds the easy money he needs to live in what he regards as style.

When viewed at the literal level, The Adventures of Augie March, like Bellow's earlier fiction, is largely in the naturalistic tradition. In his choice of setting, in his pessimistic choices of detail and character, in his use of a wealth of detail, and in the implicit determinism apparent in the careers of Augie March, his relatives, and his friends, one notes similarities to the fiction of Zola, Norris, Dreiser, and other giants of the naturalistic tradition in literature. One notes also a kinship with the novels of Nelson Algren and James T. Farrell. At times Augie March seems little more than a Jewish boy from Chicago's Northwest Side who is one part Farrell's Studs Lonigan and one part the same author's Danny O'Neill, from Chicago's South Side Irish neighborhood. With Farrell's characters, Augie March shares immigrant background, a loss of meaning in life, degrading poverty, and a grossly hedonistic view of life.

But unlike many naturalistic novelists, Saul Bellow seeks meaning in facts; he is not confined to the principle that the novelist is simply an objective, amoral reporter of life as he finds it, a recorder of life among the lowly, the immoral, the poverty-stricken. Nor does he permit his character Augie March to be merely a creature of environment, molded by forces outside himself, or within himself, over which he has no control. The Adventures of Augie March can be read at a deeper level than environmental determinism. Augie is capable of intellectual activity of a relatively high order, of knowing what he is struggling with and struggling for. Throughout his life he learns that other people want to make him over. Grandma Lausch, an elderly Russian-Jewess of fallen fortunes who lives with the Marches, tries to form the boy, and he rebels. Later Mr. and Mrs. Renling, well-to-do shopkeepers in a fashionable Chicago suburb and Augie's employers, want to make him over, even adopt him, but he rebels. Augie's brother Simon, who achieves wealth and considerable respectability, tries to make a new man of Augie and finds Augie rebellious. Various women in Augie's life, including Thea Fenchel, Augie's erstwhile mistress (whom he follows to Mexico to hunt iguanas with an eagle), try to recast Augie's nature. They, too, fail, for above all Augie refuses to be molded into someone else's image of what he ought to be.

What does Augie want to be, that he refuses to be cast in any mold suggested by the people about him? He wants to become something, for he is always searching—but he never seriously accepts any goal. He wants always to be independent in act and spirit, and some sort of independence he does achieve, empty though it is. He wants to be someone, to achieve all of which he is capable, but he never finds a specific goal or pattern. By refusing to commit himself to anything he ends up accomplishing virtually nothing. It is a sad fact of his existence that he comes to be a bit envious of his mentally deficient brother Georgie, who has mastered some of the elements of shoe-repairing. Saul Bellow seems to be saying through Augie that it is possible to have a fate without a function, but as he presents the character the result is, ironically, to show that without a function no one, including Augie March, can have a fate. Whether or not the irony is intentional, the reader cannot be sure.

Another view of the novel that is both logical and fruitful is to regard it at the level of social comment. Most remarkable at this level is the section of American society in which Augie March moves. Augie is a Jew; that fact is literally beaten into him by neighborhood toughs, including those among the Gentiles he thought his friends, while he is a child. As he grows up, takes jobs, finds friends and confidants, seeks out women to love, Augie moves almost always in the company of Jews. The respectability toward which he is pushed is always the respectability of the Jewish middle classes, particularly that of the Jews who have lost their religion and turned to worshipping the quick success in moneymaking which is mirrored in their passion for fleshy women, flashy cars, and too much rich food. While in one sense Bellow's novel is a novel of an adolescent discovering the world, it is a restricted world in which Augie makes his discoveries. He seems never to understand the vast fabric of American culture which lies about him. If his is a sociological tragedy, and many readers will find it so, it is not an American tragedy in the broad sense. Rather it is the tragedy of a Jewish child who sees only the materialism of Jews who have forsaken their rich tradition and found nothing to replace it.

While some readers will most readily grasp the tragic elements in The Adventures of Augie March, others will grasp more readily the comic aspects. Following as it does in some ways the picaresque tradition, the novel is bound to have a wide strain of the comic. Neither Augie nor his creator take some of the character's deviations from conventional standards of conduct very seriously. Augie bounds in and out of crime and sin with scarcely a backward glance. If his loves seem empty, his women unfaithful, Augie accepts the results with comic aplomb. If to be unheroic, to give in with little or no struggle, to be weak and ineffectual is comic (and thus it has long been viewed), Augie is a comic protagonist and the novel a comic work. But the comic spirit is also used traditionally for serious, often satiric, purpose. It is here that the reader well may be puzzled. While the comic elements are undeniably in the novel, adding to the richness of its texture, one wonders at their purpose. The novel seems at times to be offering satiric comment on the foibles of mankind, but such comment seems alien, if not contradictory, in the framework of Bellow's work, unless it be there to show that the creator of Augie March shares the character's belief in the irrational nature of man, society, and the universe.

Indeed, Augie seems at times to be a symbol of the irrational; this symbolic value is mirrored by the eagle which Augie and Thea Fenchel train to hunt. The young bald eagle, fierce in appearance, proved to be an apt pupil; he seemed marvelously equipped, with powerful wings, beak, and claws, to be an instrument of destruction, and he learned well how to attack a piece of meat tendered by his trainers. But when a live creature, even a tiny lizard, put up resistance, he turned away from the attack; he refused to do what he was capable of doing, defying his very nature. Like the eagle, Augie March failed, too. Young, handsome, charming, and intelligent, Augie refuses to face life, always seeing it as something someone else wants him to do. When life hit back at him, Augie turned away from what he was prepared to do. He strikes the reader as being left without purpose, like the eagle, to exist, to look at, and to be fed. That the character sees this as "living" is perhaps the greatest irony of all. Augie has become an anti-hero; he is not so much comic as pathetic. As narrator he realizes, however vaguely, that while he has denied the traditional goals which people have held up for him, he has not failed to find a goal for himself which he can regard as worth while. In trying to live he has found little but a meaningless existence.

AESTHETIC

Type of work: Aesthetic philosophy and history

Author: Benedetto Croce (1866-1952)

First published: 1902

Benedetto Croce's Aesthetic: As Science of Expression and General Linguistic is important because he was the first to expound the theory of Organic Unity, that form and content are one. Working from this principle and its corollaries, Croce evolved a conception of art and the means by which one could judge works of art of any time or place according to a consistent standard. He held that man's activities are intelligible only as an effort to realize ideals—beauty, truth, ethics—and that history is the record of human intelligence building up civilization in all forms. Concrete reality, he stated, can only be reached through perception of the individual fact or historical knowledge. He saw the goal of philosophy as providing us with an understanding of history, of the spirit of man. But he felt every philosophy to be final only for the present problem which it solved, not for the problems that would inevitably arise afterwards. As a result he rejected all closed systems of philosophy and maintained the nondefinitive nature of philosophy.

The Aesthetic is divided into two parts: the Theory of Aesthetic and the History of Aesthetic. Croce revised this work several times, enlarging and changing it according to the development of his thought. In the first part he developed his theory of art as pure intuition, as a cognitive process concerned with the specific as differentiated from the universal. This cognitive activity is a spiritual activity which produces an image. This image is a complete unit—a finished painting, an entire novel—which brings together many details into a complex pattern. Precisely what this unit is, what processes man goes through in order to produce, reproduce, and evaluate it, and its relationship with other of man's mental processes are the problems that Croce attempts to solve in his Theory of Aesthetic.

Man, said Croce, is free, conscious, and creative, and his creative activity is a spiritual activity that results in an intuition, an image, of the real and the possible. This image is a mental picture of something quite specific and concrete, either an object or a person; thus, images furnish the material for all art. The details of a novel, for instance, its characters and descriptions, are individual details; all of these taken together form the image. This intuition is equal to but quite independent of intellectual knowledge, which is concerned with universal concepts.

A true intuition is expression; a fully formed artistic image is a verbalized image. That which is not expressed is not intuition but merely sensation or formless matter. The spirit can never apprehend this formless matter until it has given it form; then it becomes objectified and is a true intuition. Thus form and content become one. If one cannot express an idea, one does not possess it. As Michelangelo said, "One paints, not with the hands, but with the brain."

The difference in intuitive knowledge between that of the genius and that of the average man lies in scope, not in kind. If this were not so, art could never reveal us to ourselves. For recognition to occur, there must be identity of nature between the artist's imagination and ours. For this reason, also, there can be no supermen because the super-race concept is based on a difference in kind and not simply in scope.

The artistic genius is always conscious—otherwise it would be blind mechanism—and, although its expression is of emotion, of a state of mind and therefore always lyrical, it is wrong to say that only intellectual cognition is knowledge. Intuition is knowledge; the aesthetic fact is form and does not belong to mere feeling or psychic matter. Croce saw every expression as a single expression: spiritual activity fused all impressions into an organic whole; thus Croce proclaimed the indivisibility of the work of art. Not only is art a cognitive activity, but it liberates and purifies. By objectifying his impressions, the artist frees himself from them, and makes himself their superior.

The relationship between intuitive knowledge, or expression, and intellectual knowledge, or concept, is of two parts: first, expression, second, concept; that is, knowledge by means of the imagination or by the intellect; knowledge of the individual or of the universal; of individual things or of the relationship between them. Thus, man's theoretic or spiritual activity of the mind is made up of intuition and logical thought. The other basic, spiritual activity which Croce recognized is the practical spirit or the will. This activity differs from the theoretic in that it is productive, not of knowledge, but of actions, which includes not only the will to do, but the will not to do. This volition, or will, can be directed toward the particular, in which case it is economic, political, or utilitarian, or toward the universal, in which case it is ethical. However, the theoretical form is the basis for the will; practice follows theory. But once an action has been completed, it becomes the object of thought. Thus, the spirit moves with a circular action; the four forms are coexistent and correlative in their distinction, but are not separate.

In analyzing artists and their work, Croce said that they cannot be criticized for their subjects; they can work only at what has moved their souls. And the question of sincerity has no place whatever. The artist can deceive no one since he can give form only to what is in his soul; he can deceive only by betraying himself as an artist by failing to execute his work in its essential nature. Further, art is independent of the useful and of the moral. An intuition or expression shows us the world, a truth, and thus has no relation to useful or economic activity. In artistic or literary criticism one should ask if it is expressive and what it expresses. Successful expression is beauty or, simply, expression because non-successful expression is not expression, or the ugly. Morality has nothing to do with this. Moral activity is the logic of the practical life. To will morally is to will the rational end, and whoever wills and acts morally cannot help willing and acting usefully.

By the same token, one should not criticize works according to laws, of epic or of tragedy, for instance, or according to rhetorical devices or categories. Croce felt that such terms should be used only to indicate certain loose groups, not to establish definitions or rigid requirements. Artistic expressions are either effective or ineffective, entirely on their own terms. Thus, Croce's theory of art enabled him to consider all works of art of any age according to one standard. For example, he felt a perfect work would be both classic and romantic at the same time since "classic" refers to the fully-shaped image and "romantic" to the emotional content.

Expression in the natural sense cannot be aesthetic expression, as could be seen in the difference between grief and a song portraying grief. The complete process of aesthetic production he divided into four stages, as follows: impressions; expression or spiritual aesthetic synthesis; aesthetic pleasure; and translation of the aesthetic fact into physical phenomena, such as sounds, lines, shapes. Poetry, prose, and novels are physical stimulants of reproduction. These, plus memory and the assistance of physical facts, make possible the preservation and reproduction of intuitions produced by man. Natural beauty is simply a stimulus to this reproduction. This aesthetic activity will always agree with the practical because expression is truth. For example, the natural fact of the human body can be beautiful or ugly according to the point of view and to what is going on in the soul of the artist.

Croce stated that there is no such thing as the aesthetic progress of humanity because art is intuition; intuition is individuality; and individuality does not repeat itself. As a result, the history of the artistic production of the human race cannot be thought of as developing along a single line of progress. There are cycles, but not a steady development. Thus, the art of savages is not inferior; each individual's spiritual life has its artistic world and so none can be compared with others in terms of artistic value. Tradition and historical criticism keep alive all the works of art produced by mankind. Croce felt this function to be of paramount importance because life without it would be little more than animals living in the present or the immediate past.

In his History of Aesthetics, Croce described the progressive attempts to solve the fundamental problem of aesthetics. Beginning with the Greeks, he showed the development of philosophic thought to be confused, obscure, or sterile, with only a tenuous, golden thread running from Aristotle to Vico, Schleiermacher, and De Sanctis to the time of his own writing. Thus, he concluded that Aesthetic is a modern science. However, in his later years Croce rejected this view, sacrificed without compunction his entire history, and replaced it with his conception of innumerable specific problems of aesthetics. Just as each work of art must be judged in its own terms, each thinker must be studied in terms of his own problems and not in terms of other problems and solutions. Thus, Croce saw man's entire history as a constant, never-ending effort to attain the ideal.

C. P. Snow's Strangers and Brothers sequence tells the traditional story of a young man's rise in the world and his concurrent education in the ways of that world. Snow follows Lewis Eliot, the hero and narrator of the series, from working class origins to a place in the Establishment. In The Affair, Eliot has gained this position, and his special status as narrator of the novel and the fact that he came into the Establishment from the outside give the reader a special perspective on the workings of the men of power with whom Eliot associates. This perspective is important, for the novel is less concerned with Donald Howard, the rather foolish young man on trial, than with those who are judging him; the Establishment, its way of running things, and its morality are themselves on trial. Specifically, Snow examines the somewhat ponderous way in which officialdom struggles with its conscience, tries to avoid deciding how to reconcile its own best interest with the demands of justice, and finally strikes a balance.

The Establishment is not, of course, an institution, and it is not a group of men of unanimously shared values and goals. Rather, it is composed of men of many types, brought together primarily by their desire to possess power and by their sense of responsibility, grasped in a variety of ways and to varying degrees, for using their power wisely. The obstacles to this task, both internal and external, are numerous; they are also a major object of Snow's attention. Power, one would imagine Snow to say, may well corrupt, but it does so many other interesting things, and brings out such strange latencies in those who possess it, that any blanket statement about its possessors and effects would be ridiculous. A minute study of its agents and their actions, however, can be enlightening.

As he did in The Masters, Snow studies power microcosmically, focusing on the closed society of a Cambridge College. Lewis Eliot, once a Fellow of the College, but now a high-ranking Civil Servant and established lawyer, is approached in London by Tom Orbell, a young political scientist, and Laura Howard, whose husband, a physicist and a Communist, has been dismissed by the college for using a faked photograph in a research publication. They appeal to Eliot as having influence with older Fellows, particularly with his brother Martin and Sir Francis Getliffe, both physicists, the latter a probable choice as next Master of the college. After Lewis asks some questions of his friends in the college and, at Mrs. Howard's insistence, confers with Donald Howard, he is completely convinced that Howard has been dealt with fairly.

Several weeks later, when Lewis is at Cambridge to spend Christmas with his brother, Julian Skeffington, a young physics Fellow, tells Martin and Lewis that he has evidence that Howard is innocent. Skeffington, a Conservative, strict, and absolutely correct, is co-executor of the estate of his wife's late uncle, Cecil Palairet, under whom Howard did his doctoral work. Going through Palairet's notebooks as they arrive at the college Bursary, Skeffington discovers that a photograph is missing from one of them: the accompanying notation suggests that it was probably a copy of the photograph Howard had used in his research. From this discovery Skeffington infers that old Palairet, for some unknown reason, gave Howard the photograph as a bona fide piece of scientific evidence on which Howard, then in all good faith if not in good judgment, based his subsequent work. Skeffington is absolutely convinced, now, of Howard's innocence, but Lewis and Martin are much less so, though they ultimately come around to the view that Howard's case should be reopened.

Skeffington and Martin try to form a majority of the Fellows to demand the reopening of the case. This attempt allows Snow to explore the power structure of the college and the changes in it since Lewis was personally involved in its politics. As Snow is fond of pointing out, politics obeys strange rules. Martin and Getliffe are liberals, Orbell and Skeffington conservatives, but all are for reopening the case. Most of the younger Fellows are either conservatives or apolitical, the exact opposite of the case at the time of the election described in The Masters, published in 1937. Martin is a natural politician, but, as described in The New Men, he once threw away the chance to wield great power in the scientific-administrative establishment by publicly condemning the bombing of Nagasaki. Getliffe is politically naïve, was a major power in scientific research during World War II and is already a scientist of extreme distinction, something Martin Eliot will never be. Martin and Francis Getliffe, however, both want the Mastership (about to be vacant), and both are willing to sacrifice important influence to help Howard, whom they both find stupid, ungrateful, and obnoxious. Skeffington seems to have everything: he was a war hero and could have succeeded in almost any field; instead, he has chosen a career in physics, and is engaged in study of the ionosphere, a field in which he has little natural ability. Orbell is a student of politics, but has less political sense even than Getliffe or Skeffington.

The decision-making body in this case is the Court of Seniors, composed of Crawford (the Master), Winslow (the former Bursar), Arthur Brown (the Senior Tutor), and Nightingale (the Bursar and a bitter rival of Eliot since the days of Crawford's election). Two other Fellows have seniority, but one, M. L. H. Gay, now somewhat senile at ninety-two, has been excluded, and Paul Jago, a virtual recluse since losing the last Mastership election, excludes himself. The former, in fact, tries to engage Lewis to sue the College for excluding him; Snow develops this comic subplot extensively, presumably to show what men of great distinction—as Palaret was—can do in their dotage. Brown, Crawford, and Winslow, re-examine the evidence and find Howard still guilty. At this point, however, Skeffington threatens to make a cause célèbre of the case, and, to avoid publicity, the Seniors agree to conduct a quasi-trial, with Lewis Eliot representing Howard and Dawson-Hill, a former student of some legal fame, representing the Seniors. Almost half the novel is devoted to the trial.

The trial goes badly for Howard. A weak self-advocate, he seems almost uninterested in establishing his innocence. Palaret had been respected, an important scientist; if the issue boils down to which of the two was more likely to have faked evidence, anyone—Martin, Lewis, and Getliffe included—would say Howard. It soon becomes clear, in fact, that the only way to save Howard is to suggest how the missing photograph disappeared. To do so, however, means covertly accusing Nightingale, the first to receive the books, of tampering with them. The Howard party finally decides to act. Getliffe insists on making the suggestion to the Board, though he, as the favorite for the next Mastership, has the most to lose and is not well-suited by temperament for such a task. He does so, and Nightingale makes the mistake of countering with the suggestions that the missing photograph was not the one used by Howard and that Skeffington could have removed the photograph from the Palaret notebooks in order to reopen the case.

This tactic convinces Winslow of the possibility of Howard's innocence and leaves Brown with the deciding vote; Nightingale, of course, votes against acquittal, and Crawford is still undecided. That night Paul Jago comes to see Brown; the two had been close friends before Jago lost the election to Crawford. Though it causes him great anguish, Jago tells Brown that, after Nightingale had made a personal attack on Mrs. Jago during the 1937 election, she had tried to kill herself: by divulging this information he hopes to convince Brown, who is realistic and shrewd, yet stubborn, that Nightingale might be guilty, that Howard might be innocent. He succeeds, paving the way for a compromise by which Howard is reinstated with full pay, but has the period of his suspension counted against his contract, so that he can soon be dismissed. This finding is considered a victory for Howard. Although Skeffington and Orbell want to ask for complete exoneration, Howard, apparently tired of the whole affair, decides to accept it.

In The Affair, a group of reasonable, good-natured, intelligent men commit, or appear to commit, a serious injustice. Only the determined efforts of another group correct the injustice—if, indeed, Howard is innocent; the novel leaves the question open. But Snow's primary interest is not the question of innocence and guilt or that of justice and injustice. Rather, he examines the ways in which the individuals working in various groups make decisions on moral questions: what peculiar combinations of ideology, self-interest, ethical principle, and insight activate these men; how their decisions can be challenged and changed.

This focus is not merely a perspective; it also represents a value. By returning Lewis Eliot to the milieu of his young adulthood, Snow invites comparison of the various generations. He finds the young men of the college poor politicians—in the sense that Arthur Brown has been a superb politician—and the older men less flexible, the system working less well than it was even in the late 1930's. Justice, his story implies, is best served by those who know its limitations and its dependence on imperfect human beings; it is often damaged by moral absolutists.

We are reminded that Snow is primarily a novelist—a storyteller and observer of human nature in action—and not a moralist. He leaves us with no clear-cut answers, not even with a final judgment of who is innocent and who is guilty. What we are left with a revealing picture of how men work with and against each other to achieve what they consider to be worthy goals, the ironic knowledge that, more often than not, these men miscalculate and misunderstand, and the prediction that the ability of men to work well together is decreasing.

AFTER STRANGE GODS

Type of work: Critical and cultural essay

Author: T. S. Eliot (1888-1965)

First published: 1933

In 1919, T. S. Eliot published a short essay titled "Tradition and the Individual Talent" in which he attempted to correct a popular notion of tradition which would oppose that term to individuality and originality. Eliot argues that a contemporary writer must neither slavishly imitate the past nor imagine that he, as an individual, can be independant of the past. Making use of the philosopher William James's ideas, Eliot explains that tradition affects what an individual can do and that what is newly added to that tradition in some small way changes the entire order, from the beginnings to the present. In After Strange Gods, Eliot develops and further defines the line of thought begun in the earlier essay, and he goes on specifically to identify the errors which an inordinate and finally misguided reliance on sheer individuality produces.

Eliot perceived that the equating of tradition merely with what we commonly call the traditional not only falsifies the true meaning of tradition in its profoundest sense, but also leads to an exaggerated and dangerous valuation of the individual, of originality and newness. An individual writer who revolts against tradition is forced to emphasize what in himself is most inimicable to that tradition as he conceives it. He will, or has, emphasized passion for its own sake, or as the sole evidence of vitality; he will attempt to concoct his own mythos, his own worldview, and be led, as Yeats was, into abstraction and solipsism. Eliot is aware, though he plays down the fact, that modern writers, including himself, have been driven to fashion a new worldview because the authority of the old Christian-humanist tradition failed during the nineteenth century, at least. His view is that the true Christian tradition, embodied in art and literature as well as in theology and morality, has changed but has not failed.

His argument is complex and challenging; indeed, it is a frontal attack against many of the greatest literary geniuses of this century. Eliot does not question their genius, only some of the ends that genius has been led to. He attacks the notion that tradition is merely those customs, attitudes, or books which, by virtue of having been accepted in the past are therefore to be revered as unchanging standards of taste and behavior in the present. Such a naïve notion of tradition, or orthodoxy, makes rigid the authority of the past and makes of it a static criterion of excellence against which the living revolt as from the dead.

Rebelling against a false notion, the modern individualist is led to exploit his differences from others. Eliot would agree, up to a point, with Pound's injunction to "make it new," but he warns against newness for its own sake, which then is merely novelty or device or, worse, dangerous self-aggrandizement. Eliot argues that the tradition is not static, but dynamic; a writer, he says, cannot merely mimic what has already been done well, nor can he ignore what has been done. Tradition is the past always reinterpreted, reborn, in the present. It is, finally, our culture, and that culture is and remains essentially Christian in metaphysics and morality. A writer can express his originality, his individuality within it, but he cannot escape it or make up his own tradition. One might well counter by asserting that even in terms of Christianity the tradition has many mansions, that the Church stands for only an aspect of our culture. In After Strange Gods, Eliot is, in fact, willing to have the Church act as final arbiter in all matters of morals and speculation. Many will find this view narrow; but it is a stern narrowness which has behind it great weight, whether it appears quite democratic or not.

In fact, Eliot abhors what is usually meant by democracy, seeing it as a half truth fostered by Rationalism and Liberalism and inspired by the leveling tendencies of rebellious and uncultivated Protestantism. To Eliot, D. H. Lawrence was crippled by his childhood immersion in a particularly enthusiastic, uncritical Protestantism, which provided Lawrence's mother with no standards with which to judge husband or sons. The result is that, to Eliot, Lawrence cannot portray human relationships in terms of any even ordinary social morality. Eliot believes in Original Sin. That is why an Inner Light, which was Lawrence's guide, may as well be the deception of the devil as a true intuition of goodness. So, inadvertently, the modern genius who goes it alone may end by playing devil's advocate. Eliot sees Lawrence as a false, fatal leader, Pound as a blind servant of the very mercantile, middle-class society he so deplored. Even Irving Babbitt, as apparently cosmopolitan as Pound, revealed in his over-insistance on reason the narrowness of his conception of orthodoxy and tradition. Yeats grew beyond his earlier attempts to fashion a new tradition. Of Pound's scathing portrait of Hell, peopled by types drawn from modern life, all those given over to "money-lust," Eliot comments that Ezra Pound's Hell offers few terrors for the modern mind because it is for other people, not the beholder. It is so because Pound has no real conception of Hell, because he has no idea of sin, because he has no notion of any tradition other than the Protestant middle-class traditionalism which fostered him and against which he inveighs. Eliot's is a searching criticism.

To know oneself truly is to know one's origins. This is having the historical sense which views the temporal and the timeless together. Tradition, as Eliot defines it in After Strange Gods, is the sum of all actions, beliefs, and customs that men have acquired by living together in a common society. These two notions combine to produce Eliot's conception of culture. We use our minds, trained in the historical sense, to preserve from the past all that is worth preserving and making this heritage, so far as we are able, the basis of the sort of society we desire. What this attempt finally requires, says Eliot, is a fundamental unity of religious background. He opposes the abstract sense of political or national community to this religiously oriented sense of people and place. Orthodoxy, as Eliot means the term, is not only Church authority, but also the conscious use of intelligence to foster and preserve the culture described above. Heresy, of which the individualistic authors already mentioned are guilty,

Heresy is threatening to tradition and order. Without orthodoxy, there is likely to be no very clear conception of tradition. Without a sense of tradition, views of extreme individualism are probable. Every writer is likely, therefore, to regard himself as a messiah. Because there are many messiahs, the public will finally come to accept all and believe seriously in none. Without power to discriminate, the public accumulates merely "experiences." When one idea is as good as any other, there is no idea at all and people live blindly, at the mercy of their feelings and of the public manipulators. We are left not with a community, a culture, but with an abstraction: the State.

In Eliot's view, the flight from orthodoxy leads through extreme individuality to a final loss of individuality, of the true and real distinctions among men, as well as their cultural unanimity. Modern man is left lonely in an empty-witted crowd. He has democracy but no equality; education, and no enlightenment; money and no satisfaction; great writers, perhaps, but no one to read them.

THE AGE OF REASON

Type of work: Theological study

Author: Thomas Paine (1737-1809)

First published: Part I, 1794; Part II, 1795

In The Age of Reason, Thomas Paine was driven by the same impulses that had energized such earlier works as the Revolutionary pamphlets Common Sense and The Crisis. In The Rights of Man he expressed his hatred of enslavement and his belief that all men have the natural right to be free of all tyranny, physical, mental, and spiritual: Benjamin Franklin once said, "Where liberty is, there is my country." Paine replied, "Where liberty is not, there is mine." This idealistic altruism motivated him to give his writings to the world without any hope for financial remuneration.

In approach and style The Age of Reason is similar also to that of the earlier works. The author is direct, candid, simple, appeals to common sense, presents what to him is overwhelming evidence for his arguments, is at times ironic, jeering, sarcastic. He never writes down to his audience or forgets for whom he is writing.

It is one of the ironies of the literary and theological world that The Age of Reason, which, although written from the well of the author's doubts of traditional religion, was intended primarily to save the world from atheism, should bring against Paine the charge of the atheism that he was trying to combat. As a result of this book the great reputation he had earlier enjoyed as one of the prime movers in the War for Independence was blackened; he became feared throughout America because of his alleged atheism.

Paine's doubts about conventional religion were deep-seated. John Adams said that Paine had them in 1776, and Paine himself says in The Ages of Reason that he had entertained such ideas for many years. Paine's ideas grew out of his idealistic view that man's condition in regard to religion could be better. They were strengthened by the influences of his Quakerism, his Newtonian bent toward science, the examples of classical antiquity in the teachings of such people as Aristotle, Socrates, Plato and the great society in which they lived, and the revelations of the early researches in Eastern religions, of which Paine was one of the early comparative religionists.

The Age of Reason is subtitled "An investigation of True and of Fabulous Theology." In the dedication to his "Fellow-Citizens of the United States of America," Paine insists that the views he is about to express are his alone, and he reaffirms his belief in the right of every individual to form his own opinion, for to deny the right of every individual to his own beliefs leads to slavery. He would therefore, he says, examine all aspects of life, especially religion, with reason.

His own position is made clear from the start. He believes in one God and, like all Newtonians, he professes the Deistic hope for happiness in another world because, contrary to the Calvinistic doctrines which he detested, Deism affords a happiness not found in other religions. Paine states explicitly that he does not believe in the creeds professed by any churches, for his own mind is his tabernacle. All national institutions of faith and dogma have been instituted to tyrannize over mankind, he feels.

The universal purpose of churches, to beguile or deceive the people, is strengthened by another characteristic they all have in common, the pretense of some special mission from God communicated to certain individuals: Moses to the Jews, Jesus Christ to the Christians, Mahomet to the Turks. These revelations must be accepted on faith because there is never any pragmatic truth vouchsafing their validity.

Paine has no criticism of Jesus. He was, Paine feels, a virtuous and amiable man. But he wrote nothing about his so-called special mission on earth. Thus, all accounts about him were written by others, many long after his death. For this reason they are open to suspicion. That Jesus existed is an unquestionable historical fact, and that he preached morality is certain. But that he claimed to be the Saviour of the world is indeed suspect. Further, most of the writings about Jesus as Saviour, the bases of Christianity, differ very little from the writings of other mythologies and calumniate the wisdom of the Almighty.

Paine examines in detail the whole structure of Christianity. He investigates the books of the Old Testament. He seizes upon the Apocrypha, rejected by those who established the Biblical canon, and concludes that all books were chosen arbitrarily; had others been chosen or rejected the present basic structure of Christianity would have been altered. The books that were chosen are filled with "obscene" stories, "voluptuous debaucheries," and "cruel and torturous executions" which constitute a "history of wickedness that has served to corrupt and brutalize mankind." Paine detests these stories, as he despises all cruelty. The Proverbs, attributed to Solomon, are inferior to the proverbs of the Spaniards and are less wise and economical than those of Benjamin Franklin. Here, as elsewhere, Paine demonstrates his great respect for the wisdom and general goodness of the man who had been instrumental in getting Paine to come to America in 1774.

The New Testament, Paine claimed, is likewise spurious. Had Jesus been truly the Saviour of mankind he surely would have arranged to have this knowledge transmitted to the world during his lifetime. He was in fact a Son of God only in the way all men are, and the falsehoods about his divinity were written after his death. Like scholars interested in comparative mythologies, Paine notes that it is curious that all leaders of religions come from obscure or unusual parentage: "Moses was a foundling; Jesus was born in a stable; Mahomet was a mule driver."

Having destroyed the sanctity of the Bible as a basis of religion, Paine asks if there is no word of God, no revelation. Like a good Deist, his response is without equivocation. The true theology is nature, and the "word of God is the Creation we behold," and only in the creation are united all our "ideas and conceptions of a word of God." God to him is a first cause. Here, with an adroitness and wit more characteristic of his earlier works, he turns the Christian's own assertions against him. The Christian "system of faith," he says, seems to be a "species of atheism," a kind of "denial of God," for it believes in a man rather than in the true God and interposes "between man and his Maker an opaque body, which it calls a Redeemer." All such beliefs run counter to Deism, which believes in one Deity who is wise and benign and which imitates him in all things moral, scientific, and mechanical.

The Christian belief in miracles brings forth from Paine his bitterest tirades, almost as fiery and heated as they had been in his earlier works. Mysteries, he says, run counter to true religion. He jeeringly examines the miracle of the whale swallowing Jonah and concludes that although it approaches the marvelous it would have been much more marvelous if Jonah had swallowed the whale. He derides especially the "most extraordinary" of all miracles of the New Testament, that of Satan flying Jesus to the top of a high mountain and promising him all the kingdoms throughout the world. Paine wonders why both then did not discover America; he questions whether "his sooty highness" was interested only in kingdoms.

One of Paine's more amusing refutations of Biblical lore is found in Part II. Though his book is obviously serious in intent, he delights in poking fun wherever possible. He attacks the wisdom of Solomon as claimed in Ecclesiastes. Paine affirms that Solomon should have cried out that "All is vanity," for with seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, how could any man in retrospect conclude anything else? Then Paine contrasts Solomon with Benjamin Franklin, whom he glorifies almost to deification; he claims that Franklin was wiser than Solomon, for his "mind was ever young, his temper ever serene; science, that never grows gray, was always his mistress."

Between Part I and Part II Paine spent eleven months in a French prison. Believing that Part I had been written in too great haste without a Bible handy for reference, Paine attempts to buttress his former statements with details. He had directed Part I against the "three frauds, mystery, miracle, and prophecy," and he intended to blast revelation in Part II, for although all things are possible with God, he is against the use of "pretended revelation," which is "the imposition of one man upon another." He feels that most of the wickedness, the greatest cruelties and miseries that have broken the human race, have originated in the hoax called revelation. Whereas Deism teaches without any possibility of deceit, Christianity thrives on deceit. Religion becomes form instead of fact, "of notion instead of principle," and morality is replaced by faith, which had its beginnings in a "supposed debauchery."

Part II is an attack on the Bible as such, not as a statement of religion. Except in details, in more evidence, and more direct point by point examination and refutation, Part II advances Paine's thesis little beyond its grounds in Part I. Paine ends Part II, as he generally ended his works, with a challenge to the reader. He has shown, he says, that the Bible is filled with "impositions and forgeries," and he invites readers to refute him if they can. He hopes that his ideas will cause readers to think for themselves, for he is certain that when opinions are allowed to thrive in a free air "truth will finally and powerfully prevail."

Little in the book is not good Deistical doctrine which could have been said as easily by Franklin or any other Deist. Paine's style and technique, however, are uniquely his. He is candid in approach and unrelenting in carrying out his thesis. His style is simple, honest, direct, and free of all cant and reverence. Because of his subject matter and his approach, he was felt to be unscientific and vulgar. When it was first announced that Paine was going to write on the subject of religion, many Americans approved; but as the work appeared, reprinted far and wide in newspapers, approval turned to disapprobation. Paine's reputation was so blackened that after his return to the United States in 1802 he found himself virtually without friends. Paine's pen was always his most important weapon, but the reputation that the earlier pen had created the one which wrote The Age of Reason destroyed.

Lawrence Durrell's four-volume novel, rather surprisingly for a work of such size and difficulty, was a popular success from the moment the first volume of it was published in 1957. Perhaps it was so enthusiastically received because it is a love story, the ubiquitous romantic adventure done up in a somewhat flamboyant manner. Yet that love story is narrated in a fragmented, involuted, obscure manner and refracted through complex ideas and experimental techniques. As a plethora of interpretative studies already published by scholar-critics testify, the work is as subtle and demanding intellectually as fiction can be, and certainly is too formidably so to be pleasurable casual reading for a general audience. Whatever the reasons for its popular success, The Alexandria Quartet violates the first prejudice of modern criticism by uniting intelligence with feeling in a way that engages and entertains all the human faculties without compromising the loftiest aesthetic aims.

In doing so it confutes established clichés about alienation, dissociation of sensibility, and dehumanization as the artist's, and man's, inescapable predicament in the twentieth century.

There is nothing secret about the ideas that provide the intellectual scaffolding for The Alexandria Quartet; Durrell states them quite explicitly in the novel itself, then reiterates them in appended notes and in comments elsewhere on the work. Conscious of himself as a modern writer with immediate predecessors who gave great weight in their work to the chaos and disorder of contemporary experience, Durrell regarded his purpose in writing this work as a search for a morphological form appropriate to our time. This statement, taken from a note appended by Durrell to Balthazar, is accompanied by the further explanation that the form must be taken from science—Einstein's relativity physics, to be exact—because contemporary literature lacks classic unity. The scientific concept of a space-time continuum, an infinitely ramifying and exfoliating process-reality without fixable boundaries or exhaustible possibilities, serves as the structural foundation for a realistic narrative intended to mirror the qualities of such a universe and so is "a word continuum," Durrell's suggested descriptive subtitle for The Alexandria Quartet supplied in a note to Clea. But all novels, this one no exception, must have finite boundaries, no matter how arbitrary they may be. So Durrell, though he concludes Clea with "work points" for further possible expansion of the word continuum, limits himself to four volumes, three, as he says, of space and one of time. Einsteinian space-time theories are as much theories of knowing as they are theories of natural reality.

Correspondingly, the first three volumes, covering roughly the same time span and being reconstructions of the past, "interlap" and "interweave" perspectives and evidence on events that occurred among a coterie of people with diverse national backgrounds living in Alexandria, Egypt, just prior to World War II. Moreover, the first two, in the subjective mode, are narrated by L. G. Darley, the "subject" and protagonist of the quartet, and the third, Mountolive, is a naturalistic novel in the third person in which Darley participates as a character and becomes, as Durrell points out, an "object." The last novel, though in the past tense, covers the present, a later time period than the first three, providing therefore a sequel to them. Described in this manner the ideas do not present much difficulty, but they imply and issue into entanglements foreign to our customary thought habits.

All this relativity scaffolding, as Durrell admits, might seem rather pretentious, a dillettantish display of scientific mumbo-jumbo, and if it were nothing more than superficial learning pawned off as profundity, then it would be. But in The Alexandria Quartet, a thought-out work, a typically self-conscious performance for modern literature, ideas are an integral part of its theme and form. It is a novel about writing a novel (it ends at its beginning, with Darley prepared to assume his artithood and writing down that age-old opening for a story, "Once upon a time . . ."), but its self-consciousness is functional. All the major characters, especially Pursewarden, a novelist himself, take the advanced ideas of relativity as commonplaces in their world and pass them on to Darley in such a way that they outline for him the novel he and Durrell eventually write. Active powers in the plot of the novel, the ideas, produced by the imagination reflecting upon its own position and impulses, are a shaping force in the novel's generation, so much so that their role in Darley's maturation is as great as love, the book's subject and the ultimate energy source. Love and intellect, or the counter poles of energy and form, mutually abet each other in the upward course of the life of the imagination. This role of ideas in the novel is perhaps most evident in Darley's progress, or the novel's movement, from subjective impressionism in Justine to objectivity in Mountolive, whereby Darley matures as he becomes better acquainted with the truth and the novel frees itself from extreme subjectivism. The relativity scaffolding, in other words, equips Durrell with the instrument whereby he himself and his characters can come into touch with an external order of time and space, the inner and outer realities thereby confirming one another, the head complementing and reinforcing the heart.

On another level this happy marriage of opposites amounts to a marriage of reason and imagination, the off-spring of which is "science-fiction," Durrell's suggested classification for The Alexandria Quartet, meaning by that not the science fantasy of the popular arts but a blending of scientific truth and the fictive imagination. Love, the subject of this novel, is, after all, a passion to unite, whether it be bodies in sex, minds in truth, or souls in spiritual oneness. When love is, in Whitman's phrase, the keelson of creation, everything that exists does so in a mysterious tension with its opposite to which it is simultaneously drawn to complete itself, from which it is repelled for self-survival, and through which, regardless of whether attraction or repulsion is uppermost, interdependence makes the existence of both possible. In this respect space and time are "married," simultaneously separate yet interrelated, and their union, a field with change occurring within it, is a prerequisite to events. So are subject and object, thought and love, science and fiction "married." A pair of such terms, in fact, points to polarities in tension characteristic of whatever exists, including the psyche, which has a "bisexual nature." Darley, an egoist, hates being alone and a bachelor; Balthazar, a Jewish doctor, says of Cavafy, a poet, that he subscribed to the proposition that if one imagines, he therefore belongs and is free. These are instances of polarities in tension in human behavior.

Durrell calls this phenomenon dimor-

phism, and it is one of the three most important principles in the novel. The second is cyclism, the rhythmic swing from one pole to the other, then back again. This dynamic process is most obvious in Darley's three love affairs, where the first and third women are essentially the same but Darley cannot love the first, Melissa, a Greek whose identifying trait is "charity," because he has not passed through the dark lady. When he has, he can love Clea, a Frenchwoman, and like the Greek a fair lady, whose identifying traits are "innocence and generosity." Mysteriously, the poles in tension generate the power which begets change or, in organic life and fortunate human psychic development, growth. The sea, appropriately, is Darley's clock; it keeps the time, symbolically and literally, of the diastolic-systolic process by which change or growth proceed in their inexorable course.

The Alexandria Quartet is a book of changes, a charting of numerous transformations. The largest, unobtrusively in the background, is the culture-wide one represented by World War II. The work is a novel of the city, of urban man's historically unique human environment. (Though romantic, nature plays a minimal role in it; structurally it is a gallery of people, what is exchanged between man and man, or in love, being the matrix from which growth issues; for this and other reasons The Alexandria Quartet is a strange hybrid that can be labelled "romantic humanism.") One important pair of terms is "country-city," embodied in the Hosnani brothers Narouz-Nessim and associated with "ancient ways—the new culture," and the transformation from the former to the latter is made through the cultural crisis and agony manifested in war. The fact that the initial events for the individuals occur just prior to the war, in the period of gathering gloom, that Darley goes through his dark night of self-examination and purification, and the novel ends as the war is drawing to a close, so that the personal life and the public world simultaneously evolve into a new synthesis, is obviously not accidental. A new era is announced at the end of the cycle for individual and society.

The dimorphic features in this work are far too numerous and interrelated to do justice to here; in addition to those already mentioned, they range from overall motifs such as politics-love and life-art through the commonplace sexual ones to character pairings. But since the book is about Alexandria, little sense can be made out of what is going on in the novel unless the role of the city, its opposition to the individual, is kept clearly in mind. Durrell originally intended to use Athens as his setting, but finally he decided on Alexandria, he said, because it is the historical gateway through which our civilization has passed. When laying down his purpose in writing early in Justine, Darley states his intention to "rebuild" the city in his imagination, and he comments further that the city should be judged, for here people have suffered its conflicts which they mistook for their own. But the city is the people who comprise it. When Justine claims that people are caught by a projected will too strong and deliberate to be human, she is saying something about herself, being, as she must, an incarnation of the city's spirit. Justine departs from Alexandria once but then returns and remains there; Darley, and several other major characters, depart twice, the second time for good. (They move on to Paris, another city of love, a maturer or more human one.) The novel, consequently, is not a naturalistic one based on the tyranny of environment over the person. Alexandria does not have a death grip on its inhabitants; rather, it is a juncture through which they must pass. During the time they are there; they are subject to its necessities; but they can, given a talent for it, pass beyond its determinism to freedom. Environment and individual can be in or out of phase, but only when they are in phase is the environment, Alexandria in this case, experienced as a projection of one's self-enslavement.

Though simple in its outlines and rigorously governed by dimorphism and cyclism, this novel is exceedingly complex in its details. One reason for this complexity is the fact that, within the shifting perspectives of time and personality, nothing specific ever comes, or can come, into clear focus. In the first place, since three of the volumes are in the first person, the structure of the novel is based on the narrator's associations rather than on temporal or logical sequence; second, in a world of relativity chance or random events are as important as predictable causality. Finally, and most importantly, this world is governed by the principle of indeterminacy, the third principle along with dimorphism and cyclism. No ultimate or absolute certainty about a fact is possible. It wears infinite masks and changes guises with the eye of the beholder, a kaleidoscope undergoing perpetual rearrangement. Thus, temporal sequence in the novel is extremely vague (Durrell gives no calendar dates to guide by), and events that seem to be coming into clear focus suddenly blur again or, after a moment's comparison of present with past accounts of them, become indeterminable.

Quite aware that this vagueness exists, Durrell insists that the novel be regarded as a "relativity poem," a tale on one level, a poetic parable on another, that its characters are not people only but symbols also. Suggestiveness, not literalness, stimulation of the imagination, not conceptual certitude, are its intended effect. For this reason Durrell has compared the novel to a pack of Tarot cards; like the Tarot pack it reveals the truth, from the most gross to the rarest, that its reader is prepared to receive. Durrell would engage his reader in his novel in the same relative way that he is engaged in life and the scientist in nature. The honest reader of true fiction, Durrell implies, is necessarily in that fix anyway; his being, like that of the universe he inhabits, is dimorphic and he can perceive that range of wave lengths in the spectrum between the poles that his consciousness, owing to his temperament, culture, and stage of development, is capable of receiving and recording. The novel, indeed, the world, is a mirror reflecting not the times or nature but one's inner self, which paradoxically is also the external universe, or a facet of it. At any rate, it is experienced as, in Wallace Stevens' phrase, "a pressure pushing back," and so is out there at the same time that it is within. The subjective and objective are no longer dichotomized and open to the chicken-egg question, but are inseparable, unfathomable functions of each other.

Its poetic quality makes The Alexandria Quartet difficult to follow in detail and almost impossible to summarize. But the general narrative framework, the overall pattern in which all the parts must fit to make sense, is as clear as the structural framework. Darley, an Anglo-Irish school teacher living in Alexandria, Egypt, undergoes an education in love and time. In interviews Durrell has explained what Darley's education consists of by stating that men are not born human, but life makes them so. Thus, sex-love-truth (or body-soul-mind), the facets in man of that power which the physicist calls energy, impels Darley toward self-realization. Since all external change is meaningless, Darley's humanization must come from forces awakened within which will bring him to a state of poetic illumination. Darley, as man and artist, is in pursuit of an awakening or illumination whereby love-truth will make him free. Liberated, his imagination, the creative principle in man, capable of love at its highest, that is, its most moral, and equipped with the wisdom following from self-knowledge, will be able to act as God reputedly did in creating the world, and in that act it will have returned to the pristine source of all being

—it will have performed the aboriginal act.

The various people and events in the novel make sense in so far as they contribute, narratively and thematically, via contrast, relevant orchestration, or dramatic progression, to elucidating Darley's education. If the preceding description of what happens in the novel is accurate, then Darley must be ignorant at the beginning of his story; he must be suffering from an erotic-knowledge deficiency. And indeed he is. Situated on an island in the Cyclades, to which he has withdrawn after the collapse of his love affair with Justine Hosnani, Darley speaks of himself at the time he begins writing as a sick man needing to heal himself by understanding all that has happened to him in Alexandria. He meditates upon Alexandria and the people he had known intimately there. With his memories, Justine's diaries, and Moeurs, a diary-novel by Arnauti, Justine's first husband, he intends to review that era in his immediate past in order to find the meaning in the pattern of events. Though at one point he proclaims to have no pretensions to art, he wants the people, especially, Melissa Artemis and Justine Hosnani, two women in his life in Alexandria, to reveal the truth that art can uncover. To cure himself of the sickness with which erotic love has infected him, Darley must learn the truth about the ordeal to which he has been subjected; through understanding the powers of darkness, and by transforming suffering into life, he will grow and love again.

Like Stendhal in The Life of Henri Brulard, Darley measures his life in love affairs. Strangely for the conventions of fiction, he has no past—no birthplace, family, educational or vocational background—prior to meeting Melissa, who also is without a history. Both at the time they become lovers had reached a point of existential nullity, but love becomes, for Darley, a suddenly opened door. Three loves serve as the landmarks in his progress and together constitute a self-enclosed psychological episode. The first and last, Melissa Artemis and Clea Montis, are remarkably alike beneath superficial difference, but Melissa, who dies, is a victim of Darley's ignorance because he is not prepared at the time of their affair to value and return her kind of love. Though eventually her face disappears from his memory, that is, drops from the life of his imagination, Darley's guilty feelings over abandoning her for Justine are powerful psychic forces in preparing him to love Clea, a fellow artist, originally virginal, whose voice in the form of letters concludes all three of the volumes narrated by Darley (so is the terminal toward which he is blindly, unconsciously moving throughout his ruminations), and who is undergoing the same education (including a dark, secret love affair with Amaril) in order to be prepared for and finally joined with Darley. But to get to Clea, Darley must pass through Justine, the black goddess, who captures and holds him in thrall during the important phase of his life in Alexandria.

As a juncture through which our civilization and the people in the novel pass, Alexandria represents a hub where the tensions between the flesh and the spirit are at their most pronounced. Justine as an incarnation of the city's sensuality is correspondingly possessed by its contradictory demons of self-indulgence and self-revulsion. Hounded by her egoistic self-absorption, she desperately seeks escape from herself through fantasies, political causes, and sex, but succeeds only in devouring others. Balthazar, another point of revelation, a doctor at a venereal disease clinic and a devotee of the mystical Cabbala, has no deep interest in obsessive love but tries to cultivate a philosophical detachment. He is the opposite extreme from Justine, and the two together exemplify Alexandria's schizophrenia, a madness revealed in symptoms of exhaustion and world-weariness, a sense of deracination and failure, and an inability to respond to personal, individual assessments. Darley, though for a time the city's prisoner, drugged, a failure with people, more and more deficient in love, is saved from its demons ultimately because he is both a part of the city's life and the observer who sits apart to watch it all.

The remedy for the seizure by passion or the furies of the self that Justine afflicts him with, Darley feels, is to understand her. That way he can free himself. He never succeeds, however, because in the world of relativity person-ality as a thing of absolutes is an illusion. Yet he does free himself of her simply by abandoning his desire to penetrate and really know, so that when he returns to Alexandria at the beginning of Clea she is passive and unbearable. The three preceding novels trace Darley's evolution to that point by submitting some crucial events to repeated and, as previously indicated, increasingly objective interpretations. In the first volume, Justine, which is written by Darley while in the mood of a melancholy lover, all events get a romantic reading. In the second volume, Balthazar, which consists essentially of Balthazar's comments on Darley's interpretation of the crucial events in Justine, all events get a philosophical reading, that is, one that favors intellectual motives and values. In the third, Mountolive, a third-person narrative, all events get a straight political reading. Love and politics have been fundamental antitheses in the novel from the beginning, opposite forms of power associated with man's private and public lives; and Mountolive also undergoes the same education Darley does, though he starts with a diplomat's severe self-denial as compared with Darley's self-concern as an artist, and Egypt replaces Alexandria as his abetting environment. Mountolive moves primarily on a political plane, Darley on an erotic or imaginative one. Regarding Justine, for instance, in the first novel she loves Darley for reasons of passion; in the second Balthazar, jolting Darley out of his romantic illusions claims she loved Pursewarden, who makes her laugh at herself, and used Darley as a decoy to distract her husband; in the third it is revealed that she loved her husband, Nessim, and was carrying on affairs with Darley and Pursewarden to assist his political intrigues. It is hard to determine what role, if any, Mountolive has in Darley's progressive rehabilitation, but, regardless of its role, though he never reaches final understanding of Justine, Darley does get perspective upon himself and so is purged through objectivity of his romantic affliction.

The major event in the novel is Darley's act of imagination by which, through reconstructing what has happened to him, he liberates himself to the freedom of art. In performing his act of imagination, however, he weaves an intricate web of personal relations and political intrigue. The former occupy the foreground most of the time and are hopelessly entangled; the latter entails elaborate espionage and counterespionage centering around a plot by the Copts to protect their interests against the Moslems through giving aid to the establishment of an Israeli state in Palestine. (Darley serves as a British, Justine as a Coptic agent.)

Only two people besides Justine, however, have a major constructive influence on Darley. The first is Clea, his unobtrusive instructress in love. Calm, patient, generous, by precept and presence she quietly entices him toward mature, selfless love. The second is Pursewarden, an English writer of pronounced intellectual bent, a man given to irony, laughter, and cynicism. Pursewarden, who commits suicide, is, in fact, Darley's alter ego, his polar opposite in a dimorphic pair. He is the master in the training of Darley's imagination. Being too much aware, Pursewarden cannot act upon what he knows; he must pass it on to Darley, whose innocence, goodness, and readiness to love makes his life wide open, while the others', including Pursewarden's, are enclosed. The intellect must thrive for the awareness necessary to art and truth to be possible, but then it must yield to naïve faith, hope, and passion so that the will to live can prevail. But before he serves his function and dies, Pursewarden describes the kind of novel he would like to write, the book that Darley and Durrell actually do write. Since Durrell and his characters are so articulate, and this articulateness is an integral element in the life of the imagination as The Alexandria Quartet defines it, it is fitting to conclude on Durrell's unsurpassably accurate characterization of the novel's aims and dominant qualities.

No greater evidence of Durrell's success in this endeavor could be found than the enthusiastic reception of The Alexandria Quartet both popularly and critically. As an exploration into modern love and organized on the proposition of relativity, it is a happy fusion of a simple passion with the most advanced understanding of reality. In effect, like all advanced contemporary thought and art, it is an answer to the "dissociation of sensibility" in Western culture during the past three centuries; it yokes thought and feeling, in classical terminology, reason and passion, in a brilliantly illuminating synthesis through a new form accurately reflecting the new world of the post-World War II period. Durrell has both thought and felt out his subject.

The place of The Alexandria Quartet in modern fiction can be best appreciated if it is kept in mind that Einsteinian physics, emerging around the turn of the century, produced a revolution not only in science but in the general understanding of life. The initial reaction by European writers to its overthrow of boxed space and clock time was despair, for by eliminating absolutes Einstein destroyed the grounds of established European social order, thought, and art. The despair resulted in an extreme subjectivity, if not solipsism. As George Orwell said about Henry Miller, the artist was "inside the whale"; his predicament was such that he could not seize hold of or effect the external world, but could only record its violent impact upon his otherwise impotent spirit. The novel of sensibility, or the psychological novel, dedicated to rendering a state of mind, replaced the realistic novel, the literary mode that evolved out of Newtonian physics, as a consequence; its great exemplars were James Joyce and Marcel Proust. But in the post-World War II period, after living in Einstein's world long enough to become accustomed to its novelties, the Western writer has adopted a new tone of confidence, and with that new tone has come an acceptance of man's position and powers in a creative universe.

The Alexandria Quartet, a loving book about love (all the characters are allowed just to be; they are not judged: even Justine has revived and started a new life at the end), exemplifies the new sense of man's being at home in the world, a new sense of a confirmation of the interior man by the exterior reality which allows us to exercise vital powers along lines of excellence in a world affording them scope. To the state of awareness staked out as the province belonging to the novel of sensibility, The Alexandria Quartet adds time, the dimension in which action occurs. Thus Durrell has succeeded in his desire to incorporate imagination in and thereby bring back to the novel the force and meaning of action. His novel, openended like Darley, affirming a new era of hope like Camus' The Plague, is a consummate statement, the broadest in scope and profoundest in depth, for the present stage in the exploration of the territory discovered by Einstein. An engaging story on the most popular of subjects at the same time that it is a monument in the life of the mind in the twentieth century, Darley's "relativity poem" demands and is worthy of our most careful attention because it consists of the very stuff of which life is made today.

ALL FALL DOWN

Author: James Leo Herlihy (1927-)

Time: The present

Locale: Cleveland, Ohio

First published: 1960

Principal characters:

CLINTON WILLIAMS, a boy reaching out toward life

RALPH WILLIAMS, his father

ANNABEL WILLIAMS, his mother

BERRY-BERRY, his older brother

ECHO O'BRIEN, a girl loved by Clinton and destroyed by Berry-berry

SHIRLEY, a young prostitute

James Branch Cabell once tried to compress the story of all human life into a single, simple image: man embarked upon a journey begun in diapers and completed in a shroud. But this statement, like all sweeping generalities, contains only a part-truth. The route by which man travels from the cradle to the grave is no broad highway but a road with many ups and downs, sudden turnings, and strange byways. To the modern novelist none of these is more interesting or significant than the downward road to wisdom. In fiction today the beginning of knowledge is the loss of innocence and not a fear of the Lord.

The fable of innocence confronted by evil and gaining a sad kind of wisdom in the encounter is the theme of James Leo Herlihy's novel. The fact that the youthful hero of All Fall Down makes a long journey in the geography of his own soul puts him into some rather interesting literary company: Huck Finn on his raft,

Holden Caulfield exploring an adult world of hypocrisy and sham, Frankie Addams willing herself into becoming a member of the wedding. Although All Fall Down is a book that invites comparisons, to note them is not to say that Herlihy is in any way imitative. Quite the other way around, his ability to present the emotional adventures of youth as a difficult passage between childhood and maturity, and to tell the story as if it had never been written before, is striking proof of his imaginative force and dramatic control.

Clinton Williams, his hero, is a boy as free-wheeling in his character as Holden Caulfield, but in a vastly different way. Caulfield is an uncomplicated realist whose quickness of mind enables him to identify pretense wherever he thinks he finds it. Clinton, on the other hand, grows up pursuing an illusion, the glamour which his romantic imagination throws about his older brother, whom Caulfield would have catalogued at once as a phony. When the novel opens, Clinton is fourteen and his brother Berry-berry is away "on his travels," begun just after his twenty-first birthday. The Williams family has recently moved into a house in a different section of Cleveland. Clinton is afraid that Berry-berry will not be able to find this new house if he should return, and as a gesture of quiet protest he has stayed away from school for fifty-seven consecutive days. In the daytime he loafs in the Aloha Sweet Shop recording in his notebooks everything he sees or overhears. At home he eavesdrops on his parents' conversations, which he writes into his journals as well, along with copies of letters he has opened on the sly. During the time he has been skipping school he has filled twenty-five notebooks. His entries—Herlihy gives the reader a fair sampling—are as naïve, funny, boring, and revealing as one might expect. His romantic view of Berry-berry is the first interest of Clinton's life. The second is his tremendous curiosity about people and the nature of experience; hence his effort to put down everything he knows and learns in order that he may solve some of life's mysteries.

In many ways Clinton is his father's true son. Years before, Ralph Williams had been an active liberal, before he was trapped by marriage and a family. Theoretically he is in business, but he spends most of his time in the cellar with a jigsaw puzzle in front of him and a bottle of bourbon within reach. He has simplified his life to two convictions: that Christ had founded the Socialist Party and that Berry-berry will turn out all right in the end. Mrs. Williams is nervous, querulous, and tearful, constantly wishing for Berry-berry's return without ever realizing that he hates her.

The memory of the absent son is all that holds this strange family together. Ironically, Berry-berry is unworthy of their love or their hopes for his return. A bum, a pimp, and a sadist, he turns up first in one section of the country, then in another, is in jail or out, is either living off one of his women or else calling on his family for money to get him out of his latest escapade. Most of these facts are unknown to Clinton, however, during the time when he is working in an all-night eating place and saving his money against the day when he can join his brother. The opportunity comes when Berry-berry writes asking his father for two hundred dollars to invest in a shrimp-ing venture in Key Bonita, Florida. Ready to offer the money, Clinton takes a bus to Key Bonita, to find on his arrival that Berry-berry has already skipped town after mauling one of his lady loves. This knowledge comes to Clinton during the night he spends with a prostitute, and the realization of his brother's true nature is almost more than he can stand. He returns home, falls sick, and at one time during his illness contemplates suicide. He is saved when he falls shyly in love with Echo O'Brien, a girl older than he and the daughter of one of his mother's friends, who comes to visit in Cleveland.

Then Berry-berry returns and all is forgotten, or at least forgiven, and the Williamses are reunited by love. As might have been expected, Berry-berry makes a play for Echo O'Brien. His parents hope that the affair will cause Berry-berry to settle down at last. Clinton accepts the fact of Echo's romance with his brother out of gratitude for the atmosphere of family happiness in which he now shares. But Berry-berry cannot be reclaimed from the moral rot that infects him. Refusing to accept responsibility for Echo's pregnant condition, he callously discards her and Echo commits suicide. Clinton at first intends to kill his brother, but in the end he decides that Berry-berry's knowledge of his own corruption is punishment enough. Berry-berry takes to the road again. Clinton begins writing in his notebooks once more, but now, as he says, he feels that he has grown up.

All Fall Down is a story expertly told, dramatically convincing, and comic in an odd, offbeat sort of way. As the epigraph for his novel, Herlihy uses a passage from Sherwood Anderson's Winesburg, Ohio, the section telling of people who seize upon some particular truth, try to make it their truth only, and become grotesques as a result. The quotation is relevant to Herlihy's novel, for the book is, on one level, a story of grotesques. For a long time the Williamses have lived apart and according to their own concerns. It is not until they make love a shared thing that they really come alive. Also, the use of the grotesque is in keeping with the modern view that its image, anti-romantic and anti-tragic alike, provides the most effective means of expressing both the irrationality of things and the moral evil which is also the devouring, obsessive evil of modern society, the isolation of the loving and the lonely. Herlihy sees moral isolation as one of the conditions of being, but he does not make it, as some of his contemporaries have done, a reason for fury or despair. His novel ends on a note of hope.

ALL HALLOWS EVE

Author: Charles Williams (1886-1945)

Time: October, 1945

Locale: London

First published: 1945

Principal characters:

LESTER FURNIVAL, a dead young wife

RICHARD FURNIVAL, her husband

EVELYN MERCER, her dead friend

BETTY WALLINGFORD, another friend

LADY SARA WALLINGFORD, Betty's mother

JONATHAN DRAYTON, Betty's artist fiancé

SIMON THE CLERK, the leader of a religious group

Charles Williams' last novel is set in the locale he knew best, central London, but in a time which he did not live to appreciate: the first autumn of the peace after World War II. To Lester Furnival, standing on Westminster Bridge at twilight, the lights of the city and the drone of a friendly plane overhead are symbols of the peace, a return to the natural order of life, yet Lester becomes conscious of a silence that is unnatural. Through Lester's gradual awareness of the fact that she is dead, Williams crosses and indeed removes the barrier between the natural and the supernatural worlds. Lester is the central character in a spiritual drama which illustrates Williams' mystical and imaginative interpretation of Christian doctrine.

Fundamentally the plot traces the triumph of love over evil during Lester's period of purgatory. A vital and passionate young wife killed in a completely fortuitous plane crash, she is a modern version of the figure of Beatrice, who was Williams' focus in his interpretation of Dante. Her love for her husband, which has survived her death, leads to his conversion, the defeat of evil, and her own salvation. When she first finds herself alone in the city with Evelyn, the friend who was killed with her, she realizes that theirs was never a true friendship. As the two dead women try to establish a genuine relationship in their new existence, they become involved in the affairs of the living. Lester's husband, Richard, has an artist friend, Jonathan, who is in love with Betty, a school friend whom Lester and Evelyn had never really liked. Betty is completely dominated by her mother, Lady Wallingford, who is a disciple of a mysterious faith healer who calls himself Simon the Clerk.

The action of the novel begins when Lady Wallingford and Betty call to see a portrait of Father Simon commissioned from Jonathan. Because Jonathan is a Christian, he has, without realizing it, revealed in the portrait the essence of evil which Simon represents. Lady Wallingford, infuriated, calls off Betty's engagement to Jonathan, takes Betty away, and Jonathan calls on Richard for help. The conflict between mother and lover for possession of Betty becomes, on the supernatural level, the conflict between the God of love and the power of darkness for the human soul.

The character of Simon is developed with all the resources of Williams' interest in magic and witchcraft. Surrounded by a band of zealous converts whom he has healed, preaching to a mesmerized audience in his shabby back-street headquarters, Simon is the re-embodiment of Simon the Magus, of the Jew who rejected Christ; he is, in fact, the anti-Christ. Exploiting the devotion of Lady Wallingford, he had conceived Betty to be his agent and fears that his power over his daughter is now threatened by the human love of Jonathan. He decides that the time has come for the final magical operation which will separate her human soul from her physical body and substitute his will in its place, but he is thwarted by love in action. At each crisis he makes a mistake because his magic powers cannot perceive what love will do.

The sequence of events combines natural and supernatural elements with a realism that is not merely a matter of literary technique but an expression of Williams' belief that the material and the spiritual, the temporal and the eternal, are equally real. This tenet of faith was for Williams a basic fact of the creative imagination. There is no question of fantasy, allegory, or symbol; the novel form is used simply for its traditional purpose of revealing some phase of life's reality. Underlying the events is a pattern which Williams considered fundamental in human life: the power of substitution. He believed that a person who loves can bear another's burdens in a way which he considered physical as well as spiritual. This power means not simply praying for the burdened but loving so deeply that the burden of suffering is transferred from one to the other. As the human form of Christ on the cross suffered for all mankind, so the central character of this story, as of other of Williams' novels, saves a victim by substituting herself.

When Simon goes to Betty's bedroom to perform the final operation of magic, Lester is already there, having gone to ask Betty's forgiveness for rejecting her friendship. As Betty's forgiveness of Lester releases Lester's spirit, so Lester's love sustains Betty and becomes her substitute to receive Simon's curse. Because Lester is already dead, Simon has no effect on her, and Betty is released from his spell, to rebel against her mother and rejoin Jonathan. The defeated Simon then turns his attention to the wretched soul of Evelyn, who has sought his aid to regain her power of persecuting Betty as she had done at school. Lester tries to rescue Evelyn, as she has rescued Betty, by joining her within the miserable deformed physical body which Simon creates for her with his magic powers. Simon attempts to control this body and use it to trap Betty, Jonathan, and Richard; but Lester exercises a greater control through the power of love and warns them in time for them to expose Simon and bring his work and his house to ruins.

The climax of the action takes place on a gray, rainy Halloween, All Hallows Eve, when the deformed body containing the souls of Lester and Evelyn moves through the streets of London and keeps a rendezvous at Jonathan's flat, where the engaged couple have invited the bereaved Richard to join them for dinner. The circumstances of this final encounter between the living and the dead are typical of the relationship between the material and the spiritual worlds throughout the novel. When Lester wants to warn Richard of the approach of the magical body, she thinks of the telephone. Having begged two pennies from a passerby, she goes into a telephone box opposite the Charing Cross Tube Station, a natural enough sight on the streets of London. But when Richard comes to the phone he hears Lester's voice as clearly as he has seen her form several times in the last few days. She gives him the message that they must wait at the flat until the old woman comes. Instead of going out to dinner they spread a meal of bread, cheese, cold scraps, and wine. Thus they prepare themselves for the crisis of All Hallows Eve. After they have met, the three living friends take the deformed body with them in a taxi through the rainy midnight streets of London to the darkened house where Simon and Lady Wallingford are forestalled in their last desperate act of magic.

From the moment when Lester finds herself alone on Westminster to the climax of her final disappearance from Simon's house, there is always a strong sense of London as the background to the action. At first Lester can see only the city, but as her spirit develops she hears all the familiar noises of people and traffic, feels the pavement under her feet, smells the river and the October rain. Betty and Jonathan go together to call on her old nurse at 59 Upper Clapham Lane. There they discover that she had taken it upon herself to baptize Betty as a baby, secretly and in defiance of Lady Wallingford. The literalness of London sights and sounds and addresses is not merely a device to root the supernatural story in the natural world. For Williams, London is an image of the Civitas Dei, the Holy City, the community or communion of the saints. When the city is first mentioned the term indicates the ancient borough of London, site of St. Paul's and the Bank of England as well as Jonathan's flat, as distinguished from Holborn where Simon's headquarters are, or Westminster where Richard's flat is, or Highgate where the Wallingfords live. But through Lester's developing spiritual perception, the spiritual reality of the eternal city is revealed. Its identity is hinted to mortal eyes on the fateful afternoon when Lady Wallingford and Betty call to look at Jonathan's portrait of Simon. Lady Wallingford is equally antagonized by another picture which Jonathan and Richard consider the best he has done, a painting of a part of London after a raid, a scene of desolation bathed nevertheless in living light from the still unrisen sun.

This city emerging from war and night is the setting in which Richard meets his wife again with deeper understanding of their love. At the end of the novel Jonathan and Betty give Richard the picture, and Lester disappears into light. Although the action of the novel centers around the conflict over Betty, the major interest is focused on the dead Lester and the living Richard as they move through the city, at first absolutely separated, then gradually reunited as each comes to understand the reality of love, and finally separated when the understanding is complete. These two characters are developed with a psychological depth, dramatic sensitivity, and humor which make them as fully credible as the protagonists of the traditional nineteenth century novel. Jonathan and Betty are less fully delineated, seen more from the outside, through the eyes of their friends, than from the inside. The dead Evelyn is no longer a human personality but merely the epitome of the egocentric peevishness which was her dominant trait. In descending scale, Simon and Lady Walingford are mere agents of evil, as much puppets as the bodies which Simon can create. This apparent lack of consistency in characterization depends not on literary technique or point of view, but on Williams' theory of personality, his belief that only love can make a human being whole. Jonathan and Betty, in the initial stages of love before its physical consummation, cannot be as fully developed as Lester and Richard. In characterization, as in every aspect of the novel, Williams' story is perfectly integrated with his doctrine. Final assessment of his achievement requires the resolution of a basic ambiguity: whether the credibility of the story makes the doctrine convincing, or whether the credibility of the story in fact depends on conviction about the doctrine.

THE ALLEGORY OF LOVE

Type of work: Literary criticism
Author: C. S. Lewis (1886-1945)
First published: 1936

In The Allegory of Love, the subtitle, "A Study in Medieval Tradition," suggests something more than literary history or criticism. As Lewis traces the development of the allegorical form historically to show how it was conditioned by the general climate of opinion in the Middle Ages, he reveals an underlying theme which is his main purpose. He states that the form and sentiment of the discussed poetry has left a clearly definable trace on our minds even though it has passed away. The allegorical love poem was an easy mode of expression and if we can understand the present and possibly the future then by using the imagination of history we can possibly succeed in recreating expression of the lost state of mind created by these old poems. The basic element distinguishing the medieval from the modern mind was its intuitive recognition of myth as the essence of literature. Imaginative apprehension of this concept is necessary for understanding the relationship between past, present, and future, according to Lewis, because the pattern of history, like all great stories, is a myth whose meaning is revealed only to the imagination.

The structural argument of the book has four main divisions: (1) an analysis of the medieval ideal of courtly love; (2) an explanation of the origins of allegory as a literary form; (3) a survey of the mutations of the allegorical form as it was used in love poems; (4) an analysis of the transmutation of both form and sentiment in The Faerie Queene. In following this main outline, Lewis contributes to the study of medieval literature a useful synthesis of unfamiliar material and fresh assessment of the familiar. Attempting to revitalize medieval literature for the modern reader, he stresses that the Middle Ages, having more coherence than our own age, had also more vitality in the sense that art forms were derived directly from what was considered most significant in human life. The initial premise is that the form of allegorical love poetry is explicable only in terms of the tradition of courtly love.

Lewis distinguishes four main aspects of courtly love: Humility, Courtesy, Adultery, and the Religion of Love. The code of feudal society was obviously responsible for the first two features; the third developed more subtly from the practice of strategic rather than romantic marriage alliances and from the Church's ambivalent attitude toward passion. The fourth feature had the most complex origin and the most significant bearing on love allegory. Lewis thinks that the idea of a "Religion of Love" cannot be attributed to a misunderstanding of Ovid's mock-religious love poetry; for the medieval poets' understanding of Ovid is revealed by the comparable flippancy of their own erotic poetry. Moreover, the original connection between Christianity with its worship of the Blessed Virgin, on the one hand, and the "Religion of Love," on the other, was a matter not so much of influence as of reaction, with the love poetry based on parody of the religious doctrine. But what began as parody was transformed by the high seriousness of some poets into an imaginative escape from the severities of their faith.

The subtlety of this relationship is elaborated in detailed summaries of the love poetry of Chrétien de Troyes and the love theory of Andreas Capellanus. In discussing Chrétien, Lewis stresses the difference between his early Erec and his masterpiece, Launcelot. The first is a brutal adventure tale of the Griselda story type, while the later poem is the epitome of the tradition of courtly love. Chrétien transforms the element of adventure by expressing his hero's religious emotion in terms of subjective adventure, through the medium of allegory. In contrast, Andreas Capellanus in his De Arte Honeste Amandi attempts to Christianize love theory by rational definition, illustrated by a delightful variety of dialogues and stories; but he recognizes the impossibility of reconciliation in a palinode which affirms that all his advice was given in order that the reader might understand but reject love. Lewis feels that his conclusion, like the similar closing passage of Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde, invalidates neither the love theory nor the religious doctrine, but subordinates the former to the latter as, in medieval thought, everything in the secular world is subordinated to eternity. Lewis stresses the fact that the relationship between the two systems, erotic and Christian, was one of infinite variation of a pattern which gave life the unity of art. This idea underlies the whole argument of the book. Life is most meaningful when it has the form of an art; and art, in turn, is most meaningful when it takes its form from life.

Lewis' analysis of the history of the allegorical method is based on the premise that the nature of thought and language is fundamentally allegorical. His purpose is an inquiry into a quality inherent in human speech which becomes as well a part of the structure of poetry in the Middle Ages. The definition of the inquiry implies the conclusion: if allegory is fundamental to the human imagination, then its structural use in imaginative literature results in a synthesis of form and content which was naturally popular in an age which appreciated synthesis.

Allegory as a mode of expression began, according to Lewis, in classical Latin poetry with the use of personification, a literary device which originated in mythology and continued in rhetoric. He traces this development as a decline from genuine mythopoeia or myth-making in literature. Using the Thebaid of Statius as a key example, Lewis reveals a pattern of recurrent loss and recovery; as the Olympians declined into mere figures of rhetoric, the figures of rhetoric acquired increasing imaginative force. This literary trend resulted from a two-fold change in the thought of the Roman world, a change of which Christianity was a supreme manifestation rather than a cause. One aspect was the development of monotheism, which explained the gods of popular religion as facets of the supreme power; and the other was what Lewis defines as an increasing personal sense of divided will and a concomitant practice of introspection. He finds in St. Augustine's Confessions a major example of the trend toward expressing this inner conflict in metaphorical terms, which he thinks explains both the origin and the continued popularity of allegory as a literary form.

The step from metaphorical expression of inner conflict to the structural use of allegory was first taken by Prudentius in his Psychomachia, an inferior poem whose popularity proves to Lewis the eagerness of its readers for full-fledged allegory. The power of allegorical conflict in dealing with psychology was amply demonstrated by the successors of Prudentius. A more subtle power of allegory was gradually revealed by such diverse writers as Claudian, the bishop Ennodius, and the little-known Martianus Capella of Carthage, in whose varied works Lewis finds a common denominator: by means of allegory, the gods of mythology were preserved and the free creation or recreation of the marvelous was made possible. In ancient literature there were only two worlds, the normal world and the world of believed marvels. The use of no-longer-believed marvels as allegory provided the poet with a third world of the marvelous-known-to-be-fiction, a contribution which Lewis considers vital for the development of literature. This is the use of myth, the preservation of the marvelous once accepted as fact but capable of recovery and renewal in later periods. Such a revitalization is found in allegory. This application of loss and recovery, of myth transformed into mythology, foreshadows the history of allegory as a form. Lewis does not draw a parallel but rather reveals a different phase of the cycle: the history of medieval love allegory illustrates recovery and loss. A constant undercurrent of this argument is Lewis' theory of history as the greatest of all myths.

Although an important contribution to allegorical love poetry was made by the French philosophical poets of the twelfth century, whose use of the allegorical form to express metaphysical and theological arguments elaborated the structure and increased the scope of allegory, the first genuine allegorical love poem was the Romance of the Rose, created by Guillaume de Lorris and ostensibly continued by Jean de Meun. Lewis' detailed summary of the first part stresses the poet's psychological realism and his technical achievements. The characters are all personifications of qualities of character: some belonging to the hero, some to the heroine, and some to both. The course of action in which they engage presents such a penetrating description of the experience of both parties in a complex love affair that Guillaume could be called the father of the sentimental novel. But in keeping the allegorical significance consistent, Guillaume does not sacrifice the consistency of the story at its literal level. In the second part the allegorical love story becomes distorted as the action is elaborated without any allegorical significance, or the allegory emphasized with ridiculous results in action; for Jean de Meun was interested in the love allegory merely as a framework for lengthy digressions on a variety of subjects. Both Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun make a major contribution to the development of love allegory: the former with his model of form and the latter with his encyclopedia of material for his successors.

The Romance of the Rose was, according to Lewis, not merely part of the background for Chaucer and Spenser but an influence on English literature second only to the Bible and Boethius from the fourteenth to the seventeenth centuries. With the achievements of Chaucer, Gower, and Usk, which Lewis analyzes in detail, allegory became the dominant form. With its dominance Lewis also associates its decline, in two respects: its use and abuse by inferior writers and its metamorphosis by writers of genius. During the fifteenth century the allegorical form experienced both of these effects. In his discussion of the Chaucerians—Lydgate, Dunbar, Nevill, and Googe—Lewis illustrates the decline of allegory through its separation from the center of interest of the poem and its retention as conventional decoration. Since the dominant form is most likely to attract the inferior talent and even to disguise its inferiority, the main line of influence is likely to be a descending one. The Romance of the Rose is an example: the inferior second part was more influential than the first part, and the incidental elements of the first part were more influential than its essence. But the dominant form may also conceal its own metamorphosis. While the love allegory was declining, the older moral or theological allegory was given fresh impetus by the attempt to retaliate against the erotic theme. In the allegories of Gavin Douglas the homiletic and erotic strands become perfectly fused and subordinated to the imaginative appeal of pure fantasy. Thus, the decline of love allegory, the loss of its original mythopoetic impulse, led ultimately to a recovery.

Lewis' analysis of the relationship of The Faerie Queene to this tradition reveals a complete metamorphosis. Spenser's basic form is that of the Italian romantic epic, adapted for allegorical purposes; and his treatment of love supplants the courtly tradition with the ideal of romantic marriage. Beneath the surface of the romantic epic's series of fantastic adventures are several levels of allegory. The level first apparent is not so much allegory as symbol: the knight, the lady, the dragon's mouth are not imaginary expressions of facts in the natural world but real facts which express the supernatural world. The next level is what makes The Faerie Queene the touchstone for Lewis' theory of mythopoeia: "the world of popular imagination: almost, a popular mythology [in] the primitive or instinctive mind." Two further levels of meaning are dismissed by Lewis as confusing to genuine criticism: the political allegory he considers an unfortunate attempt to attract Spenser's contemporaries, and the allegory of Arthur and Gloriana he considers inexplicable in its fragmentary state. He devotes major attention to the moral or philosophical allegory, which in turn operates on several planes. Each book has an allegorical core developed by characters and events, other events that are miniature independent allegories, and some that are pure fantasy. In distinguishing between these planes, Lewis emphasizes the imaginative unity within the allegorical diversity of the poem. The conclusion about The Faerie Queene is two-fold: its greatness depends primarily on its likeness to life, and its historical significance as the apotheosis and the metamorphosis of the allegorical form. Its influence continues the pattern since it inspired the Romantics not as allegory but as fantasy: what is recovered is never precisely what was lost. In contrast, Spenser's transformation of the concept of love had an influence so direct that romantic marriage became a platitude in English literature.

Throughout his discussion of love allegory, Lewis' emphasis on the artistic subtlety and imaginative appeal of medieval literature leads to some provocative judgments. In analyzing an inferior talent like that of Jean de Meun, Lewis condemns the quality that many medievalists would condone, lack of unity; and he praises a quality not associated with the Middle Ages, power in describing natural beauty. The analysis which reveals Lewis' critical emphasis most clearly is that of Chaucer, whom he discusses as a poet of courtly love rather than as the eventual creator of The Canterbury Tales. Not only did Chaucer's contemporaries think of him as a love poet, but the major tradition of English poetry descended from the love poetry rather than from the Tales. Lewis presents Chaucer's main love poems, The Book of the Duchesse, The Parlement of Foules, and The Book of Troilus, as examples of the varied influence of the Romance of the Rose. The first has the elements of dream vision, garden setting, and courtly love theme, but no allegory. The Parlement has similar framework devices with personifications which suggest specific topical allegory but in fact celebrate the general conceit of courtly love. In Troilus and Criseyde, Chaucer has translated the psychological intricacies of the Romance of the Rose from allegory into literal story, and has transformed Boccaccio's Renaissance story into a medieval poem. Not only do the events conform to courtly love traditions, but the style is uniformly medieval, with rhetorical ornamentation and metaphysical digressions which give the heightened impact of unity in diversity. The ideal of courtly love makes the story theoretically consistent as well as psychologically sound, affording that unity which satisfies a basic need of the imagination. Lewis claims that unity of interest is neither classical nor foreign to any form of art. When the medieval work lacked such unity, the reason was not the fact that it belonged to the Middle Ages but that it failed as a work of art, possibly because the writer worked on a design too vast for his resources and ability. As Lewis points out, the artist succeeded best when he worked on a modest scale, as in the case of Sir Gawaine and the Green Knight or in parish churches of Norman French design, or when his resources were equal to his plan, as in the Divine Comedy or in Salisbury Cathedral, where design and detail are in proper proportion.

Lewis' two themes, the development of medieval love allegory and the understanding of ourselves are united in his conclusion that great literature moves to its own rhythm, neither slowed nor hurried by literature that exists on a lower level. Thus, Spenser's true position is now apparent, centuries after his own time, as the mediator between medieval and modern poetry: too complete a Renaissance might have proved a catastrophe for art. Lewis has achieved his purpose in The Allegory of Love if the reviewer was right who said that it is impossible to read this book without viewing all literature in a new and different light.

AN ALMANAC FOR MODERNS

Type of work: Essays on Nature arranged by days and seasons

Author: Donald Culross Peattie (1898-)

First published: 1935

An Almanac for Moderns is a collection of essays on Nature entered journal-fashion, one for each day of the year. Some of the essays are complete on a single page, while others run on for several pages. At the time the book was being written, Peattie was living in Illinois, at the childhood home of his wife. Like Gilbert White, he has written a natural history of his own American Selborne, but unlike White, he observes Nature with the eye of a trained scientist, bringing into his book the accumulated scientific knowledge of the twentieth century. It is for this reason that the book is an almanac "for Moderns." Modern science has answered many questions since White's time and—what is more important—it has provoked more questions than it has answered, questions which could not possibly have occurred to the serene, clerical mind of Gilbert White.

The almanac is filled with descriptions of local plants and animals, with now and then a glance at the stars and planets. Although Peattie has a naturalist's eye for all living things, his observations on plants, birds, insects, and amphibians seem to outnumber all the others. Each description is a gem of scientific accuracy plus poetic insight. Epithets and similes abound: "that tombstone world," the moon; the "cold batrachian jelly" which unites us with the amphibians; the "silky, silvery and perpetually talkative needles" of the white pine; the "click of a seed in a weatherbeaten pod," describing the song of the chickadee; a "turret of inflorescence," the goldenrod; the song of the grackles, like "the uncertain, ragged voice of a boy"; Equisetum, "like some wizened ancient race of men whose stature is cretin, whose language is cryptic"; ants, "the mankind of insects"; the Compositae, "a city . . . of little florets . . . enclosed within leaflike walls"; the "goblin flight" of bats, "seemingly so drunken."

The almanac is not devoted to plants and animals exclusively. It also abounds with thumbnail biographies of naturalists, whose birthdays are thoughtfully observed on the calendar of days. Great names like Darwin, Lamarck, Pasteur, Audubon, Linnaeus, Thoreau, von Humboldt and Goethe appear with less-known names like Fabre, Wilson, Huber, Forel, Hudson, Rafinesque, de Vries, Nuttall, Reaumur, Michaux, and even Johnny Appleseed. These biographies add zest and human interest to the almanac.

About the only resemblance between Peattie's almanac and the conventional drugstore variety is that it is organized according to the signs of the Zodiac. The first entry is made on March 21, the vernal equinox, in the sign of Aries, the Ram; the last, on March 20 of the following year, in Pisces, the Fishes. Spring is covered in the first ninety-eight pages of the book, from March 21 to June 20; summer, in the next 101 pages, from June 21, the summer solstice, in Cancer, the Crab, to September 21, in Virgo, the Virgin; autumn, in the next hundred pages, from September 22, the autumnal equinox, in Libra, the Scales, to December 21, in Sagittarius, the Archer; and winter, in the last ninety-seven pages, from December 22, the winter solstice, in Capricornus, the Goat, to March 20, in Pisces, the Fishes. Thus the year begins and ends with spring, the season of universal regeneration.

Although the nature lover will enjoy Peattie's descriptions of plants and animals, the historian his thumbnail biographies, and the astrologer his zodiacal arrangement, what makes the book unique is its natural philosophy, based on direct observation of "those obstinate question-ings of sense and outward things," as Wordsworth expressed it. Peattie is one of those rare beings who combine poetry with science, and science with philosophy. As a rule, the scientist is interested in discovering and classifying cold facts which lead to workable hypotheses. He must depend upon accurate observation devoid of all human emotion. As W.I.B. Beveridge comments, in The Art of Scientific Observation, purists contend that scientists should ask "how" but never "why," lest they be misled into the teleological view that an intelligent purpose, embodied in a supernatural agency, directs all life. The poet, on the other hand, is generally untrammelled by any passion for direct observations and cold facts. He prefers "why" to "how," and sees all Nature through a veil of human emotions. Peattie combines both viewpoints.

Even Wordsworth, who observed more Nature than most, ignored petal and sepal, pistil and stamen, to elevate the lowly primrose into a symbol of the universal spirit pervading all living things. But Peattie demonstrates throughout An Almanac for Moderns that even pistils and stamens may arouse a sense of wonder in the observer, and may evoke questions which neither the scientist nor the theologian can satisfactorily answer. The sense of wonder is aroused in Peattie, not by meditations on death and the hereafter, not by the arcane messages of Revelation, but by the mysteries of life here on the planet Earth. Nothing in Nature is insignificant. The slime mold, for example, naked, unwallled protoplasm, mindless, senseless, formless, and yet a living something, may symbolize the mystery of life as well as man himself.

Peattie finds beauty and wonder in all of Nature. Being both scientist and poet, he can find manifestations of beauty which neither can find alone. Beauty is something that impresses our senses as pleasant and exciting. It cannot be measured in the laboratory, nor can it be explained as the gift of some benign supernatural being. Does it serve a useful purpose? Darwin thought so and proposed the idea of sexual selection. The colors and songs of birds, the hues and scents of flowers, attracted mates, insured reproduction, the loveliest colors and scents attracting superior mates and thus perpetuating beauty. The theologian, on the other hand, proclaims that beauty's only purpose is to glorify God. Characteristically, Peattie agrees with neither. Beauty is "excessiveness, superabundance, random ebullience, and sheer delightful waste to be enjoyed in its own high right." Neither does sex need the justification of purpose. Nature has demonstrated time and again that sex is unnecessary for reproduction; it is neither more, nor less, than a part of life's enrichment, to be accepted with a sense of its worth and reverence for its beauty.

Life itself, in all its limitless, bewildering variety, must be the religion of the naturalist. How and where did it originate? Three explanations have occurred to the mind of man: (1) special creation by an omnipotent Providence; (2) transportation, in the form of spores or bacteria, from another world; or (3) spontaneous generation in ancient seas or freshwater ponds. Peattie believes that all three hypotheses evoke more questions than they answer. Philosophy is needed to synthesize all that science has learned about life—not the old, outworn, outdated philosophy of the past, but a new philosophy based upon the observations of science. Evolution is a unifying force in life, but not necessarily Darwin's survival of the fittest. Perhaps there is something, after all, in Lamarck's inheritance of acquired characteristics.

Vitalist, mechanist, and supernaturalist are unable to explain life in its entirety. Teleologists, who find a deep, underlying purpose in life; new believers in the Great Design, a return to Aristotelian cosmology, all leave Peattie unimpressed because predeterminism does not allow deep investigation. Man is not a special creation, but the product of long evolution through eons of time, part and parcel of life right here on earth.

In his attitude toward religion Peattie describes himself as a kind of pantheist, but not a druid, worshiping oaks, or a Hindu, idolizing animals. He does not like catchwords or credos to repeat by rote, but he does like the historical or evolving view of biology because it does not lead to self-satisfaction, but only to more questions. Science is a ship afloat in a great sea. Those on board know less than Columbus did; they do not know where they sailed from or where they are going. The landlubber on board is terrified by this uncertainty. He can survive only by visualizing a safe harbor ahead. But the tough-minded (Henry James's word for the stout of heart) glory in the quest. The naturalist loves and accepts all life and stands in awe before its multitudinous diversities and its countless mysteries. A degree of certainty may come only through the slow, careful probings of science. Meanwhile, the naturalist must keep an open mind.

Type of work: Political and social survey

Author: James Bryce (1838-1922)

First published: 1888; 1910

James Bryce served in several capacities which qualified and trained him to write on American political and social institutions. A professor of history at Oxford and a member of Parliament, he also served in numerous political posts, and was ambassador to the United States from 1907 to 1913. His monumental work, The American Commonwealth, grew out of five visits to the United States and extensive reading about this country.

The American Commonwealth is a shrewd analytical study of the American scene designed for a European audience and obviously written by a man who was prejudiced in favor of America. He felt that regardless of the many flaws and weaknesses in American institutions and the political system, especially on the local and state levels, the sum total of American hopes and aspirations had created a system of rule which was the best to that time and the type that offered hope to the world.

This study is divided into six parts. The first concerns the national government, the Constitution, the Presidency, the two houses of Congress, the Federal courts, the Federal system of government, and the relations of the Federal government with the state governments.

Bryce emphasizes the organic growth of the American political system. He believes that the happy combination of events and of thinking which resulted in this system, especially in the Constitution, grew simply out of the fact that the predominant race in America in the eighteenth century was Anglo-American. This race was directly responsible for the Constitution and the fact that, although it is by no means a perfect instrument, it merits the veneration that Americans generally bestow on it. Bryce feels that the greatness of the Constitution derives from the fact that there is nothing new about it, that like all good political documents, all things that deserve to win and hold the obedience and respect of men, it has its roots deeply planted in the past and grew slowly through changing periods of history. The men who drew up the Constitution were practical politicians who wanted to walk the paths trod by former successful governments. This path was made easy, and its progress assured, by the fact that in America during those days there were no reactionary conspirators threatening the nation, for everybody loved liberty and equality. The most remarkable feature of the American governmental system, Bryce felt, is the pre-eminence of the Constitution and the fact that the Constitution can be altered only by the people.

The creation of a president to head the American government was fortuitous. In outlining his role and power the framers of the Constitution, fearing the monarchical system and a strong centralized government, nevertheless modified existing offices of leaders; that is, they created the office as one that enlarged the role of the state governor, whose office resembled that of the British king, but on a smaller and improved scale. There are numerous disadvantages to this office and the method of electing its holder, but in practice the American president has succeeded better than perhaps he had a right to expect. The responsibility of the position and the realization that the president represents the nation as a whole have sobered and controlled the office of the presidency. With a few exceptions the presidency has not been filled by men of brilliance. However, the office does not demand intellectual brilliance. Instead, only common sense and honesty are needed.

In fact, the political offices in America are not filled by outstanding citizens; few such men take up a career in politics. Even the Senate and the House of Representatives are not constituted of the nation's best minds. The Senate, however, has drawn to itself the best talent in politics and in its dignity and six-year tenure in office has established its authority in the American political system. It faithfully fulfills the intentions of the founders of the nation in resisting change and yielding to it only gradually.

In comparison to the Senate, the House of Representatives seems a bedlam. The House lacks the dignity and the power of the upper chamber. It also lacks the men of ability claimed by its superior half. But what it lacks in these aspects it makes up for in the worthiness of its purpose and, after all, its real accomplishment.

Those who drafted and signed the American Constitution were especially wise in establishing the complex legal institutions that they drew up. Bryce felt that few American institutions deserved closer study than the intricate system of the judiciary. These institutions deserve great admiration because they operate smoothly and have contributed pointedly to the peace and prosperity of America. The weaknesses in the American legal system, in fact, flow not from their makeup but from human frailties.

The second part of The American Commonwealth does for the state and local governments what the first part does for the national government. Like the earlier section, it is a shrewd analysis. The state constitution, like the Federal one, is old. It formed the basis for the instrument written up for the nation as a whole. The state constitutions in general grew out of the Royal Charters, but in being changed and rewritten they cast out the worse aspects of their models. A state constitution is a law passed directly by the people at the polls and is consequently an example of popular sovereignty directly exercised, with few parallels in modern Europe. State governments are more subject to local pressures than is the Federal government, and they are more widely swung by political parties. Some of the weaknesses of the state governments are exaggerated in more local groupings, especially in city governments.

Thus, the American city has much that is blameworthy but also much that is praiseworthy. Universal suffrage has many serious weaknesses, and all become evident and important in a city, where foreign immigrants have swollen the population. Though there are obviously serious problems in the American city, probably no other system of government could have been devised that would have worked as well; and American cities have made progress in solving their problems.

Part Three of this work concerns itself with "Political Methods and Physical Influences." It is a detailed study of the American political machinery, nominating conventions, and public opinion and its power in the United States. Bryce considers that of all American experiments in politics the most worthy of serious study is this governing by public opinion, which towers above all other aspects of American political life as a source of power. Yet this power is used well. Individuals are reckless, but the mass of people are restrained. As a result, public opinion becomes gradually more temperate, mellow, and tolerant.

The very size, strength, and potential of the United States give Bryce great pause for contemplation. Can a nation so immense in size, so varied in population, and with such immense wealth remain one nation and control itself? With his tentative and conservative disposition Bryce hesitates to answer his own questions. But his conclusions almost assert themselves, and his prophecies are somewhat optimistic. Never before has a nation had such golden opportunities, as he sees them, for defensive strength and material prosperity. He concludes that the nation will probably remain unified in government and still more probably united in speech, character, ideas, and action.

In all aspects The American Commonwealth is exhaustive. One of the great strengths of the book derives from the background of its author. Deeply read in European and other governments, he gives his study of the American government an unusual breadth and depth which informs the reader profoundly. Thus, his book becomes essentially a study in comparative governments. As such, it is as informative today as at the time of composition. Only in the study of some of the detailed aspects of American government is the work dated, but only because the institutions he describes, or aspects of those institutions, have been changed by custom, by act of legislature, or by amendment. Always, his comments on the American character and his belief that America is the nation pointing toward the future constitute stimulating and interesting reading.

THE AMERICAN NOTEBOOKS

First published: 1868; 1932

The American Notebooks was first published by Hawthorne's wife, Sophia, as Passages from the American Notebooks, in 1868. This, however, was a bowdlerized version. Mrs. Hawthorne omitted many portions which shed important light on Hawthorne's character, and she revised the manuscripts to the extent that her version misrepresented her husband's genius. Besides making grammatical changes, Sophia prudishly altered passages to make her husband appear more genteel, austere, and circumspect than he was. She deleted passages in which Hawthorne was cynical or pessimistic, and she struck out those which revealed his indolence or which spoke of his affection for such pleasures as good cigars and drink. Above all, she created an image of her husband as a withdrawn, pensive isolationist. This picture is alarmingly erroneous.

In 1932, the late Professor Randall Stewart published the authentic version of The American Notebooks. Using modern editorial methods and applying his own astute scholarly insight, Stewart was able to distinguish Hawthorne's original wording from Sophia's emendations. The result of this work, along with his later biography of Hawthorne and his edition of The English Notebooks, was to correct the image perpetuated by Sophia and subsequent Victorian critics and biographers.

To introduce the text of the journals, Stewart has contributed a valuable introduction. He first discusses Mrs. Hawthorne's revisions of the journals, then devotes a chapter to the adaptation of material from the journals in Hawthorne's fiction. He first points out that Hawthorne's motives in keeping a journal were "professional." Here was the storehouse of raw materials to be used in his creative writing. From his notebook entries, Hawthorne gleaned ideas for stories, details of background, character, and event for his fiction, material for illustration and amplification, and subjects for essays. His journal entries were exhaustive; he noted every little detail of what he saw, recording it for possible use in future writings. Hawthorne never literally copied from the journals, however, in composing a story or novel; journal entries were always reshaped and often combined by his creative imagination. A fictional character, for example, might be a composite of several actual personages who appear in the notebooks.

Stewart's now famous classification of recurrent character types in Hawthorne's fiction is the subject of Chapter III. He shows that Hawthorne's characters are scholar-idealists, persons tormented by hidden guilt, reformers, decrepit old men, or one of three kinds of villains. Heroines in Hawthorne's fiction are of three types: the wholesome, New England girl who is intelligent, independent, and sensible (Phoebe Pyncheon in The House of the Seven Gables, for example); the frail, almost ethereal creature subservient to stronger personalities (Priscilla in The Blithedale Romance); and the sensuous, exotic woman (Beatrice in "Rappaccini's Daughter" and Hester in The Scarlet Letter).

A chapter on the major themes of Hawthorne's fiction concludes Stewart's introductory remarks. He demonstrates Hawthorne's preoccupation with only a few basic themes which recur throughout his writings. Although many variations of these themes were explored, the four basic ones remain (1) the isolation of the individual from humanity, (2) the problem of sin, (3) the injurious influence of the past on the present, and (4) the condition of earthly immortality made possible by an elixir of life. If any of these predominates, it is that of isolation. Whether through too much attention to intellect, a restless quest for something in life, a desire to probe into the heart of another, or extreme religious devotion, isolationists are plentiful in Hawthorne's tales and novels. Hawthorne sensed the danger of severing one's relations with the human family. The isolationists he creates almost always suffer in some way because of their alienation from mankind.

The notebooks themselves comprise five manuscript volumes. Some sixty-nine pages, which cover the years 1835 to 1840 and which were printed in Mrs. Hawthorne's Passages from the American Note-Books, are not included because the manuscript is no longer extant. Stewart refers to material in this section, however, in his copious notes.

The first manuscript volume spans the period from July, 1837, to September, 1838. The first notations were made at Augusta, Maine, where Hawthorne had journeyed during the summer of 1837 to visit his close friend Horatio Bridge. He tells of his fishing trips with Bridge and gives elaborate descriptions of the natural surroundings of the area. His attention to detail, especially to particulars of nature, soon proved essential to formulating background or symbolic material in his fiction. His descriptions of the natural surroundings of North Adams, Massachusetts, where he sojourned during the summer of 1838, provided the basis for the setting in "Ethan Brand." North Adams is in the rugged Berkshires, mountains which made an indelible impression on Hawthorne's vivid imagination. A moonlight walk he took into the outskirts of the village where the solitary limekilns dotted the wild countryside, planted the germinal idea for the setting of the story. In "Ethan Brand" he uses the dark, gloomy terrain of the area to symbolize the desolation surrounding the crazed Brand.

Volume I of the journals also reveals a Hawthorne who was not estranged from the world around him. The portrait presented is not that of a scholar-recluse. True, he spent much time studying and writing in relative seclusion, but he also visited friends, took summer excursions, and made many new acquaintances. All of these activities are faithfully recorded in this first journal.

The second volume, which runs from September, 1841, to May, 1842, begins with notations Hawthorne made while at Brook Farm, where he lived from April to November, 1841. Many of his observations were later used in The Blithedale Romance, the fictional account of the Brook Farm experiment. For example, a picnic and a dance of masqueraders in the woods become the prototype for a scene in The Blithedale Romance. A young seamstress at the boarding house is transformed into Priscilla of that novel.

The remainder of this volume offers high points of Hawthorne's observations up through the time he lived in Lenox, where he wrote The House of the Seven Gables, to his days at West Newton, where he published The Blithedale Romance and A Wonder Book. Again, many recordings form ideas or bases for later fiction. "Egotism; or, The Bosom Serpent" and "Browne's Folly" are only two of the stories whose sources are found in this volume. Several incidents and symbols in both The Blithedale Romance and The House of the Seven Gables have their origin here, and the natural surroundings of Lenox supplied much of the natural description Hawthorne later used in A Wonder Book and Tanglewood Tales.

Volume III, often referred to as "The Old Manse Journal," covers the time between August, 1842, and October, 1843.

This is the richest and most personal of all the manuscripts. The journal takes up shortly after Hawthorne and Sophia were married and had moved into the Old Manse. The account is ecstatic. Hawthorne had assumed a domestic role in his life for the first time. He was deeply in love with his wife; he was enchanted with the idea of marriage itself, feeling that now at last he had a home of his own of which he was head. Losing his taste for the wilds of the Berkshires, he came to love the domesticated nature surrounding Concord. He had a garden there and, as he worked it, could feel something of "the original Adam" developing within him. He tended an orchard also and saw in the domestic character of his beloved apple trees a symbol of man's close relationship with nature.

"The Old Manse Journal" reveals important sources for Hawthorne's fiction and introduces several illustrious personages who became his acquaintances. His love for the spring in Concord prompted the sketch "Buds and Bird Voices." His fascination with the mysterious old house and its profuse natural surroundings evoked his essay "The Old Manse." Nearby lived Emerson, Ellery Channing, and Thoreau. With the latter, Hawthorne was especially close and visited him at his hut on Walden Pond. This period at the Old Manse, in short, was a very formative and profitable one for Hawthorne the man and the artist.

The fourth volume, recorded between 1847 and 1851, is distinctive because it is devoted almost exclusively to an account of Hawthorne's children, Una, Julian, and Rose. The children never ceased to fascinate Hawthorne. He marveled at the differences among them, especially between the two oldest children, Una and Julian. Julian was full of human warmth and possessed a lively sense of humor; Una, however, was somber and had a tempestuous disposition. Her unpredictable actions and frames of mind caused Hawthorne to wonder at times what sort of creature she was, a reflection that led to the creation of the enigmatic Pearl in The Scarlet Letter.

The whole of this fourth volume discloses more than ever a humanized Hawthorne, the man who loved his children and who liked to sit for hours observing them or playing with them. One of the most revealing glimpses of Hawthorne's sympathetic nature is that afforded in the account of the twenty days he spent alone with Julian and the pet rabbit in Lenox in 1851. When Julian was not tugging at Hawthorne's heartstrings, "Bunny" was.

Compared to the two preceding manuscripts, Volume V, covering the years 1850 to 1853, is anticlimactic. There are further notations which become ideas for stories and novels, but lacking are the warmth and human insight of Volumes III and IV. Not to be overlooked, however, are several significant passages which were later used in The Blithedale Romance and The House of the Seven Gables.

In summary, The American Notebooks, as edited by Randall Stewart, is a highly important work on and by Hawthorne. Professor Stewart's lengthy introduction is invaluable for its insights into the textual problem of the journals and into Hawthorne's themes, characterizations, and uses of the journals in his writings. The text itself reveals a Hawthorne who is more human, more sociable, more real than the Victorian stereotype of him. Above all, it opens Hawthorne's workshop to us. We see the materials he had to work with and observe long-range plans taking shape. Although observations relating to setting, character, incident, or symbol were transformed by the author's creative imagination, the notebooks contain the basic materials for such creativity.

AMERICA'S COMING-OF-AGE

Author: Van Wyck Brooks (1886-1963)

First published: 1915

Virtually from the beginning of the American republic our writers have uttered a consistent complaint and issued a consistent call. They have complained of the inhospitable atmosphere of American life to literary creativity, and they have called for a national literature equal to the country's great material accomplishments.

Thus in the year after Emerson had declared in "The American Scholar" that the time was ripe for us to establish our cultural independence from Europe, James Fenimore Cooper in The American Democrat spoke harshly of the repressive effects of the democratic system upon men of superior ability and individualistic bent. A dozen years later Herman Melville, tempted to satisfy his public's desire for more South Sea adventure tales but impelled by his genius toward the darkly symbolic, unpopular, and epic, wrote in a letter to Hawthorne, "Dollars damn me." And in 1879 Henry James, soon to become a permanent expatriate, wondered in his book on Hawthorne how that writer had cultivated so rich a talent on so thin a cultural soil as the United States.

Walt Whitman, however, thought of America as itself the greatest poem of all, and in his poetry, his prefaces to the several editions of Leaves of Grass, and his essays he prophesied a national literature created by a new breed of poet-prophets the like of which the world had never known. As the century closed William Dean Howells expressed a similar, if subdued, optimism for the future of American literature.

Therefore Van Wyck Brooks' America's Coming-of-Age, which in 1915 seemed a radical and revolutionary treatise can be viewed in retrospect as but one of a series of pronouncements on a vital but hardly unexplored subject. Yet because of its own quality and pertinence, and because it came at exactly the right cultural moment, it had tremendous impact upon its time and has continued to influence a phase of our literary thought. In length not much more than an extended essay, America's Coming-of-Age undertakes no less a task than the analysis of the ailing condition of American civilization, the specific diagnosis of its ills, and the etiology of the disease. Operating by means of perceptive surmise, shrewd inference, and brilliant deductive leaps rather than by careful, reasoned argument based on amassed evidence, America's Coming-of-Age carries the reader along on the movement of its emotional force and rhetorical eloquence. The technique is reminiscent of that used by Marx and Freud, wherein manifest logical flaws in the various parts are overcome by the weight and sense of revealed truth in the whole.

At first reading and to many of its contemporaries, America's Coming-of-Age appeared to be a stern denunciation of the United States, its civilization, and its accomplishments. Yet beneath the book's sharply critical, even abrasive tone, one hears the urgent and hortatory voice of a youthful idealism and optimism which has been disappointed but not destroyed. In effect, it conjoins the bitterness of the complaints made by Cooper, Melville, and James, with the stirring affirmation of the call sent out by Emerson, Whitman, and Howells.

As has been pointed out, the essential motivation behind America's Coming-of-Age, a motivation impelling much of Brooks' work during his long and distinguished career, was the ambition to merge art and life, to effect a synthesis between culture and society. As Brooks begins by declaring, and as his book declares throughout, America's failure to achieve this synthesis has blighted its culture. Our culture, he avers, splits in two, divided between the "highbrow" and the "lowbrow": on the one side the ideal, the theoretical, the intellectual, the artistic; on the other the mundane, practical, philistine, commercial. This dichotomy originated in the Puritan theocracy, which erected a rigid barrier between divine and earthly realms, was embodied during the nation's formative years in the contrasting figures of Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin, and was passed down through them. The result, Brooks claims, is a civilization located around the polarities of a detached and dessicated "culture" and a mindless, money-grubbing activism. Without contact with life, the intellectual risks dehumanization; without culture, the businessman is confined to mere earning and spending.

With the exception of Whitman, who alone of American writers merged the two halves of our civilization—combining in his work a great personal talent with intense social engagement—Brooks finds all our major writers wanting in some vital aspect. His common charge against them is remoteness from life, the inability or unwillingness to portray American social reality and, by portraying it, to change it. Irving, Cooper, Bryant, and Longfellow succeeded only in being decorative and/or pious. The rare talents of Poe and Hawthorne were restricted to the creation of their own special, private worlds. The Transcendentalists, led by Emerson, spoke about society and experience but only further emphasized the existing schism between the spiritual and material. Ultimately Emerson's writing assumed the likeness and function of the baccalaureate sermon: both, simultaneously, beautiful and remote. Lowell's large gifts fell short of fruition because he lacked both passion and sufficiently strong original ideas. Even Whitman was at last too affirmative to drive America forward, leaving us only with a rough map for progress. As a consequence, business continues to absorb the best American talent and we have formed as a national ideal that of the "inspired millionaire."

In contrast, Brooks concludes, European civilization has been profoundly affected by such men as Heine, Nietzsche, Arnold, Morris, and Wells, who confronted their nations with distinct sociocultural issues and alternatives. Although the personality of a people is formed, defined, and enriched by these confrontations, none such have occurred in America. The intellectual's chief duty is therefore to formulate crucial issues and force them upon the nation's attention. Only in this way can a merger be made between the two equally sterile modes of life: the "highbrow," the acquisition of culture, and the "lowbrow," the acquisition of money.

Letters and Leadership and "The Literary Life in America" reiterated and amplified what Brooks had said in America's Coming-of-Age. The separate works were collected and published in 1934 under the title Three Essays on America. Although the later essays continued to insist upon the poverty of American literature and culture, Brooks made these significant new points:

1. He broadened his view of the dominant forces in American civilization to include the pioneering experience. Because the pioneering life wholly emphasized material achievement, it completely repressed the spiritual and reflective element which might have produced a viable body of art and literature.

2. He argued that because the intellectual and practical life are so completely divorced in America, we can welcome the most radical foreign writers, such as Ibsen or Nietzsche, without absorbing them or being much affected by them. We make them "mere literature."

3. He complained that in contrast to such European critics as Lessing and Sainte-Beuve, the most influential American critics—More, Babbitt, Brownell, Woodberry—are persistent in their distaste for any literature which grapples with life and real experience. The sociologists and philosophers like Dewey and James, who might have replaced the literary critics as "our awakeners," lack the necessary poetic vision, the inspiring sense of the ideal.

4. He declared that the impotence of American literature of the past fifty years indicates the deeper malady of the whole culture, a malady reflected by the arrested or blighted careers of some of our most promising writers: Twain, London, Bierce, Adams. Nor does the work of more recent writers, Dreiser, Frost, Robinson, and Masters, able but drenched with morbidity, offer much hope. We need and await a school of strong-willed, affirmative writers to lead us out of our cultural wilderness.

Literary historians are unanimous in regarding America's Coming-of-Age as among the crucial documents of its time. It became the most important statement of the liberal position in literary criticism and a rallying point for the younger generation of disaffected intellectuals. Others took their impetus from it, and with the death of his close friend Randolph Bourne, Brooks became chief spokesman for a group of sociocultural critics that included Waldo Frank, Paul Rosenfeld, Lewis Mumford, and Matthew Josephson. They spoke through such magazines as The Seven Arts, The Freeman, and The New Republic. H. L. Mencken carried on the same conflict against Puritanism and philistinism, although on his own front and with his own weapons, while the issues which Brooks had joined in America's Coming-of-Age were explored with unrelenting thoroughness and unrelieved grimness in Harold Stearns's influential symposium Civilization in the United States. In one sense much of the writing of the 1920's, a decade unsurpassed in America in its creative richness, can be viewed as a dramatization of the ideas in Stearns's volume, and before it, Brooks'.

No doubt the work of Van Wyck Brooks also left its mark on a number of the most eminent literary critics who emerged during the 1920's and 1930's: V. L. Parrington, T. K. Whipple, V. F. Calverton, Granville Hicks, and F. O. Matthiessen in his early phase. Indeed, according to Bernard De Voto, Van Wyck Brooks not only influenced the literature of the 1920's and our thinking about it more than any other man, but is also the prime source of what De Voto terms "the literary fallacy," the belief that a culture can be measured by its literature.

Much of Brooks' long later career can be interpreted as having its roots in America's Coming-of-Age. Certainly his two other most controversial works of the period, The Ordeal of Mark Twain and The Pilgrimage of Henry James derive from it. Fusing sociocultural analysis and insights borrowed from depth psychology, Brooks attempted to demonstrate in the first book how the career of a potentially great writer had been stunted by his repressive environment, and in the second how another promising artist had fled to avoid the debasement of his talent only to find himself deprived by the loss of contact with the homeland.

Although Brooks has been severely attacked for what in his later work appears to be a retreat from the extreme but provocative positions taken in America's Coming-of-Age and the books on Twain and James, he himself insisted in The Opinions of Oliver Allston and The Writer in America that his idealism was as strong as ever, but that he preferred to give it more positive expression. Thus in the five volumes of his "Makers and Finders" series, beginning with The Flowering of New England in 1936, Brooks tried with considerable success to provide the nation with that very commodity he had long before found lacking, in his own words "a usable past." There is perhaps basis for the charge of inconsistency and reaction, but it can also justly be said of Brooks that he is one of the few American critics of the twentieth century who created a body of work of his own which in some measure fulfills the demands he had made upon others.

AMORES

Type of work: Didactic-erotic poetry

First transcribed: c. 20 B.C.

The three books of the Amores, the Loves, record the progress of a love affair in imperial Rome between the poet Ovid and his lady, Corinna. Each book is made up of short poems in the Latin elegiac distich form. An elegant and elaborate game of seduction and secret love is set out in detail, in a tone both impertinent and sly. In relating his own woes and triumphs in love, Ovid is satirizing the amatory manners of Roman society.

There is a chronological pattern in the poems. Book I begins when the poet, prepared to sing of heroic deeds, arms and war, was struck by Cupid's arrow suddenly. He turns to the poetry of love. The cycle begins: Ovid is tossing sleepless at night, enthralled by love and suffering. He prays that the lady will favor him; he in return will immortalize her in verse. We then come down to more practical matters, in a monologue addressed to the lady and explaining how at a party she can dupe her husband and send signals to Ovid.

The first assignation of the lovers, on a sultry summer afternoon, is described. By contrast, there follows a sorrowful complaint as the poet spends a long solitary night outside the locked door of Corinna's house. One poem is devoted to his guilt and remorse for a moment of anger in which he disheveled her hair. Next is his report of a conversation he overheard between Corinna and Dipsas, a bawdy old hag who gives the lady cynical advice on milking her lovers of gold and gifts. After this, the poet scolds his lady for her cupidity, tries to persuade her that love can only be given, never sold. Two poems tell of a letter he sends to her, in high hopes of a meeting, and his despair when it is returned with a refusal.

But he is not always disappointed. In the next poem, the lovers have spent a night together, and the poet complains of the inexorable coming of day, when they must part. A crisis is recorded: from too-frequent applications of the curling iron, Corinna's hair falls out. Ovid chides and commiserates with her. The last poem of Book I reasserts the essential value of his poetry; it will be an immortal monument to his love.

Book II continues to tell of the progress of the love affair. Opening with a stout denial that he would be a better poet if he tried more serious subjects, Ovid swings into a harangue to Corinna's guard, about how easy and profitable he might find it to smuggle Ovid past the door and into her house. A similar plea is made to her eunuch. A change of mood occasions a poem of jaunty boasting about his ability to love any girl in town; but as if for punishment, the next poem relates his agonies when he suspects a rival.

Accused of dallying with Corinna's slave girl, Ovid denies the charge vehemently, with injured dignity, and in the next poem chides the slave for having blushed at the accusation and proved it true. A general complaint to Cupid comes next, on the theme that love is hell, but heaven too. Ovid boasts to a friend of his great capacity for love-making; he hopes he may die in bed.

seas to be calm, the winds favorable, the trip safe and short. A short triumphant poem tells of another successful meeting of the lovers. But immediately following are two in a different tone: Corinna had performed an abortion on herself and endangered her life, and Ovid is shocked and worried. She recovers and he gives her a ring as a love-token.

Another separation occurs. Ovid, visiting his native village, Sulmo, misses Corinna deeply. There is a poem addressed to Macer, a poet who writes of tragic subjects. Ovid explains how hard it is to write seriously when Cupid laughs and the ladies distract him. In poetry, he predicts, love will triumph over war. The last poem of Book II is advice to Corinna's husband during an imagined meeting. Since forbidden fruits are sweetest, Ovid would have the husband be jealous and watchful of his wife, to make his cuckolding more satisfying.

Book III is less predominantly optimistic, for by now the affair is on the wane. The muse of tragedy calls to Ovid for a great work, but he asks for a short delay while he finishes his Loves. An afternoon at a racetrack is the first incident of this book. In the next poem, Ovid discovers that Corinna's vows of love have been broken. He is bitter and blames himself for ever having believed her protestations. At last he decides to let her lie if she must, but let her not swear false vows by his eyes.

Another poem to the husband appears, pointing out how silly it is to set guards on his wife: the faithful wife does not need them and the unfaithful wife will always find ways to get around them. Next is an account of a dream Ovid had, of a bull deserted by a heifer. A seer interprets this as a forecast that Corinna will leave Ovid. But he is still eager for her. En route to visit her, he is blocked by a flood-swollen stream which he curses and rages at in his thwarted desire.

Matters continue to go wrong: once with her, he finds, ironically, that he is impotent, and he rages even more mightily at himself. The lady is furious, thinking he has worn himself out with other women. She smiles on a new lover and Ovid, neglected, is left to wonder how she could prefer a parvenu and a soldier to him, a great poet.

The following poem is in a more serious tone. It is a funeral elegy on the death of a poet-friend, Tibullus. Next comes a poem in autumnal mood in praise of Ceres, goddess of the harvest, and of lament for his unhappy love affair. Ovid tries to renounce his love for the false Corinna, but unsuccessfully. She is too beautiful, and he must love her even against her will. Wryly he realizes that it was his celebration of Corinna in poetry that spread her fame and attracted other men to her. However, he says, they should have known he exaggerated, and that she could not be as perfect as he had painted her.

In a last confrontation with his cruel lady, Ovid begs her at least to pretend she still loves him, even though he knows she is deceiving him. Let her deny that she strays, so that he may continue to convince himself that she loves him. In the last poem Ovid announces that he has given up writing love poetry; he is now ready to turn to a grave and serious subject; but he hopes that all his writing will endure and immortalize him.

AREOPAGITICA

Type of work: Philosophic address
Author: John Milton (1608-1674)
First published: 1644

John Milton's classic defense of freedom of the press and religious liberty was his response to an ordinance of Parliament of June 14, 1643, requiring among other things that all books receive an official censor's approval prior to publication. Milton saw this act as a renewal of Stuart tyranny and of the Star Chamber decree of 1637 which also denied freedom of the press. When this decree was abolished in 1640, a flood of political and religious pamphlets was released, and for those three years freedom of the press prevailed in England. Milton viewed such intellectual and polemic activity as healthy for his nation and deeply regretted the renewal of state control over printing. In his view, such control reflected the growing tendency of the Presbyterian Parliament to impose uniform religious practices upon England and to oppose any political opposition. In addition, Milton's own Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, published in 1643 and supporting more liberal divorce laws, had been printed without permission; and Parliament had consequently sought to discover the author of this unlicensed work. In form Areopagitica is a classical oration addressed to Parliament although it was not intended for oral delivery. The title Milton drew from a speech of Isocrates to the Court of the Areopagus in Athens.

The long opening section establishes a favorable view of the author and the Parliament whom he addresses. Milton characterizes Parliament as a strong defender of liberty that has already restored to England much of her lost freedom. Liberty, he adds, can exist only when complaints can be aired openly and considered wisely. He writes to Parliament as a passionate lover of liberty and an equally ardent supporter of Parliament, as well as a learned scholar representing the learned men of their nation.

The first argument in favor of freedom of the press begins with a long survey of this issue in history. He demonstrates that Greece and Rome valued highly this freedom and recognized atheism and libel as the only two reasons for censorship. Under the Christian Roman emperors, moreover, only after transcription were books examined, accepted, or judged heretical. But with the Council of Trent and the Inquisition, "the most antichristian council and the most tyrannous inquisition that ever inquired," books were no more "as freely admitted into the world as any other birth." Milton points out to Parliament that the source of their legislation was the tyrannical Council of Trent and the forces of tyranny which Parliament itself had once overthrown in the name of liberty.

Yet those who may agree that the source of censorship is bad may still insist that it produces good results. To this contention Milton replies with his second major argument that moral evil or good is a matter of man's rational choice and that virtue rests in temperance, in choosing between good and evil. God, Milton argues, left to the individual the exercise of his power of choice so that he who can distinguish between good and evil, and abstain from evil, is the true Christian. Real virtue must face trial, must constantly be tested; to prohibit books, therefore, is to prohibit testing virtue and confirming truth. Censorship denies the efficacy of reason. To know evil through books and to reject it, then, is a necessary condition for man's virtue.

But proponents of censorship argue that circulating evil books produces undesirable results: dissemination of evil thoughts among citizens; unnecessary exposure to temptation; and vain employment of time. Milton answers that all religious disputation would have to be removed from the world since even the Bible and the church fathers often relate blasphemy, and, he continues, ignorant men are most often led astray not by learned books but by teachers of false doctrine who, even without books, may spread their doctrines. Prohibiting books, on the other hand, destroys learning and the ability to dispute evil; in addition, a good man may derive good even from evil while an evil man will be a fool with even the best book. As for unnecessary temptations and vain employment of time, since good men may find false doctrine useful in learning the truth, and bad men cannot be prevented forcibly from acquiring evil knowledge, censorship fails to perform its end.

Thus Milton leads to his third crucial argument that censorship itself is an impractical gesture because it cannot accomplish its task of removing the sources of evil. Milton admits that Plato allowed censorship in his Republic, but he adds that Plato also forbade music and dancing. Plato saw how impractical it was to forbid books alone, for to shut one gate against evil and leave open others is a fool's endeavor.

Another impracticality of censorship arises from the machinery required to carry out such a plan. Many hours would be required to read and approve all works ever published or yet to be published. Such machinery would also grow to resemble the abhorred Inquisition. Sects may flourish despite such efforts because they may persevere through oral tradition, as Christianity itself once did. Finally, how could the quality of the censor be insured? Only a learned man should have this job, yet the tedium of reading so many books of little value would soon drive away all qualified men, leaving the job open to base and ignorant men. No matter what quality censor acquires the position, the very nature of his job insures that only received knowledge, those truths already known and accepted by his age, could pass his examination.

Thus Milton passes to his next central argument that through censorship England must suffer harmful consequences. Censorship could only discourage learning and the search for truth, dispossess scholars of respect, and undermine regard for the common man's ability to judge for himself.

Milton's argument concludes with his fourth and most complex point: that licensing publications not only weakens authority of the truth England already possesses, but also actively hinders the acquisition of new and higher truths.

Milton's travels in Europe showed him the horrible consequences of Inquisitional suppression and gave him perspective on the relative freedoms England enjoyed, but he saw that licensing in England would merely substitute the abuses of pre-Reformation England for a new tyranny of presbyters. Truth, he felt, must never stagnate; it must be believed, understood, not simply accepted from external authority. Without questioning and examination, doctrine becomes a matter of outward conformity.

Censorship is, then, an obstacle to acquiring new and unknown truths, and although England through its reformation had advanced somewhat, she must not rest content with half measures. England may boast of the light of her truth and present knowledge only by failing to realize that truth is given in order to press on for new wisdom. England must search "what we know not by what we know." England's great outburst of learning signifies that God regards this nation with special favor, indicates God's readiness to initiate some great new reformation. We wrong with "sect" or "schism" this fervent search for wisdom God inspires among England's people.

Milton believes it is a good sign to see exercise of rational faculties in the midst of external threats to England's safety; such practice argues a healthy political body and confidence in the safe government Parliament provides, and demonstrates the large portion of freedom allotted citizens by Parliament's mild yoke. Parliament cannot make English citizens less eager for knowledge and wisdom, Milton states, without first destroying their liberty. Of such tyranny Parliament once relieved this nation and still despises.

To prohibit new ideas, moreover, what is more likely than to prohibit truth itself? Since truth most often appears suspect to eyes accustomed only to received opinion, what can happen but by complacent disregard for the new to frustrate further discovery of truth? Times such as these readily produce false prophets and true. But who can know whether these spokesmen speak wisely unless we hear both? Defending such truth as we now possess, we may find ourselves persecuting new truths. We cannot, however, tolerate "popery and open superstition," but absolute evil no law can permit.

It does not matter, Milton avers, that false doctrine may exist under such freedom, for "Strong Truth" can conquer all error in "free and open encounter." If we were all more charitable we could tolerate and leave to individual conscience things indifferent, not fundamentally at odds with the "unity of Spirit" which truly binds us. Imposing strict conformity in matters best left to individual conscience converts truth to base outward conformity.

ARS AMATORIA

Type of work: Didactic-erotic poetry

First transcribed: c. 1 B.C.

The Ars amatoria (Art of Love) is a set of entertaining and eminently practical instructions for a successful undertaking of the game of love. The physical, not the philosophical, aspect of love is Ovid's sphere, and pleasure is its sole end. Two of the three books are addressed to young men, the third to girls. Together they make up one of the earliest manuals of the type.

Choosing and winning the proper girl is the subject of the first book. Selection, Ovid encourages the potential lover, is easy; Rome is full of beautiful girls. Go where the action is. He describes in detail the likeliest places: temples, law courts, the forum, the theater, the races, the baths, dinner parties. Once found, the girl must be brought to look favorably on the lover. Ovid's advice to this point is thorough and copious.

Be confident, he says, for all women want to be loved. Even if they do not want a lover, they will appreciate attentions. Win over the lady's maid to advance your cause. If you think it might help, seduce the maid first. Write many letters; promise the beloved anything; plead eloquently; persist through constant refusals. Always be at her side.

Advice on personal hygiene and fashion in dress is offered as well. Ovid tells of the usefulness of wine in warming hearts; and he explains how to handle a lady's husband. Weeping and pallor may gain a lady's pity, but timidity will never gain her favor. The man must take the initiative, and the girl will be glad of an excuse to give in. In short, be adaptable and quick to seize any opportunity to win favor.

Book II consists of advice for holding the girl's love once it is won. Magic spells and potions will not work, Ovid assures his readers. To be loved, a man must be lovable. Physical beauty is good, but it fades in time. The mind and spirit must be cultivated. He advises the lover to learn tact, tolerance, gentleness, eloquence, humility. Never fight with a woman, for making up requires expensive gifts. Bear with her rages and unreasonableness. Let her win at games. Share her opinions and do all possible services for her. If she is ill, be constantly in attendance.

Praise her elaborately and constantly. Never let her find out about your other mistresses unless you do so deliberately, to make her jealous. If you know she has other lovers, pretend not to know. Do not behave like a jealous husband. Never call attention to her imperfections or her age (mature women make better lovers, anyway). Finally, Ovid counsels, learn the proper techniques in bed so that you may both receive the maximum of pleasure.

In Book III Ovid admits that sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; ladies also deserve some instruction in the art of love. He advises girls to taste love's delights now, before they grow too old to be desired by lovers.

Detailed advice is offered about improving one's appearance and dress, how to enhance one's basic type. Cleanliness and cosmetics are discussed. A girl must learn to laugh, walk, talk, dance, and sing gracefully, play games well (but not too well), study some literature, develop an even and pleasing temper. Make yourselves available to lovers, Ovid says, by appearing in public places frequently. Beware of false or mercenary men and do not believe everything a man tells you. Cultivate each man for his own particular talents and be especially pleasant to poets, for they can make you immortal in their verse.

Do not make it too easy for the lover, but learn how to deceive your husband when necessary. Do not be violently jealous. Make elaborate vows of love. Ovid also tells the ladies what he had already told the men: learn to make love. Feign ecstasy even if you do not feel it. Be subtle and mysterious and desirable. Finally, when you are happy in love, thank Ovid for showing you the way.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

Author: Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)

First published: 1883

An Autobiography, by Anthony Trollope, is at once egotistical and amusing. One of the most prolific novelists of the nineteenth century, Trollope tells how he rose from obscurity to become second only to Dickens and Thackeray in popularity, and he shares as interesting sidelights his opinions of his contemporaries and of the art of creative writing, opinions that are calculated to shock anyone who believes in "inspiration." Trollope was a boisterous, outspoken man through whose eyes we can see a side of Victorianism that is often neglected—the rich humor of the satirist.

Trollope looked back on his childhood as a time of misery; his father was poor, and he was unable to defend himself in fist fights with the local boys. Also, his family was divided. His mother went to America, and he found himself pretty much on his own, with the responsibility of having to pay the bills of his father. From this miserable origin (exaggerated in order to make An Autobiography more dramatic) Trollope could move in only one way. He managed to obtain a job in the General Post Office in London, a civil service position that he always looked to with pride.

Never very studious, Trollope was the type of young man who worked so that he might play. He wanted to be a gentleman because gentlemen had more pleasures than other people enjoyed. Thus, his earliest days in the General Post Office were turbulent; he was continually making clumsy mistakes that threatened his dismissal. In fact, the situation became so bad that he hated his work and was only too glad to be transferred to Ireland. This transfer pleased his superior perhaps as much as himself.

In Ireland three things happened to the young man: he acquired a taste, almost an obsession, for fox hunting, he wrote his early novels, and he married. His marriage brought financial problems that his first novels were unable to alleviate. While he was at work on his third novel, he made a change in his literary endeavors; he wrote a short paper satirically denouncing the government's policy in Ireland. Then, while he was surveying for the Post Office in rural England, a new idea matured. He decided to use material drawn from people he had met and to write satire directed against the abuses that he most frequently encountered. This novel was The Warden, the first of the Barchester novels.

From this point on, his life was a continual rise. In his work at the Post Office he was promoted, and in his literary career he wrote Barchester Towers, his greatest novel. He began to travel more often in an official capacity, making trips to Egypt and the West Indies, and he learned to write in whatever situation he found himself—on horseback, on ship, even in sickness. He was very methodical: he kept a diary in which he maintained strict account of the number of pages he wrote each day. Then he set a certain number of pages that he planned to write each week, and finally he arranged his novels so that they would come to exactly the number of pages that the publisher wanted. Because he did not believe in inspiration, he thought of creative writing as he did of any other occupation; the excellence came as a result of practice and diligence. He therefore trained himself to begin a new novel on the day after an old one was finished, and in this way he managed to write on the average of three long novels a year.

In 1859, Trollope heard of Thackeray's forthcoming periodical, The Cornhill Magazine. He wrote Thackeray asking if he might contribute and to his surprise was asked to write a novel for the first number. The connection with the magazine and Framley Parsonage, the first novel he published in its pages, introduced him to the London literary world. He moved to London and began to associate with the figures with whom he had previously wished to be acquainted. In 1861 he was asked to join the Garrick Club, and for the first time in his life he began to feel that he was popular. These years were also the time of his friendship with Thackeray. He thought that Thackeray was indolent and unorganized but that Henry Esmond was the greatest novel in the English language. Having begun a pauper, Trollope now had risen to the top of the literary ladder. Having become a name, he was frequently mentioned with Thackeray, Dickens, and Wilkie Collins.

As a successful novelist, Trollope felt that he was qualified to speak on novels, the art of writing them, and his contemporaries, and it is in these chapters that he gives some of his most valuable insights into his age. The novel, as he saw it, had taken poetry's place as the most widely read literary form, but in its increasing popularity more and different types of readers had to be catered to. If the novel was to be good rather than harmful, the novelist must consider the extent of his influence; he must avoid pictures of vice and he must teach morally edifying lessons. But the novel has another responsibility; it must please. Thus, the good novel is a pleasing moral lesson. Because we are not moved by fantasy, the novel should also be "realistic"; that is, the novelist should strive to make his characters act and speak like ordinary people in our ordinary everyday world.

With these basic assumptions about the moral purpose of fiction, assumptions that were not at all original with Trollope, he discussed his contemporaries. He thought that Thackeray was the greatest English novelist not only of the nineteenth century but of all time; Thackeray wrote "good" (interesting) stories with high moral purposes. Second was George Eliot, who was too much a philosopher for Trollope's simple taste, and third was Dickens, who was unrealistic in his description of human behavior but still very moral. Of the other novelists of his age—Bulwer-Lytton, Wilkie Collins, Charles Lever, Charlotte Brontë, Charles Reade, and Rhonda Broughton—Trollope has little to say, but what he does say is judicious and straightforward. He knew that he did not equal Thackeray, Eliot, or Dickens, but he was willing to say that he should stand fourth in literary rank.

Trollope had few words and no praise for criticism. He denied that it was an art because it had become subjective, arbitrary, and dogmatic, and because the leading critics lacked, of all things, critical ability. Also, he was well aware of the way that good reviews were purchased by the authors and publishers. All in all, he felt that criticism was a disgrace to English literature.

After these remarks on his contemporaries, Trollope returned to his own life to sketch in the major events of his "age of prosperity." In these pages he makes one of the most startling comments in the book: he describes his writing technique. He wrote only three hours a day, and he wrote exactly 250 words every quarter of an hour. He set his watch before him and wrote, and when the three hours were up, he stopped, regardless of where he was. In other words, he daily produced the equivalent of ten printed pages and in a year turned out three novels of three volumes each. What he sacrificed in quality he gained in quantity, and through writing at this monumental rate he was able to resign from the Post Office and support himself with his pen. Free to associate with his literary friends and to pursue a life of gentlemanly leisure, Trollope took full advantage of his prosperity. He continued to write and for several years edited St. Paul's Magazine; he also continued to travel, to hunt, and to spend social evenings in his favorite clubs. As he concludes An Autobiography, he looks in retrospect over his life and, to illustrate how successful he has been, gives a list of his books and the amount of money that he earned for each. Such a comfortable income is available to any person, Trollope tells us, if he is as diligent and hard-working as the author of An Autobiography.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENJAMIN ROBERT HAYDON

First published: 1853

It is one of fate's curious tricks that as Benjamin Robert Haydon's reputation as a historical painter has diminished since his lifetime, the estimation of his writings has risen correspondingly. In the first quarter of the nineteenth century, the years principally covered by the Autobiography, Haydon's friends gave encouragement and much-needed financial assistance to his efforts to bring England to an appreciation of the ideals of High Art, which to Haydon meant historical painting on an epic, Raphaellesque scale. His excursions with the pen, however, were inconveniently likely to bring enmity and spite on the impetuous head of the young painter; and it was earnestly wished by his friends that he would wield the brush instead of the pen.

Now, a century after his death, Haydon's merit as an artist is dubious. There are suggestions that he be redeemed somewhat from the obscurity and neglect he has fallen into, but these are by no means strong enough for him to be considered a central figure in the history of painting. But his intimacy with prominent social and literary figures of the English Romantic period, his spirited style of writing, and his faithful recording of his activities, thoughts, and impressions of people, make his autobiography and journals a rich source of information for anyone interested in the background of English life in the early nineteenth century.

The Autobiography covers the period from his birth in 1786 to 1820. Haydon began writing it, working from recollection and from the journals he kept throughout his life, in 1842. His suicide at the age of sixty cut short the writing, but the rest of his life can be traced in the twenty-six bulky volumes of his journals. Had we only the Autobiography, however, we would still obtain an accurate portrait of the man. Even in his youth the impassioned qualities of his character glow through the pages: pride, hotheadedness, tenacity to a principle, incompetence in his financial affairs, stanch patriotism, devotion to the ideals of art, and indomitable optimism.

Haydon's early determination to devote himself to art met with equally early and long-continued opposition from his family. His parents expected him to take over their prosperous bookseller's shop in Plymouth, but by the age of sixteen the boy hated everything connected with the business and was already set upon becoming a great painter. He relates in his memoirs the family crises that occurred as a result. At last his ambitions were taken seriously, however, and his father, sending him off to London to study art, agreed to support him as long as possible.

The enthusiasm in Haydon's account of his early adventures, even in a retrospect of almost forty years, attests to the nearly frenzied energy with which at the time he plunged into his new career. Chronically poor eyesight could not deter him, and even recurring periods of near-blindness only increased his industry when the danger to his eyes had passed. He studied anatomy; he became acquainted with the prominent painters of London (whose contradictory counsels confirmed him in his own ideas about art). With one of his fellow-students, David Wilkie, Haydon began in 1805 a friendship that influenced both men as mature artists.

The narrative of the Autobiography fairly bristles with enthusiasm as Haydon describes his early struggles for recognition and commissions. Excerpts from his journals are often introduced to trace the progress of a painting. Comments frequently appear wishing that he could do without sleep or food to finish the work more efficiently. His ambitions for greatness seem always to have been at fever-heat, and when his friends predicted that his second major painting, "The Assassination of Dentatus," would change England's entire conception of art, Haydon was filled with hope that it should be so.

Consequently, the cold reception of his painting by the Royal Academy seemed cruel and incomprehensible to him. The painters who formed the Royal Academy were Haydon's detractors throughout his career. He was too individual, iconoclastic, and impetuous for their taste; and their tyrannizing over art, their pomposity and petty jealousies, inflamed him. The enmity that began with the unfavorable treatment of Haydon's painting of Dentatus became a feud that lasted for years. He opposed the academicians individually and as a group; he conducted wars with them in periodical magazines; he argued in society against the monopolization of art criticism by these connoisseurs, when it ought to be the province of working artists. As a result of Haydon's attacks on the Academy, he went for long periods of his life without commissions, without income, and without encouragement by influential people. But his courageous defense of his own ideals against the Academy never abated.

The cause célèbre of Haydon's career in argumentation was that of the Elgin Marbles, a group of Grecian sculptures brought to England by the Earl of Elgin. Haydon was enraptured by the sculptures from his first sight of them. He made countless drawings from them and casts of them. The Autobiography is filled with references to the perfection of anatomy in the human figures, the grace and cleanliness of their lines, the strength and fluidity they suggested. Haydon eagerly supported Lord Elgin's attempt to interest the British government in purchasing the marbles for the nation; but Payne Knight, as spokesman for the Royal Academy, gave such an unfavorable judgment on them that they dropped immediately in public estimation. Haydon waged a pen-and-ink war on their behalf in which his courageous enthusiasm for the sculptures was exceeded only by the imprudence of some of his criticisms of their detractors. Although his writings deepened the personal animosity many felt for him, Haydon was a significant force behind the eventual purchase of the marbles for the British Museum in 1816.

The matter of the Elgin Marbles was only one instance of Haydon's aroused pertinacity in his principles of art. From the beginning of his career, the Autobiography traces an overpowering concern for what he called "High Art." He believed passionately in a "Grand Style," in the moral beauty of painting, in a strict and loving adherence to nature in art. Singlehandedly, he undertook a mission to educate the British nation to an acceptance of his high ideals. But public taste is a capricious thing; the fashionable world preferred to be amused rather than edified; and Haydon never reached his goal.

He never gave it up; constant failure could not calm the enthusiasm he had displayed in the years of the Autobiography. At the end of each year he habitually reviewed his life, with strong self-criticism and earnest plans to become more disciplined, more industrious, and more grateful to God for his accomplishments. His faith in Christianity and the providence of God sustained him through the darkest failures and always re-inspired him to go on. We see in the Autobiography that each painting was begun and forwarded with repeated prayer, and completed with humble thanks to God, the source of his inspiration.

It was a rigorous regime Haydon set up when he painted. Working in tiny, cramped quarters with a canvas as large as the room would hold, he painted for hours, all night and on into the next day. He would re-do a head ten times if necessary, until it satisfied him. In intervals between painting he would read for inspiration, in the historians, Homer, Virgil, sometimes in contemporary novelists. On the occasions when he went into society instead of painting, he felt remorse and contempt for himself afterward. The most relentless application to the work at hand was always his working habit, and he seemed to thrive on it, despite the ruin of his eyesight, despite the debts that began to accumulate immediately after his father was obliged to cease his financial support, in 1810.

Haydon described himself once in the Autobiography as having air-balloons under his armpits and ether in his soul. This is a fair description of the usual state of his spirits. But these empyrean aspirations were little help to him in practical matters. About the state of his finances he seemed totally incompetent. Were it not for the continual support of friends, Haydon would certainly have been ruined in short order. He did, however, have numerous friends. His incursions into the literary world brought him into close relations with Scott, Hazlitt, Shelley, Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Wordsworth, and Keats. Particularly close was Haydon's friendship with the last two; they addressed several poems to Haydon, as did Hunt, Lamb, and Elizabeth Barrett, among others.

The word-pictures Haydon gives in the Autobiography of these literary celebrities are some of the most delightful parts of his memoirs. With the painter's eye for physical detail, he had also an appreciation of characteristics of mind and behavior, so that his descriptions of them suggest vividly their personalities.

Though the enmity of the Royal Academy prevented Haydon from attaining any highly respected position in England, he was highly regarded outside his country. The great Italian artist, Canova, confirmed Haydon's opinion of the Elgin Marbles in every respect; the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg made him a member; Goethe praised him. But Haydon went without commissions in London, and became more and more deeply entangled with creditors and moneylenders.

Haydon's eminence seems to have been a spasmodic thing. To admire his paintings was occasionally the fashionable rage. When his "Christ Entering Jerusalem" was first exhibited in 1820, the whole of Piccadilly was blocked with carriages of people to see it; the receipts for admission amounted to £1,760. But no one wanted to buy it, and no one felt inclined to commission another painting from the artist. Such disappointments happened continually to Haydon. His reaction was invariably incredulity, dismay, rebellion, and then the purchase (on credit) of a larger canvas to begin an even greater work.

It is at a point like this that the Auto- biography breaks off, with Haydon projecting a more magnificent picture, "The Healing of Lazarus." It does not tell us of Haydon's eventual marriage to the young widow he loved, their happiness at first, the deaths of five of their children, increasing burdens of debt, his four imprisonments for debt, and his suicide, by gunshot and razor slash, in 1846. Haydon died as extravagantly as he lived; and the account he left of his life, in the Autobiography and his journals, is perhaps a greater example of the Grand Style in art than any of his paintings.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LEIGH HUNT

Time: 1784-1850

Locale: England and Italy

First published: 1850

Principal personages:

LEIGH HUNT

MARIANNE KENT HUNT, his wife

ISAAC HUNT, his father

JOHN HUNT, his brother and co-editor of The Examiner

GEORGE GORDON, Lord Byron

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

JOHN KEATS

WILLIAM HAZLITT

CHARLES LAMB

THOMAS CARLYLE

Seldom, if ever before or since, has a creative man, notable in his own right, been so fortunate in his association with great men as was Leigh Hunt. To have known intimately all three of the leading "younger generation" English Romantic poets—Byron, Shelley, and Keats—and to have been well acquainted with Wordsworth, Coleridge, Hazlitt, Lamb, and Carlyle is a social and intellectual privilege not in any sense usual.

The Autobiography of James Henry Leigh Hunt, to give him his full name, is far more than a chronological account of the life of an important essayist and minor poet. It is a sorting out of vivid impressions from past experiences and associations, impressions which delineate Hunt's lifelong passion for human advancement as well as his ability in old age to evaluate objectively the way he has come, the influences he has experienced, and those he has exerted.

Published in 1850, nine years before Hunt's death, the Autobiography was hailed by Thomas Carlyle as the best autobiographical writing in the English language. This opinion was widely shared by reviewers, and the book has become a classic of its kind. Its quality derives largely from its emphasis on human values and on the interactions between the author and his various notable friends. Leigh Hunt, therefore, can afford to be neglectful of mere dates and mundane details; he has matters of present and future value to impart.

vey of the author's ancestry, largely Anglican ministers with strong Tory leanings. In the seventeenth century the family, seeking to avoid harassment by the Puritans, had moved to the West Indies but had returned to England in the following century. Leigh Hunt's father, Isaac Hunt, had gone to Philadelphia for an education and had narrowly escaped being tarred and feathered during the American Revolution for the Tory views he expressed in various pamphlets. Having returned to England with his wife and children, he had encountered severe financial difficulties and had abandoned the Tory cause to assume more liberal opinions. With his wife's enthusiastic support, Isaac Hunt had become a Unitarian minister and strong advocate of political reform.

After the Hunts had settled in the Middlesex village of Southgate, their youngest son Leigh was born on October 19, 1784. With his brothers, he was brought up in an atmosphere pervaded by the newly adopted liberalism of both parents, the general improvidence of his father, and the kindness and near pacifism of his mother. Yet, despite the appeal of Hunt's reminiscences about his youth and his schooling at Christ's Hospital, which Coleridge and Lamb had attended earlier, the Autobiography achieves its greatness only in its dealing with the adult life of Leigh Hunt, for it is not in and of itself that Hunt's life demands this memorial; it is the interaction of this life with others that draws our attention.

Having, through his father's efforts, had his first volume of poetry published when he was sixteen, Leigh Hunt continued to follow a literary career. His editing of the weekly Examiner in collaboration with his politically minded brother John, made of the young Hunt a resolute champion of liberal politics. Not long after The Examiner was founded, Hunt married Marianne Kent, who not only became the devoted mother of a large family but also proved an undaunted partner throughout the difficulties which his open pronouncements for reform brought upon Hunt. Its expression of these liberal views made The Examiner attractive to Byron, Shelley, Keats, and Hazlitt, who all soon published in it and thus made the acquaintance of Leigh Hunt.

Its unreserved political criticisms repeatedly involved The Examiner in legal prosecutions by the government. After three acquittals, the Hunt brothers, who had called the Prince Regent "a libertine over head and ears in disgrace . . . the companion of gamblers and demireps," were sentenced to two years' imprisonment and were each fined five hundred pounds. The chapter in which Hunt describes his strange imprisonment has become something of a classic. Its most excellent features are the humanly humorous character sketch of "honest old Cave," the jailor; the account of various visitors, including Byron, Lamb, and Hazlitt; and the description of the previously unused rooms of the prison infirmary which Hunt charmingly redecorated for himself and his family and in which one of his daughters was born. Despite these notes of pleasantness, however, the concluding comments on the author's release from imprisonment in 1815 bear an interesting resemblance to Byron's account of the freeing of Bonivard in "The Prisoner of Chillon."

After regaining their freedom, John and Leigh Hunt gave clear indications in The Examiner that their imprisonment had not mellowed their political enmity toward the Prince Regent. His health having declined during his imprisonment, Leigh Hunt continued to enjoy Byron's visits and was especially pleased by an unannounced visit from Wordsworth, during which he characteristically drew his visitor's attention to a volume of Wordsworth and one of Milton side by side on the bookshelf. Although Hunt was frequently critical of Byron, the Autobiography gives evidence of a genuine respect for Byron's poetry and a sincere appreciation of the poet's attractive qualities.

Byron soon left England, and Hunt did not hear from him again until Byron some years later invited him to Italy. At this point the Autobiography takes up the author's association with Shelley, Keats, Lamb, and Coleridge. Of these, Shelley is singled out as a friend above all friends and as a spirit who, although he professed antagonism to the Established Church, was the most "Christian" of men. Hunt was the most loyal of Shelley's friends, standing by him without reservation or doubt during the ordeal of Harriet Shelley's suicide and the government's subsequent action which deprived Shelley of the custody of his two children. Hunt's anecdotes and descriptions of Shelley have become valuable portions of the biography.

Hunt declares his love for Keats to have been second only to that for the "heart of hearts," Shelley. He finds both poets to have had that greatness which renders it delightful to be obliged by them and an equal but not greater delight to oblige them. It is evident that only Hunt's modesty prevents him from writing freely of the extent to which his friendship was a molding influence on the poetic development of Keats. With Byron and Shelley, Hunt (quite mistakenly) believes that the vitriolic attack by the Quarterly Review against Endymion was largely responsible for the early death of Keats.

Although Hunt pays little attention to the dates of his various activities and enterprises, he discusses his editorship not only of The Examiner but also of The Indicator and The Liberal. He was co-editor of The Examiner from 1808 to 1822. Meanwhile, from 1819 to 1821, he also edited The Indicator, in which his personal essays drew praise from his close friends, William Hazlitt and Charles Lamb. Hunt, in his turn, gives favorable accounts of the personalities of Hazlitt and Lamb. Especially appreciative is his presentation of the latter as a tender-hearted but witty "Lamb-punner." Coleridge, incidentally, was less well known to Hunt than were the two Romantic essayists; yet Coleridge, especially his trait of talkativeness, receives interesting treatment in the Autobiography.

An important event in Hunt's life was his decision to accept the invitation of Byron and Shelley to move his family to Italy and there, under their sponsorship, edit a new periodical, The Liberal. Hunt soon left The Examiner, now in decline, to accept this new post. He gives a graphic description of the voyage to Italy, a journey which repeatedly tried both the patience and stamina of the Hunt family. A highlight of the Autobiography is the narrative of Hunt's first weeks in Italy. The reunion with Byron, Thomas Moore, and especially Shelley at Leghorn, and the few days he spent with Shelley before the latter's tragic drowning, are described so as to leave no doubt of Hunt's selflessness and capacity for genuine friendship. One of the most memorable scenes in biographical prose is that of the gathering of Shelley's friends, including Trelawney, Byron, and Hunt, for the cremation of Shelley's body.

After the death of Shelley, Byron's enthusiasm for The Liberal waned, and the periodical survived for only four numbers, all published in 1822. But the Hunt family, although in difficult financial circumstances, remained in Italy until 1825, when they returned to England and Hunt resumed his literary and editorial profession. The Autobiography contains a lengthy account of the more pleasant voyage back to England and concludes with a modest review of the author's numerous, and now more generally accepted, literary and journalistic endeavors, none of which, except the Autobiography itself, has achieved the status of his earlier essays and poems.

The final view Leigh Hunt gives us of himself is that of a man of letters who has come through a storm of struggle and controversy upon which he can look back without either regret or malice. He appears finally as an unselfish friend and a fair evaluator of his important inspirational function among men of generally greater literary talent than his own.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS

Type of work: Memoirs and journals

Author: William Butler Yeats (1865-1939)

First published: Reveries over Childhood and Youth, 1915; Four Years, 1921; The Trembling of the Veil, 1922; Autobiographies, 1926; Estrangement, 1926; Reflections from a Diary Kept in 1909, 1926; The Death of Synge and Other Passages from an Old Diary, 1928; Dramatis Personae, 1936

Yeats's Autobiography is important for several reasons, not the least of which is that it serves as an illuminating background to the greatest body of twentieth century poetry in England, The Collected Poems of W. B. Yeats. Yeats's poetry is about people: imaginary people (Michael Robartes, Crazy Jane), people of Irish legend (Cuchulain, Fergus), people of Irish history (Parnell, Robert Emmet), people to whom Yeats was related (the Middletons, the Pollexfens), people Yeats knew (Maud Gonne, Lady Gregory). All these, and many more, are celebrated in his poems. The main figure in the poems is, of course, "I, the poet William Yeats."

The poems themselves are not important as autobiography, for the people in them exist in art, not in life. There is a "Yeats country" just as there is a "Faulkner country," but whereas Faulkner changed the names (Oxford, Mississippi becoming "Jefferson"), Yeats did not. In the "Yeats country" Michael Robartes is as real as Maud Gonne, Cuchulain is as alive as Lady Gregory. Yet we are always aware that many of Yeats's people are taken from real life, and in the Autobiography we are afforded an extraordinary view into that life. We read about the places Yeats made famous: Sligo, Coole, Ballylee. We meet the Yeats family and Irish peasants, poets of the 1890's, patriots and revolutionaries, spiritualists, and Swedish royalty. We are presented with the real life equivalent of the "Yeats country" of the Collected Poems, and we see it through the eyes and through the memory of the poet himself.

The first section of the Autobiography, "Reveries over Childhood and Youth," begins with Yeats's earliest memories and concludes with the publication of his first book of poems, The Wanderings of Oisín and Other Poems (1889). The chief locales are Sligo, London, and Dublin.

As a very young child Yeats stood in awe of his sea-captain grandfather, William Pollexfen, but it was his father, John Butler Yeats, whose influence was dominant throughout his childhood and adolescence. The elder Yeats, a none-too-successful painter and an opinionated skeptic, influenced his son in several ways. He fostered his interest in literature by reading to him from the works of James Fenimore Cooper, Walter Scott, Chaucer, Shelley, Thoreau, and many other writers, and in the theater by taking him to see Henry Irving in Hamlet. Until he was nearly twenty Yeats seems to have shared most of his father's opinions (and they were generally outspoken ones) about art, education, and politics. It was only after he had begun to study psychical research and mystical philosophy that he finally was able to break away from his father's influence. But in some respects his father's influence was never broken; John Butler Yeats's hatred for abstractions, for example, was one opinion his son held to all his life, and it greatly influenced the younger Yeats's attitudes towards politics, art, and life itself. Moreover, Yeats was always conscious of being an artist's son and aware, therefore, that he must follow a career that would be the whole end of life in itself rather than a means to becoming well off and living pleasantly. The work which Yeats took as the all and end of life was, of course, his poetry.

In this section we read of many things: Yeats's early interest in natural science (which he later grew to hate); his lack of scholarship and his resultant lack of anything like a systematic formal education; the influence on him of the Fenian leader, John O'Leary; and his continuing interest in legends of the Irish heroes, in stories of ghosts and omens, and in peasant tales of all kinds. It was only natural that Yeats was later to collect these stories (as in The Celtic Twilight, 1893), for he was never to forget his mother and a fisherman's wife telling each other stories such as Homer himself might have told.

Most of all, this section of the Autobiography is a portrait of the artist as a young man. At first Yeats merely played the roles of sage, magician, poet. Sometimes he was Hamlet, or Byron's Manfred, or Shelley's Alastor; at other times he was Byron himself. Then he began to write poems in admiring imitation of Shelley and Spenser. All of his early work was derivative: the well-known poem, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," for example, was heavily indebted to his acquaintance with Thoreau's Walden. It was not until years afterward that he began, deliberately, to reshape his style by discarding traditional metaphors, employing looser rhythms, communicating emotion that he described as "cold." But for now there was nothing "cold" about his emotion. Very much under the influence of his father's belief that only passionate poetry is important, he filled his early lyrics with imagery and color, a heritage from the Romantic poets.

deals with the period between 1887 and the turn of the century. On the one hand this section is a record of his friendships during these years. Nearly all of the famous literary figures of the 1890's are here: W. E. Henley, Oscar Wilde, William Morris, Lionel Johnson, Ernest Dowson, Shaw, George Russell ("A. E."), John Synge, Arthur Symonds, Aubrey Beardsley, Max Beerbohm, William Sharp ("Fiona Mcleod"), Paul Verlaine—Yeats knew them all. On the other hand the section is a record of the coming to maturity of Yeats's own work and its chief importance is perhaps that it gives us insights into the development of his theories of poetry.

He did not forsake his interest in emotion, but he began to write poems combining personal feeling with larger patterns of myth and symbol. His interest in myth and symbol, an understanding of which is essential to an understanding of his mature poetry, led him into a series of esoteric studies. He was associated with the Theosophist, Madame Blavatsky; he experimented with the evocative power of symbols under the direction of Macgregor Mathers and later in conjunction with his uncle, George Pollexfen. He eventually realized that he had found only a variety of images. He had been searching for a tradition—for the centrality of a tradition—but he had hit upon its opposite: fragmentation.

Yeats envied Dante for having had a unified culture out of which to write. "Unity of Culture," a unity stemming from a universally accepted mythology, is precisely what, in Yeats's view, the modern world lacks. Symbolism he saw as the language of mythology. For years Yeats was occupied with the attempt to regain, in Ireland, that "Unity of Culture" which would make the language of symbolism intelligible. He hoped to find his mythology in peasant legendry. He hoped to encourage a national literature, one above politics and all temporal disputes, which would draw upon such a mythology. Finally he came to realize that his dream of a modern nation returned to Unity of Culture, was false. When this dream failed, he inevitably turned inward. Lacking a traditional mythology, he created one of his own, compounded from a complex variety of sources. He adopted myths and symbols from Christianity, from paganism, from the Orient, from Theosophy, and from Irish folklore. Perhaps his most important source was his own life: the people he knew became symbolic personages figuring in a private mythology. Consequently, as we read anecdotes about Synge, Lady Gregory, Maud Gonne, or John O'Leary, we come face to face with the real-life counterparts of some of the chief inhabitants of the "Yeats country."

In the third section of the Autobiography, "Dramatis Personae, 1896-1902," the chief "Personae" are Edward Martyn, Arthur Symonds, George Moore, and, above all, Lady Gregory. This section recounts the struggles of a small group of people to found in Ireland a native and national theater. But most of all it serves as Yeats's graceful and grateful tribute to Lady Gregory, his patron, collaborator, and friend. She encouraged him in his work and lent him money. Of even greater influence in the development of his art, as Yeats recalled years later, were the times he stayed at Coole, Lady Gregory's home, where Yeats spent the summers of twenty years. Among the trees and by the lake at Coole, Yeats was to do much of his greatest work, and the place itself, which he said he knew better than any spot on earth, became, like the people he knew, a familiar and important part of the world of his Collected Poems.

The Autobiography is far from being a complete account of Yeats's life. The first three sections cover the years 1865 to 1902, but Yeats was to live until 1939, and to do nearly all of his important work during the remaining years. Of the last three sections of the book, two ("Estrangement" and "The Death of Synge") are but fragmentary extracts from a diary Yeats kept in 1909. "Estrangement" is a collection of scattered and, at times, half-formed ideas about art, and is not, in the true sense of the word, autobiography. "The Death of Synge" is also largely a series of reveries about art; those reveries, in particular, which were induced by his friend's death. The final section of the book, "The Bounty of Sweden," (written in 1925), is a relaxed account of his trip to Stockholm in 1923 to receive the Nobel Prize.

CARRIE DONNER, her sister

MR. CASHMORE, Mrs. Donner's lover

LADY FANNY CASHMORE, his wife

LORD PETHERTON, Lady Fanny's brother and Mitchy's friend

The Awkward Age stems from that intensely experimental period at the turn of the century in which Henry James laid the groundwork for the major accomplishments of The Ambassadors, The Wings of the Dove, and The Golden Bowl. Coming as it does between What Maisie Knew, in which the point of view is restricted to that of a young girl, and The Sacred Fount, in which the point of view is that of a narrator for whom the actions of the other characters are the subject of endless but unconfirmable speculation, The Awkward Age is more technically dazzling, and possibly more enigmatic, than either in that James restricts himself almost entirely to dialogue and eschews, except for two or three very brief passages, his customary practice of "going behind," that is, of entering the minds of any of his characters. The effect is rather that of a lengthy closet drama (James admits in the preface that his model has been the roman dialogué of the French authoress Gyp), but a drama surpassing in subtlety, intricacy, and elusiveness anything heretofore written in that genre. With the help only of those few occasions when James renders Nanda's and Vanderbank's thoughts, and of a hypothetical spectator to whom James attributes hypothetical interpretations of tones of voice and facial expressions, the reader is left to infer, as the characters themselves do, the motivational and situational realities behind the labyrinth of the novel's conversation, or at least to register how the characters' own inferences bring about the events in which they participate.

The central characters of the novel are members of Mrs. Brookenham's "group," a select circle of sophisticated conversa-

tionalists for whom innuendo and the immediately perceived hinted nuance have become a style of life. Beyond mere talk—their lives reside so largely in their talk—is the prospect of what will happen to the group's tone, what restraints will be imposed, upon the admission into the drawing room of Mrs. Brook's marriageable but unmarried daughter, Nanda. Into this distinctly "modern" society comes Mr. Longdon, and the novel opens on a lengthy conversation between him and Vanderbank following the occasion of their having spent the evening—Mr. Longdon's first—at Mrs. Brook's. Vanderbank, who presents, it emerges, a remarkably handsome and imposing appearance, but whose means are hardly commensurate with the impression he creates, is taken with the older man who so charmingly contrasts with the tone he is accustomed to, and Mr. Longdon, despite misgivings about that tone—which finds its quintessence in Mrs. Brook—is similarly pleased. Mr. Longdon confides to Van that he has been a suitor to both Van's mother and Mrs. Brook's, Lady Julia, and that he has never forgotten his feeling for the latter, from whom her own daughter differs so radically. Upon seeing a picture of Nanda, Mr. Longdon exclaims on her similarity to Lady Julia. The conversation ends on Mr. Longdon's revealing that the conversational tone of the evening has indeed shocked him.

The next "act," so to speak (there are ten), presents us immediately with Mrs. Brook in colloquy with her son Harold, whom she catches in the act of stealing a five-pound note. Mrs. Brook is operating in her family mode, a studied and languorous melancholy quite at odds with her public performances, and her conversation turns on the problem of getting Harold invited to house parties (her son has obviously taken lessons in manipulation from her) and the family's financial straits. With Harold's exit and the entrance of the Duchess, the talk turns to Nanda, who is visiting her married friend Tishy Grendon. The Duchess chides Mrs. Brook for allowing her daughter to mingle with such questionable associates, whereas she, in the European manner, has carefully sheltered her niece, Little Aggie, from any such possible contaminations, has preserved her a perfect little tabula rasa until the time of her marriage. She then urges Mrs. Brook to snare Mitchy as a husband for Nanda; she adds that his ugliness and his being the son of a shoemaker render him totally unsatisfactory as a potential mate for Aggie, though she will shortly thereafter instigate a maneuver designed to land him for Aggie. After a brief conversation between Mrs. Brook and her husband, Mitchy and Petherton enter, and it is shown that Petherton is probably the Duchess' lover. Mrs. Brook attributes to Mitchy, despite his outrageous talk, a gentleness and "niceness" lacking in the rest of them, and her comment, sincere or not, will be borne out in the development of the novel. The Duchess re-enters, this time with Aggie, and when Carrie Donner's arrival is shortly followed by that of Lady Fanny, the talk turns to the erotic entanglements of the Grendon-Donner-Cashmore set, the Duchess informing Mitchy that it is Nanda who is her mother's source on the degree of intimacy between Mrs. Donner and Mr. Cashmore.

In the following scene Mr. Longdon, and the reader, are confronted for the first time with Nanda, whose resemblance to Lady Julia overwhelms Mr. Longdon. He and Nanda develop an immediate rapport.

Mrs. Brook sounds Van on the subject of Mr. Longdon's fortune and what he may do for Nanda, and in the same dialogue indicates that she is possibly in love with Van.

At a weekend party given by Mitchy, Mr. Longdon urges Nanda to marry, but she rejects Mitchy as impossible and confides to him that she will probably never marry. The Duchess tries to persuade Mr. Longdon to settle on Van a sum which will allow him to marry Nanda (thus leaving Mitchy, upon whom Mrs. Brook has designs for Nanda, free for Aggie), who is "as sick as a little cat—with her passion" for him. Mr. Longdon makes his offer to the uncertain Van, who requests time to consider the proposition and refuses to allow his prospective benefactor to name a sum.

In the ensuing conversation, Van reveals to Mrs. Brook Mr. Longdon's generous offer, which that lady—whether merely prophetically or in an attempt to determine his hand—enigmatically hints he will refuse. Mrs. Brook then, against Van's articulated wishes, imparts to Mitchy the information she has just gained and suggests that Van will pass up the chance to propose to Nanda rather than appear to accept a bride. She has, she says, made her revelation simply in accordance with that principle of openness and honesty which is so much the note of their society, and the scene concludes with the mutual bestowal of lavish accolade, somewhat undercut by Van's ironic awareness of the prevalent duplicity and the possible mixture of motive for Mrs. Brook's behavior. Nanda enters shortly after the departure of her mother's guests, and Mrs. Brook questions her about her relation with Mr. Longdon and broaches the possibility and advisability of his adopting the girl.

At Mr. Longdon's, Nanda approached Mitchy, whom she knows to be in love with her, and urges him, for his own sake and that of Aggie, to marry the Duchess' niece, thus effectually eliminating him as a candidate for her own hand. Mitchy, to gratify Nanda and to enjoy the only proximity of relation with her now open to him, that of simply being thoroughly together with her on the matter of Aggie, acquiesces to her promptings and reveals his intentions to Van, indicating that the way is now completely open to the latter. Van, however, remains uncommitted and indecisive. The conversation ends rather darkly on the question of what Mr. Longdon will do for Nanda should Van fail to propose.

The climactic scene of the novel occurs several months later at Tishy Grendon's, where all the principal characters are gathered. At this time Nanda has been Mr. Longdon's guest for several months; Harold has ably distracted Lady Fanny from her design to run off with another gentleman; and Little Aggie, after her marriage, has been divested with a vengeance of her innocence and has taken up with her aunt's lover, Petherton. Mrs. Brook, in a tremendous scene, demands Nanda's return from Mr. Longdon and forces the public exposure of the group, climaxing her performance with the revelation that Nanda has read a scabrous French novel lent to her by Vanderbank, and has even pronounced it unfit for the presumably far more experienced Tishy to read. The effect is to reveal to Vanderbank the depths of knowledge already open to Nanda, depths in the unveiling of which he has been instrumental but which, with cruel irony, render her an impossible choice for his wife. Mrs. Brook, who knows her Van all too well, has eliminated the possibility of losing him to her daughter.

The scene at Tishy Grendon's, however, has served to destroy the solidarity of the group, and it is only after months that Van returns to Mrs. Brook's, supposedly to see Nanda but ultimately avoiding the chance to do so, an avoidance which Mrs. Brook interprets as his finally having given Nanda up. This information she enjoins Mitchy to give Mr. Longdon, for, as she has explained to her remarkably obtuse husband, her purpose in creating the horrid scene at Tishy's had been simply to confirm Mr. Longdon's belief that she and her world were impossible for Nanda and to insure his taking care of the girl.

The final "act" occurs two weeks later, with the overwrought and embarrassed Van making what is presumably his final visit to Nanda. Nanda, however, lets the now awkward young man off easily by assuming the role of herself being in the false position, and she generously entreats him not to desert her mother, a plea she repeats to Mitchy in her next interview. Finally there is only Mr. Longdon, and before him she breaks down in the fullness of her suffering. It is Little Aggie whom Vanderbank ought to have married, they agree. Only that innocence could have met his measure, though an innocence capable of becoming its own obverse at the first taste of experience. Even under such a circumstance, however, Mitchy would still have been totally out of the question for her; it has been his fate, as it has been Nanda's, to love only that person for whom he is an impossibility. Around the suffering Mitchy Nanda's thoughts revolve as she prepares to be taken away the following day by Mr. Longdon.

Turning as it seems to on the question of a girl's reading a questionable book, The Awkward Age may appear to the superficial glance as a period piece, elaborate and elegant, but without the reverberating significance of James's three final masterpieces. To see the novel in this light, however, is to neglect its hard and lucid inquiry into the coexistence of moral vision and the knowledge of a world seemingly its antithesis. Little Aggie is innocent of such knowledge, but her innocence is the merest ignorance of that which she will become. Paradoxically, Nanda's knowledge, the superficial taint as opposed to the inward blight, of the world in which she is so thoroughly implicated, a knowledge which is perhaps instrumental in creating Nanda's moral dimension, renders her unacceptable to Vanderbank. And yet if Nanda's magnanimous vision can exist only in her retreat with Mr. Longdon from the world, there is a sense in which she too, by her pressuring Mitchy into marrying Aggie, has been implicated in the network of selfishness, guilt, and suffering which is perhaps the inevitable result of the brush of human contact.

Finally there is the pragmatism of the magnificent Mrs. Brook, the ability to make do in a world where one is unlikely to get what one wants. What Mrs. Brook wants is unquestionably Van. The book leaves the question moot whether they have ever been lovers, though most of evidence points to the fact that they have not. Her scene at Tishy Grendon's appears from one angle a wanton destruction of her daughter's hopes; yet, given her knowledge of Van's nature, a nature, it must be said, which contact with her has in no small measure formed, her seemingly brutal actions may just as well be motivated, as she explains to Edward, by a desire to provide, no matter how deviously, for a daughter who has no other chance, to ensure for her the opening of an escape from a world which has already left its mark. To acknowledge that the selfish desire to retain Van for herself enters Mrs. Brook's design is only to admit the necessary multiplicity of motive inherent in taking any course of human action. Mrs. Brook's motives are decidedly mixed—and her awareness of the fact is part of her limited triumph. She provides the only alternative, if a partially cruel one, to the very different satisfactions offered by renunciation.

AXEL'S CASTLE

Type of work: Literary history and criticism

Author: Edmund Wilson (1895-)

First published: 1931

The subtitle of this volume, which has by now become a minor classic in American criticism, explains the author's purpose: to write a "study in the imaginative literature of 1870-1930"; and the dedicatory note, addressed to Christian Gauss of Princeton, explains the author's conception of "what literary criticism ought to be," that is, "a history of man's ideas and imaginings in the setting of the conditions which have shaped them." The book is, however, more limited than the subtitle might seem to indicate; it is actually a history of the Symbolist movement that began in France and spread to England and finally to America. The writers to whom Wilson directs his attention are Yeats, Valéry, Eliot, Proust, Joyce, Gertrude Stein, and Rimbaud, although dozens of others are dealt with in greater or lesser detail.

The importance of the book becomes more apparent if the date of publication, 1931, is kept in mind, for we then realize to what an extent it was a pioneer work. In 1931, Proust, though certainly known in this country, was read by only a few, and most of the critical articles dealing with his novel were in French. Maurois' A la recherche de Marcel Proust did not appear until 1949. Joyce's Ulysses was still unprocurable in the United States, for the famous decision of Judge Woolsey that permitted its publication was two years in the future. Matthiessen's The Achievement of T. S. Eliot was still further off—1935. Rimbaud and Valéry were not, and still are not, much read in America. At the time Wilson was introducing a group of writers who were, for most readers, merely names, the exception being Yeats, and he was associated chiefly with The Land of Heart's Desire and a few early poems.

Wilson begins his history with a discussion of Neoclassicism in the eighteenth century, the era of the "geometrical plays of Racine and the balanced couplets of Pope." When this "conception of a fixed mathematical order" came to be considered as a constraint on the human spirit, we find ourselves in the Romantic period, at which time the poet, looking into his own soul, saw "fantasy, conflict, confusion," and yet considered this vision as a truth superior to the mechanistic view held in the eighteenth century. Then came the scientific discoveries of the middle years of the nineteenth century (the most famous of which Darwin described in On the Origin of Species), which reduced man from the heroic being constructed by the Romantic imagination to a mere animal among other animals. From this point of view arose the literary movement known as Naturalism, associated chiefly with the novels of Zola, which maintained that man was merely the product of his heredity and environment and that, therefore, the plot of a novel was as inevitable in its working-out as was a problem in mathematics. In poetry, there was in France the school known as the Parnassians, whose aim it was to write poems that were purely objective descriptions of historic events or of scenic effects. The imagination, as we perhaps loosely call it, was rigorously excluded by the Naturalists from the novel and by the Parnassians from poetry.

Edmund Wilson traces the course of the Symbolist school, which was perhaps an inevitable reaction against the impersonality of Leconte de Lisle and Hérédia, from its origins in the work of Poe—first translated into French by Baudelaire—to its full development in the hands of Mallarmé and Valéry. Its aim "was the poet's task to find, to invent, the special language which will alone be capable of expressing his personality and feelings." The need of symbols by means of which the poet can attain this objective is obvious; equally obvious is the danger that such symbols may become so private as to render the poem unintelligible. The poet is now talking to himself in his special language. From this time on, unintelligibility is the charge most commonly brought against poetry.

Wilson next discusses the individual writers already listed, although they draw further and further away from the Sym-bolist movement that was the start of the book. The early Yeats, of course, found a storehouse of symbols convenient to his hand in Irish mythology; he later added further items from his dabbings in cabalistic imagery. In the case of Eliot, Wilson shows his descent from a different branch of the Symbolist movement, that of Corbière and Laforgue, both of whom influenced the early work of the American poet. Then came The Waste Land in 1922, with its complicated and unfamiliar symbolism drawn from the Grail legends. As for Proust, Wilson considers him to have been "the first important novelist to apply the principles of Symbolism in fiction." With Proust we encounter the influence of Wagner, who, Wilson maintains, played as great a part in the history of this movement as did any poet. In Remembrance of Things Past the symbols are "characters, situations, places" used in an elaborate "symphonic structure" that takes the place of the narrative of the conventional novel. And the enormously involved Homeric symbolism of Joyce's Ulysses is, today, familiar to students of contemporary literature, though it was by no means familiar in 1931 when the only copies of the novel available were those smuggled into this country from France.

The reader of this book is constantly aware of Wilson's perceptiveness as a critic and interpreter of literature, his ability to untangle the skein of influences and cross-influences involved in the movement he is describing. Further, Wilson has always displayed great common sense; he was not so dazzled by the eminence of his subjects as to be oblivious of their shortcomings—the unnecessary elaboration of Ulysses, for example, or Joyce's use of technique for its own sake. Only in dealing with Eliot's Ash Wednesday did Wilson seem to go astray. Quite typically of the period, he could not accept the sincerity of Eliot's Anglo-Catholicism. It had to be "artificial" at a time, the early 1930's, marked by the high point of secular humanism in this country.

Last, but by no means least, the book is an example of the "old criticism" that in the best tradition of literary scholarship got its job done simply and directly without the use of a jargon so esoteric as to require a glossary for its comprehension. Axel's Castle is a clear, lucid, and important book, considered by some readers to be the best that Edmund Wilson has written.

BAAL

Author: Bertolt Brecht (1898-1956)

Time: c. 1911

Locale: Augsburg, Germany, and the surrounding region

First presented: 1926

Principal characters:

BAAL, a young poet

EKART, a composer, and homosexual friend of Baal

SOPHIE BARGER, a girl seduced by Baal

JOHANNES SCHMIDT, a friend of Baal

JOHANNA REIHER, Schmidt's fiancée, seduced by Baal

LOUISE, a waitress

MECH, a publisher

MRS. EMILY MECH, his wife, in love with Baal

DR. PILLAR, a critic

Baal, written in four days in 1918 but not produced until 1926, was Bertolt Brecht's first play. It is essentially a one-man play. Baal is a young, idolized poet driven madly through a short and tragicomic life by his insatiable passion for drink and for bisexual love. Its subject, said Brecht years later, is man's love of pleasure and his search for happiness.

Brecht's comment needs elucidation. His Baal does not represent man merely as hedonist. He is one of the archetypal figures to be found in literature and in life: the man who yields joyously to his inner drives, amoral and unconventional though they may be, while at the same time desperately trying to renounce this sort of existence and seek an idealized communion with nature and the powers behind nature. Earthy Baal aspires to spiritual ecstasy.

What the audience sees visually in Brecht's play is the earthy, sensual Baal—brandy in hand, perpetually in pursuit of young virgins. His drunken revels, rapes, and remorse provide the stage action as the setting shifts from bar to bedroom. What the audience hears, however, is the other Baal, the desperately aspiring young Baal. His yearning, poetic speeches comment at length, and too often, on the sky and stars, the river and the trees. Thus Baal represents man in conflict, wishing to glut himself with all worlds, all experiences, yet knowing and lamenting the impossibility of his desires.

By giving the name Baal to his focal character, Brecht has chosen to emphasize the sensual in this dual man. Baal was an ancient Semitic god of fertility. Especially because of Biblical associations, the name has implications of licentiousness and orgiastic religious rites. For its ultimately tragic ending Brecht chooses to make Baal a victim to this side of his dual nature.

In spirit the play has been influenced by Georg Büchner, the forerunner of German Expressionism, though critics insist that Brecht mocks the Expressionists in the play. Structurally and technically, the play is perfectly at home in the modern theater. It is not, for example, a "character study" in the traditional sense. Brecht is concerned with a stylized Baal, a man sharply divided between two aspects of his nature. Nuances of character and subtle shades of characterization are less his concern. Nor does Brecht try to integrate setting and time into the action of his play, in the traditional sense. He specifies a Black Forest locale and the year 1911, but this information is largely superfluous and irrelevant. Brecht is not concerned about the conventional division of a play into acts. His play has twenty-one loosely connected scenes, preceded by a musical prologue, the "Chorale of the Great Baal," a vigorous, bawdy ballad of fourteen quatrains sung by the full cast of Baal's assembled acquaintances.

The play is essentially a series of sharp vignettes, with the focus always on Baal, but with numerous satellite characters serving as friends, adulators, foils, and enemies. The action of the play begins with Baal's revelry and seductions and ends with Baal's killing of his closest friend Ekart and then Baal's death. The prologue is the one part of the play that harks back to old theatrical tradition. It sums up the action of the play and the character of Baal as fellow revelers tell how life was "when Baal lived with us."

Brecht remarked in 1926 that his play or "dramatic biography" was modeled on the life of a man who actually existed. This fact is a useful counterweight to the load of poetry and mythic overtones that Brecht makes the play carry.

The first two scenes at once reveal both sides of Baal. At a party in the first speech of the play he is offered a glass of wine. The conversation turns to praise of his songs and their great sense of life, and the scene concludes with Baal's earthy remarks to a publisher's wife. The wine-women-and-song motif thus briefly established, scene two replaces revelry with reverie. In Baal's attic room he lyrically tells a young friend, Johannes Schmidt, about the pleasures of love. The imagery is drawn from nature: holly tree, oranges, pond water, trees in the wind, coconuts. All the while Baal looks at the starlit sky through the window.

In succeeding scenes Baal's sense of life becomes more apparent. He appears first in a dive with a group of lusty and coarse teamsters to whom he reads his poems. Irresistibly drawn to pursue him here are a publisher's wife, Emily Mech, and Johannes' sweetheart, Johanna Reiher. Also attracted to him, but for homosexual purposes, is Ekart, a large, haggard fellow. He tells Baal to come away with him out into the roads and the sky and the forest, away from women.

At this point Baal's struggles with himself become clear and foreshadow the remainder of the play. Each of the competing alternatives has its vice and its virtue. Roaming away from society in the forests and rain with Ekart would be cleansing and invigorating, yet there is an abnormal relationship with Ekart involved. Daily dissipation with his legion of admirers in Augsburg would soon be physically ruinous, yet here is the exuberant vitality and the normal relationships that Baal has thrived on.

Deferring a commitment, Baal one April day seduces Johanna. Later on in the same day, two young sisters come to him to be seduced and he learns of Johanna's suicide. At evening, self-pitying and insatiable, he goes out and finds a virgin, Sophie Barger, to seduce.

Sophie is particularly useful as an opportunity for Brecht to display his comic talent. In mood the play moves from exuberance to despair, and Sophie is one of Brecht's devices for establishing the early exuberance. She is an amusing hypocrite who wants to be seduced but will not admit the fact. Baal's teasing establishes a comic peak which is not reached again in the play. When we encounter her next, in Scene Six, she has been with Baal for three weeks and has abandoned her hypocrisy in favor of natural and joyful eroticism.

We then see Baal as a hired singer in a cheap café. He is tired and bored with this restraint on his freedom. One evening he departs from the specified songs and bursts into obscene lyrics. Taking his guitar, he flees the enraged audience and the proprietor, and escapes through the washroom. Asocial Baal then goes off with his "brother," Ekart.

In the scenes that follow Baal continues his quest for varied experiences. Along with Ekart, he has nature, village farmers, and lumberjacks as his companions. He tricks the farmers into bringing their best bulls to town, on the pretext that Ekart wishes to buy one. The local pastor appears on the scene to chide Baal for his joke, and the fun at once collapses. This lapse into somberness continues in the scene with the lumberjacks. Teddy, one of Baal's friends, has died. Having worked for a while with these men, he is one of them, and together they mourn the death of Teddy. Baal, who had finished off Teddy's brandy while his friend was dying, is angered by their sanctimoniousness and tries to make them understand his own higher values. He tells them to look at the darkening sky and the trees.

Baal's own religion of nature and the following of natural impulses give rise to conflict in his mind and mood. He is torn once more between his desire for Sophie and his intense friendship for Ekart. So far he has kept faith with both; now the time has come when each demands his whole self. He leaves Sophie alone pleading as he goes off with Ekart to camp under the stars.

With Scene Thirteen we are reminded again that Brecht's method is to focus on vignette scenes rather than on character growth or action of cause and effect. Seven years have passed. New characters appear, a family of ugly, sick beggars, with ugly names. Baal and Ekart burst in upon them in a hospital tavern. There is wild talk, stimulated by Baal's champagne. Baal is reminded of the beautiful past and is told that the most beautiful thing of all is Nothing.

Such wisdom of madmen is uncomfortable to Baal and Ekart. Baal, after his quick and bittersweet glance into the past, turns from it and summons Ekart with the declaration that they will wash themselves clean in the river.

The next four scenes are set in nature—thicket, willows, hazel bushes, maple trees. These pastoral settings have the ironic function of foreshadowing death. Baal's desire for the cleansing river turns out to be in a sense his death wish.

In the thicket the movement toward final destruction states itself plainly as Baal makes his long-deferred commitment to Ekart. In the next scene, at night in the willows the dead Johanna haunts Baal. Then in the hazel bushes Baal makes one final seduction, quickly, unromantically, and mechanically. Under the maples Baal sings his newest poem: "Death in the Forest."

The play now moves rapidly to the fore-ordained tragic end. After eight years Baal's life comes full circle, and he returns to the barroom of Scene Three. He sees that all is decrepit, and his old acquaintances see that he himself is going to waste. He sings a pathetic song, lamenting his birth and his frantic life. In a sudden brawl he wounds Ekart. He flees into the forest and watches the vultures overhead waiting for him. One of the rangers seeking him for the murder of Ekart declares that Baal belongs to the animal kingdom. He finds refuge in a dirty log cabin among unfriendly drunken men. He has no identification papers. In the end he crawls out of the cabin, apparently to die friendless and alone.

There are times when the novels of Muriel Spark suggest a mildly hallucinated card game in which the dealer declares the trump suit only after the last card has been played and then proceeds to take in all the tricks. This is not to say that she cheats or ignores the rules of the fictional game she is playing, only that she adds to her picture of the world some element of unearthly surprise or presents her people from an odd angle of vision in order to throw an oblique light on the troubled condition of man and, since she is a Christian writer, on his relation to God or to the devil. All of her novels deal in one degree or another with the problem of faith: the grace with which men accept it or the ways by which they try to evade it. The result is a body of work which cannot be mistaken for that of anyone else writing today. Miss Spark is an original.

Satire is the literary climate in which her lively art appears to flourish best. But satire touched with fantasy or the supernatural is always a risky business. It demands, among other things, a sharp wit and a spirited style. There must also be sufficient involvement for the reader to make him go along with the game of pretense, and the story must make its point if he is to accept it as an insightful comment on the absurdities of the material world or the mysteries of the soul.

Miss Spark takes her risks deliberately. Her first novel, The Comforters, relied for much of its effect on ghostly presences and double identities; in one scene a character heard the clatter of the author's typewriter at work on the book. Robinson brought into congruous relationship such disparate elements as a desert island, a murder, and a spiritual dilemma resolved in a rather bizarre fashion. However, Memento Mori was the novel in which Miss Spark revealed to the fullest the audacity, altogether her own, which promises to become the guiding principle of her fiction. In this book Death is a disembodied voice on the telephone, calling a group of old people and reminding them that they must die; what this chilling fable offers is a contrast between the selfish, trivial concerns of these people's lives and the inescapable fact of their mortality. The Ballad of Peckham Rye brings to the pubs and rooming houses of a London suburb a devil incarnate, if not the devil in person, who provides the people of Peckham with opportunities to display mankind's natural capacity for error and evil. By means of devices such as these Miss Spark shows a critical and moral imagination at work among observations of the clutter and waste of the contemporary scene.

The Bachelors is more restrained. It contains no open struggle with otherworldly forces, whether of God or of the devil, and the only touch of the supernatural comes when a quack spiritualistic medium does, apparently, establish communication with the dead in an episode so briefly presented that it gives little weight to Miss Spark's swiftly paced and crowded narrative. In this novel her deus ex machina is bachelordom, the non-community of the unattached, uncommitted male. Here the bachelor's state is viewed as damnation, and for the ten examples she presents the writer provides an atmosphere of fearful reality. The lodgings in which they live, the pubs they frequent, the stores where they shop, their problems with meals, mothers, and girls—all are images of the private hells of loneliness and trivial self-preoccupation in which each revolves. This vision is one that the more discerning of her bachelors share with their creator. Matthew Finch, who is Irish, Catholic, and plagued by sex, says that one's duty is to marry, to choose between Holy Orders and Holy Matrimony. Anything else, and he speaks from experience, is an unnatural life for a Christian. Ronald Bridges, a graphologist disappointed, because he is an epileptic, in his desire to become a priest, claims that he is a confirmed bachelor, but at the end of the novel he experiences a vision of the bachelor's selfish and uneasy life on the fringes of society: seventeen point one bachelors to each of London's 38,500 streets, restless, awake, active with their bed partners, or asleep, all over the city.

In this non-community the solitaries try to find substitutes for solidarity and faith. Some, like Ronald Bridges, find another vocation. Others, like Martin Bowles, become social and moral hypocrites. Still others, like Walter Prett, revile the world out of drunken self-pity. A few, like Patrick Seton, prey on human credulity. Most, like Matthew Finch, simply struggle. His predicament is amusing but nonetheless real because he is trapped between spirit and flesh.

The uses to which Miss Spark puts her social outsiders are crafty and entertaining. Patrick Seton, the fraudulent medium, is charged with converting to his own needs two thousand pounds that Mrs. Freda Flower, a rich widow, had given him for the work of The Wider Community, a spiritualistic group. Mrs. Flower and another patroness of the circle, Mrs. Marlene Cooper, are already rivals for the place of leadership within the group, and the charge against Seton further widens the split. Mrs. Cooper sees in the division an opportunity to direct the Inner Spiral, a secret group within The Wider Community; Mrs. Flower hopes to bring the members under the influence of Dr. Mike Garland, a clairvoyant of notorious reputation, and his friend Father Sockett, another medium. Ronald Bridges becomes involved because he is the friend of Tim Raymond, Mrs. Cooper's nephew, and because as a handwriting expert he has been asked to testify to the authenticity of a letter forged by Seton. Other complications arise because Martin Bowles, who is also Bridges' friend, is the prosecuting counsel against Seton and Matthew Finch has fallen deeply in love with Alice Dawes, Seton's pregnant mistress. Through information innocently supplied by Matthew, Elsie Forrest, Alice's friend, is able to steal the letter from Bridges' lodgings. Meanwhile Garland and Father Sockett are also after the letter for reasons of their own.

Miss Spark handles this complicated material with customary skill and dash. Patrick Seton is convicted of forgery and sentenced to five years. Matthew will marry Alice. Ronald Bridges will continue to suffer the demoniac nightmares of his epileptic seizures. They are his cross, but because of them he has achieved a kind of wisdom and insight into the need of faith and the grace of compassion. This, one feels, is the meaning of Miss Spark's concluding paragraphs. But she is too much the artist to flog a thesis or to point a moral. Her people are good, foolish, sinister, kind. They exist larger than life, illuminative of life, because they are self-contained in a world where sin and salvation coexist in precarious balance. It is a world where a man must earn the right to share commitment to his fellows or to God. This writer handles serious matters with a light but sure touch.

All of Miss Spark's novels create an effect of wild improvisation. Actually the opposite is true. They have been carefully planned, cleanly structured, and lucidly styled. Few writers of the present time have a surer hold on the comic convention of the English novel which brings the fantastic and the real together in a coherent whole.

THE BELL

Author: Iris Murdoch (1919-)

Time: The present

Locale: Imber Court, England

First published: 1958

Principal characters:

MICHAEL MEADE, the owner of Imber Court and leader of the lay religious community

JAMES TAYPER PACE, an energetic settlement worker

CATHERINE FAWLEY, a girl about to enter a nunnery

NICK FAWLEY, her drunken, malicious brother

PAUL GREENFIELD, an art historian

DORA GREENFIELD, his restless, unhappy wife

TOBY GASHE, a young student

MOTHER CLARE, the abbess of Imber Abbey

Iris Murdoch has the habit of seizing upon her material with a grasp so vigorous and complete that she is capable of an amazing variety of effects—joy, farce, grotesquerie, wit, violence, tenderness—always with shrewd insight into the oddities and frailties of the human animal. The result is that her novels exhibit a kind of thoroughgoingness rare in contemporary fiction, where most writers are satisfied to present only a fragmented view of experience or to achieve a picture of life in one of its familiar but flattish aspects, such as social criticism, character painting, psychological analysis, symbolic context, or another of the well-charted courses that the novel has followed in the two-hundred-odd years of its history.

Because she is able to surround a subject rather than approach it, it is safe to say that Miss Murdoch is the only writer among her English contemporaries who could have written a novel as richly detailed, as complex in theme and symbolism, and, in the final analysis, as completely satisfying as The Bell. In the first place, the book is remarkable for its weaving in of fourteenth century legend, which brings medievalistic overtones of faith, damnation, and doom to the modern situation. Second, it is a novel of brilliant wit, a work in which the spirit of comedy presides, aloof and impartial, over the efforts of some earnest but misguided souls to find their way to the good life in a world where escape into a William Morris Utopia is no longer possible. Third, The Bell is an excellent example of the planned novel; themes and motifs appear early in the story, only to be dropped and later resumed, like the motifs of a fugue, with each development of the plot related by some recurring emotion or observation. And fourth, the novel is a work in which secondary and multiple meanings, reflected in imagery and symbolism, give the story its depth and weight of philosophical and moral seriousness.

If the real qualities of Miss Murdoch's art were not apparent in her earlier novels, the reason was that they seemed on the surface a form of academic entertainment, the kind of novel, in other words, that one might expect from a young woman of intellect and wit who lectured in philosophy at Oxford University. Also, in Under the Net there was a suggestion of Kingsley Amis and John Wain in her picture of a romantic-minded young man who finally comes to common-sense, if rather irreverent, terms with his cultural environment; the end result suggested a blend of English-bred existentialism and social satire. The Flight from the Enchanter fared little better. It was read and praised without real appreciation of the paradox it presented in the writer's handling of the problem of evil and the subtlety of her defense of God's ways to man. The Sandcastle was the novel which won for Miss Murdoch critical acclaim and public response. A gentler book than its predecessors, with fewer effects of the symbolic and the bizarre, it was no less rigorous as a study of the romantic idealist confronted by truth and forced to accept the responsibility it imposes. It is now apparent that through these novels Miss Murdoch was developing her command of humor, symbolism, character insights, and philosophical concept, qualities which in The Bell bring her into the front rank of her literary contemporaries.

The central situation of this novel reveals a mixture of the touching and the ridiculous. At Imber Court, a Palladian mansion located across the lake from Imber Abbey, which houses a group of Anglican Benedictine nuns, a group of social and spiritual misfits have set up a community of their own. Their reasons for withdrawal from the world are at least valid, a fact recognized by Mother Clare, abbess of the cloister of Anglican nuns, who says that there are many people in the world today who can neither live in it nor out of it. Soul-sick, they find no real home for their disturbed souls. The trouble is that the members of the Imber Court community represent the spiritual ruling caste which can neither take the world nor leave it alone, so that their withdrawal in search of happiness and peace ends in trivial gestures: a belief that to have flowers in one's room would be frivolous and debates on whether to sow seed by hand or to use a mechanical cultivator.

The leader of the ill-assorted group is Michael Meade, an unhappy, desperate man who had studied for the priesthood but whose sense of vocation failed when he discovered in himself a drive toward homosexuality. Other members include James Tapper Pace, a muscular idealist and a believer in the church militant, who had discovered his career and creed while founding boys' settlement houses in the East End slums; Catherine Fawley, a quiet, brooding girl who is about to become a novitiate in the nunnery; her brother Nick, a middle-aged, neurotic drunk whose emotional background is as ambiguous and disturbed as Meade's; Toby Gashe, an eighteen-year-old innocent whom Pace has brought to Imber Court for a few weeks of rest and meditation before he enters Oxford; a commonplace couple trying to salvage their marriage by contemplation and prayer; Paul Greenfield, a brutal antiquarian and art historian staying at Imber Court while working on the old Abbey records, and his wife Dora, who has joined her husband, whom she fears and hates, after becoming bored with the fun and games of marital infidelity in London.

The moral and physical dissolution of this community becomes involved with the plan to install a new bell at the Abbey. According to legend, in the fourteenth century one of the Imber nuns had taken a lover who one night broke his neck in a fall. Unable to discover the guilty nun through confession, the bishop charged with cloister discipline cursed the Abbey and its bell had flown from its tower and fallen into the lake. The Imber community believes that the new bell will give spiritual significance to their communal testing. Then the old bell is accidentally discovered by Toby Gashe and he and Dora plan to substitute it for the new bell that has been ordered, a design that has ridiculous and startling results when the two, in a passionate embrace within the old bell, cause the clapper to give off a clang that arouses the whole community. Their plan to effect a fake miracle, however, is not the act that destroys the community. The true villain is Nick Fawley, who manages to distort Meade's sincere liking for Toby into a more sinister feeling, so that Meade finds himself once more involved in the same torment that he had suffered years before in his relations with Nick.

Once the process of disintegration begins, it rapidly gains momentum as the characters explode in fits of anger, mystery, and melancholy among themselves. Nick, hoping to bring the community to ridicule, weakens the causeway and the bell again falls into the lake. His plan to frighten his sister out of her intention to enter the nunnery ends in her attempted suicide and later madness, a state brought on by her inherent neuroticism and her secret love for Meade. The community is dissolved, but not before Nick himself has committed suicide. As both destroyer and destroyed, Nick points to the underlying themes of this novel, the corruption of innocence and the burden of ancient guilt symbolized by the bell. Yet the situation has its survivors on the plane of moral perception: Michael Meade because the experience has taught him how one may best use his moral strength, Dora because she realizes that her earlier efforts to escape her pompous, sadistic husband were no escape at all and that she must now face up to the failure of her marriage.

The Bell is beautifully organized, dramatic in story, rich in symbolism, absorbing in ideas. There is no chilling intellectualism in Miss Murdoch's skillful handling of her moral theme, no difficulties in her use of image and symbol. Her book is firmly grounded in the realities of time and place, not in fine-drawn abstractions. It is a work of physical and imaginative reality by a writer who views life with passionate concern for man's mortality and humorous appreciation of his illusions.

THE BIBLE IN SPAIN

Type of work: Travel journal

Author: George Henry Borrow (1803-1881)

First published: 1842

Principal personages:

GEORGE HENRY BORROW, the narrator

ANTONIO BUCHINI, Borrow's servant and colporteur

MARIA DIAZ, Borrow's landlady and adviser

George Borrow labored in darkest Spain for nearly five years, from 1835 to 1839, as the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in printing and setting (with another agent) thirty thousand copies in Spanish of the New Testament, a book proscribed by the Index.

This remarkable achievement in the face of determined and unscrupulous opposition by the Roman Catholic hierarchy is more the background than the subject of The Bible in Spain, a detailed record of dangerous missionary work which begins and ends abruptly and is often a daily account of Borrow's travels. It is pervaded by his delight in his remarkably efficient grasp of Spanish, his stamina, his defiance of authority, and the individuals he met during "the most happy years of my existence," as he says in his preface.

Borrow was thirty-two when he went to Spain and forty when he published the book that launched his literary career. After twenty-nine years of roaming around England (sometimes with gipsies) and cultivating his linguistic abilities—at eighteen he knew thirteen languages, including Welsh and a gipsy dialect—in 1832 he found his vocation in being employed by the Bible Society to supervise the printing of a Manchu version of the New Testament in St. Petersburg and to arrange for its distribution across the Russian border into China. Tsarist opposition killed the project, but the efficient Bible Society decided that Spain was as good a field as China and conditions were favorable for its work there, for in the civil war then raging the monarchy was largely supported by English arms. A version of the Bible in Castilian had been printed by 1793; if this could be cheaply reprinted and widely distributed the work of the society would raise Spain to the level of Portugal, where Portuguese versions of the Bible were already in circulation.

In November, 1835, Borrow arrived in Lisbon on his way to Spain, a month after he had left Russia. His stay in Spain was broken by two visits to London, the first late in 1836, after his exploration of the official position in Madrid, when he returned for instructions; the second, when he fell ill in August, 1838, after nearly two years in Spain. He returned to Spain late in 1838 to carry on the work so energetically that growing clerical opposition finally defied the British ambassador and insisted that Borrow, his books, and the Society leave Spain in August, 1839. Borrow got most of his Testaments out and distributed some in Tangier before returning to England.

There he completed The Zincali: An Account of the Gypsies of Spain, which he had drafted while in Spain. He married a widow of comfortable means and settled down to the life of a gentleman author by writing The Bible in Spain. Its successful publication established his vocation and formed the narrative style and episodic structure he would use later in Lavengro and The Romany Rye. Embittered at the reception of these books, he confined himself thereafter to infrequent publication, generally translations or philology, with the exception of Wild Wales, which has more in common with The Bible in Spain than with his books on gipsy life and character.

Three things interested Borrow: eccentric characters, dangerous situations, and philological curiosities. In these preferences he exhibits his romantic nature, further shown in the supremely confident way he coped with all characters and situations; he warns the governor of the prison in Madrid that he is delighted to be incarcerated so that he can learn the argot of the thieves of Madrid; he visits the tombs of Fielding at Lisbon and Moore at Corunna and apostrophizes them as a true-born Englishman would; he goes all the way to Cape Finisterre to leave a Testament at the end of the Old World. The rapid succession of episodes and characters is indicated in the subtitle—"The Journeys, Adventures, and Imprisonments of an Englishman in an attempt to circulate the Scriptures in Spain"—and in the more than five hundred subheadings to each of the fifty-seven chapters. He arranges the incidents chronologically, helped by his journals and reports to the Society, although, as he says, "the greater part . . . has been supplied from memory." The result is that only his journeys are fully described. It took three months to print the first edition of five thousand copies of the Testament in Madrid in 1837, an event which, he observes, "could possess but little interest for the reader." All three periods in Spain involved exciting journeys, and these he records in daily installments, along with any general observations on politics, religion, language, gipsies, horses, inns, and roads. (For much of this material an index would be helpful and an annotated edition is essential to understanding the book.)

The first trip took twelve weeks, from November, 1835, to February, 1836, when with help from gipsies he crossed from Lisbon to Madrid via Badajoz. The wolves, robbers, and Jews he meets on the way equally fascinate Borrow. The British ambassador, to whom Borrow later dedicated The Zincali, helped him, as did highly placed friends who were impressed more with the commercial than with the military power of England and felt it was in some way connected with the free circulation of the Bible there. Borrow thought his way was clear when the Prime Minister verbally authorized his printing the Spanish Testament, but a week later that government was overthrown in riots Borrow observed from an upper window. He returned to London for instructions but by November, 1836, he was in Cadiz and four weeks later, after prospecting Seville and Cordova, he was in Madrid. The British ambassador, the Bible Society, and Borrow agreed that further delay for official permission would be wasteful; the Testament was edited and printed. Then began Borrow's most important period in Spain and his longest journey.

Borrow left Madrid with his faithful servant, a Greek named Antonio Buchini, on May 25, 1837; he was not to return until four months later, in the meantime covering about one thousand miles in the northern and northwestern provinces of Galicia, the Asturias, and Old Castile. During his journey he visited all the principal cities to establish depots of the Testament at the leading booksellers. On the whole he found they favored his plans, being of moderate, radical, or national sympathies, though he occasionally met government or clerical opposition and had trouble with the Carlist or rebel troops and with suspicious villagers. It is obvious that this was the kind of adventure Borrow loved; he was at heart a smuggler and he could indulge this longing in defying a worthy opponent on the highest moral grounds. Borrow, in fact, saw himself in personal combat with the Pope of Rome for the souls of the Spaniards. Furthermore, he was always on the move and he loved that gipsy way of life.

On his return to Madrid he was imprisoned, to the great embarrassment of the authorities and eventually of the priests, and his distribution of the Testaments, which he had by now produced in gipsy and Basque versions, was stopped. Nothing daunted, he seized the suggestion of his landlady, the remarkable Maria Diaz, and began selling his wares throughout the small villages in the Toledo and La Granja districts, some thirty miles from Madrid; at three reals (thirty farthings) he found numerous buyers, and he records selling twenty-five in half an hour and over five hundred in a week. Keeping up his supplies by smuggling in consignments was difficult, but he felt his labors amply repaid when he frequently observed the Testament being read to groups who had never heard it, or heard of it, before. He fell ill in August, 1838, and returned to England, but in January, 1839, he was back in Madrid to carry on his personal sales in the face of increasingly effective opposition. For the third time he changed his tactics and decided to sell on the streets of the capital. He had now discovered a flaw in his operations: the demand for Bibles, which were too bulky to print and distribute clandestinely, exceeded that for the New Testament, for much of the New is inexplicable except in the light of the Old, and neither was familiar to the Spanish people. He apparently acquiesced in the government seizure of all his stock and was thankful to get out of Spain with the remaining Testaments which he left at Gibraltar and Tangier. His "labors in the field" were now concluded.

It is impossible to estimate the value of Borrow's work in Spain. The most concrete and obvious achievement in this vivid record of his adventures there.

BIOGRAPHIA LITERARIA

Type of work: Intellectual autobiography

Author: Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834)

First published: 1817

Samuel Taylor Coleridge's Biographia Literaria begins as an account of the major influences on the development of his philosophy and his literary technique, but the total effect of the work is considerably less coherent than this plan would indicate. As he progressed the author apparently altered his purpose, and he discussed at considerable length intellectual problems of special interest to him and gave some of his standards of literary criticism with comments on specific works. In his opening paragraph he speaks of his work as "miscellaneous reflections"; the description seems appropriate.

The loose rambling structure of the Biographia Literaria accords well with the picture of Coleridge that has been handed down, that of a man of great intellectual and poetic gifts who lacked the self-discipline to produce the works of which he seemed capable. Charles Lamb and William Hazlitt both characterized him as an indefatigable and fascinating talker, full of ideas, and this trait, too, plays its part in the creation of the Biographia Literaria, which is, in essence, a long conversation, ranging widely over the worlds of poetry, drama, philosophy, and psychology. The lack of a tight organizational plan in no way prevents the book from being both readable and profound in its content; Coleridge's comments on the nature of the poetic imagination have never been surpassed, and his criticism of Wordsworth's work is still perhaps the most balanced and judicious assessment available, a model for all scholars who seek to form general views on the basis of close examination of individual texts.

In the opening chapter Coleridge pays tribute to his most influential teacher, the Reverend James Bowyer of Christ's Hospital, who insisted that his students learn to think logically and use language precisely, in poetry as well as in prose. Coleridge also discusses the poetry he preferred in the years when his literary tastes were being formed; he turned toward the "pre-romantic" lyrics of minor writers rather than to the terse, epigrammatic intellectual poems of the best-known of the eighteenth century literary men, Alexander Pope and his followers. At an early stage he developed sound critical principles, looking for works that gained in power through rereading and for words that seemed to express ideas better than any phrases substituted for them could, and he quickly learned to distinguish between the virtues of works of original ideas and the faults of those that made their effect through novel phraseology. He confesses, however, that his critical judgment was better than his creative talent: his own early poems, though he thought highly of them when he wrote them, left much to be desired.

The harshness of critics in his time is a recurrent theme throughout Coleridge's autobiography, and in his second chapter he ponders on the tendency of the public to side with them rather than with the poets, who are considered to be strange, irritable, even mad. Yet the greatest writers, Chaucer, Shakespeare, Spenser, and Milton, seem to him unusually well-balanced, and he suggests that the popular heresy results from the frustrations of the second-rate writer who pursues fame without real talent. These general comments are closely linked to Coleridge's sense of injustice at the vituperative attacks on him that issued regularly from the pages of the popular reviews, partly as a result of his association with Wordsworth and Robert Southey. The three poets were accused of trying to revolutionize, to vulgarize, poetry; they were avowedly interested in freeing poetry from the limitations of the eighteenth century poetic tradition. Coleridge denies that they deserved the abuses hurled at them.

After making some comments on the works of Wordsworth and Southey, Coleridge turns to a number of philosophical problems that fascinated him, questions of perception, sensation, and the human thought processes. It is this section of his work that provides the greatest difficulty for the uninitiated reader, for he assumes considerable familiarity with the works of German philosophers and English psychologists and mystics. He surveys the theories of Thomas Hobbes, David Hartley, Aristotle, Descartes, and others as they relate to problems of perception and of the development of thought through the association of ideas, and he assesses the influence of Immanuel Kant on his own philosophy.

Coleridge digresses from the complex history of his intellectual growth to describe his first literary venture into the commercial side of his world, his publication of a periodical called The Watchman. His attempts to secure subscriptions were ludicrous, and his project met with the failure that his friends had predicted; one of them had to pay his printer to keep him out of debtors' prison.

One of the most important periods in Coleridge's life was his 1798 trip to Germany, where he widened his knowledge of the literature and philosophy of that country. He returned to England to take a position with a newspaper, writing on literature and politics; he attacked Napoleon so vociferously that the French general actually sent out an order for his arrest while he was living in Italy as a correspondent for his paper. Coleridge evidently enjoyed his journalistic work, and he advises all would-be literary men to find some regular occupation rather than to devote all their time to writing.

Returning to his philosophical discussion, Coleridge lists several of his major premises about truth and knowledge. He is particularly concerned with distinguishing between the essence of the subject, the perceiver, and of the object, that which is perceived. Related to this distinction is the nature of the imagination, which Coleridge divides into two parts. The primary imagination is that power in man which perceives and recognizes objects; the secondary imagination acts on these initial perceptions to produce new thoughts: "It dissolves, diffuses, dissipates, in order to re-create."

Coleridge next turns to a presentation of his literary standards, referring especially to the Lyrical Ballads, the volume containing much of Wordsworth's poetry and some of his own. He tries to define poetry, pointing out that it has as its "immediate object pleasure, not truth," and that it delights by the effect of the whole, as well as of individual parts. In one of the most famous passages in the book he discusses the function of the poet who, by the power of his imagination, must bring unity out of diversity, reconciling "sameness, with differences; of the general, with the concrete; the idea, with the image; the individual, with the representative; the sense of novelty and freshness, with old and familiar objects; a more than usual state of emotion, with more than usual order; judgment ever awake and steady self-possession, with enthusiasm and feeling profound or vehement."

Coleridge applies these general tenets to specific works, analyzing Shakespeare's early poems, The Rape of Lucrece and Venus and Adonis to determine what in them reveals genius and what is the result of the poet's immaturity. He praises particularly Shakespeare's musical language and his distance from his subject matter, saying, with reference to the latter point, that the average youthful writer is likely to concentrate on his own sensations and experiences. Shakespeare's greatness seems to him to lie, too, in the vividness of his imagery and in his "depth, and energy of thought."

While he was closely associated with Wordsworth in the creation of the Lyrical Ballads, Coleridge does not hesitate to indicate the points at which he differed from his colleague. He takes issue most strongly with Wordsworth's assertion that the speech of low and rustic life is the natural language of emotion and therefore best for poetry. Coleridge stresses rather the choice of a diction as universal as possible, not associated with class or region, and he says that it is this kind of language that Wordsworth has, in fact, used in almost all of his work. He feels that in the preface to the Lyrical Ballads Wordsworth was, to a certain extent, exaggerating in order to make clear advantages of natural, clear language over the empty poetic diction of the typical poetry of the time.

Coleridge's comments on Wordsworth lead him to an extended attack on the practices of the critical reviews, whose commentary on his friend's works seems to him both biased and absurd. He ridicules the tendency of anonymous reviewers to offer criticism without giving examples to support their assertions; they hardly seem to have read the works they lampoon. So as to counteract their ill-tempered, inconsistent judgments he sets down his own views on Wordsworth's most serious flaws and his outstanding talents. He criticizes his "inconstancy of the style," a tendency to shift from a lofty level to a commonplace one; his occasionally excessive attention to factual details of landscape or biography; his poor handling of dialogue in some poems; his "occasional prolixity, repetition, and an edifying instead of progression of thought" in a few passages; and, finally, his use of "thoughts and images too great for the subject."

With these defects in mind Coleridge commends Wordsworth's work for the purity and appropriateness of its language, the freshness of the thoughts, the "sinewy strength and originality of single lines and paragraphs," the accuracy of the descriptions of nature, the pathos and human sympathy, and the imaginative power of the poet.

The major portion of the Biographia Literaria ends with a final assessment of Wordsworth's work. However, Coleridge has added, in order to give the reader a picture of his early maturity, a group of letters written to friends while he was traveling in Germany, containing amusing accounts of his shipboard companions, his meeting with the famous poet Klopstock, and some of his literary opinions. To show how little his critical standards had changed, he also included a long and devastating critique of a contemporary melodrama, Bertram, or the Castle of St. Aldobrand, an essay published just before the Biographia Literaria.

Coleridge's concluding chapter, as rambling in subject matter as the rest of the book, treats briefly the harsh critical reaction to his poem, Christabel, then turns to his affirmation of his Christian faith and his reasons for holding it. He makes no attempt to summarize his volume, which has presented a remarkably full portrait of his wide-ranging, questioning mind.

THE BLACK SWAN

Author: Thomas Mann (1875-1955)

The Black Swan is a slight work coming after the novels of vast and complicated design which marked Thomas Mann's later period—works such as Joseph and His Brothers, and Doctor Faustus. Its structure is that of the novella, the brief narrative form in which Mann worked so successfully in Tonio Kröger and Death in Venice. As he demonstrates in this and in the earlier stories, he does not need breadth to give his writing the effect of depth and insight.

In this novel readers familiar with Mann's work are likely to be reminded of Death in Venice, that wonderful short novel dealing with the dissolution of personality and with death in a plague-stricken pleasure resort on the Adriatic. Here Mann returns, but with different treatment, to the symbolism of his earlier tale. The Black Swan presents on several planes of meaning the writer's favorite themes of life and death, body and soul, nature and spirit, art and decay, love and death. At the same time his sense of ironic detachment and the deliberate parody of his style make this one of the most puzzling books of his career.

During the 1920's Frau Rosalie von Tümmler was living in Düsseldorf with her spinster daughter Anna and her teen-age son Eduard. Widowed for more than a decade, Frau von Tümmler had been the wife of a German lieutenant general killed in action in 1914. After his death she had retired to the small villa in Düsseldorf, partly for the beautiful parks in which she could indulge her love for nature. There she had many friends of her own age and older, and she believed her life quite happy. She had always been attractive to men, but as the time for her change of life neared she and Anna were drawn closer to each other. Anna, born with a clubfoot, had always been cut off from companions of her own age. She was an artist, an abstract painter. Rosalie was often dismayed by her daughter's canvases of mathematical or symbolic designs, but she always tried to understand what Anna was trying to express. On their walks together they had many long talks on nature and art. Sometimes Rosalie complained that nature was cheating her by taking away her function as a woman while her body remained youthful-looking and her mind as active as ever. Anna tried to convince her that body and soul would soon be brought into harmony by psychological changes following physical ones.

Rosalie was fifty when she hired Ken Keaton, a young American, to give Eduard lessons in English. Keaton was a veteran who had chosen to live in Europe after the war. Like most expatriates of his generation, he spoke of his own country as a place of shoddy materialism, a land which in its pursuit of dollars had lost all respect for the arts of living. His interest in Rhineland history had brought him to Düsseldorf, where he supported himself by tutoring the wives and children of well-to-do burghers.

Keaton brought a different spirit of youthfulness and vitality into the Tümmler household. Rosalie used to listen outside her son's room to the snatches of conversation and the bursts of laughter she could hear from within; after a time the young American was accepted as a friend of the family. Before long Rosalie realized that she was falling in love with the virile young man. Anna, watching what was happening, was greatly disturbed by this promise of her mother's autumnal romance, especially so when Rosalie announced triumphantly that nature had given her a second period of physical flowering by renewing her fertile cycles. Rejoicing in what she believed a miracle of rejuvenation, Rosalie refused to listen to her daughter's warnings.

Early in the spring the Tümmers and Keaton went on an outing to Holterhof Castle, a rococo structure not far from the city. Rosalie was pleased to show the young American the castle and the park, for in them had been preserved the spirit of earlier German culture. Keaton had brought some stale bread to feed the black swans on the castle lake. Rosalie took some of the bread and nibbled at it playfully while one of the giant swans hissed indignantly for his dinner. Later, in a secret alcove of the chilly, musty old castle, she threw her arms about the young man and embraced him. On the way home she decided that she would give herself to Keaton without reserve.

But she never offered him the gift of a renewed youth. That night she was taken suddenly ill and hurriedly removed to the hospital, where an examination revealed that she was suffering from a deadly cancer. Nature had played on her the cruellest of jokes—the signs of renewed fertility had been nothing more than the symptoms of coming death.

This story is simple almost to the point of banality. If The Black Swan were a book to be read for the story only, there would be little in it to command our attention. But Mann is never simple in that way. By manipulation of symbols and repetition of key words and phrases that linger in the memory like motifs in music, he gives his narrative more than one level of meaning. Here ambiguity enters. In one sense The Black Swan is a fable of the way in which the creative spirit often dies, its late-flowering resurgence often no more than a prelude to death. But the symbolism of death and decay points also to an interpretation of Rosalie as twentieth century Europe, an aging continent weakened by disease from within but finding in the symptoms of its corrupted state an urge to self-destructive vitality. Images of death are everywhere apparent in the novel: in the picture of the black swan stretching its wings and hissing for the stale crust that Rosalie withholds, in the decaying ancient castle mouldering with damp where Rosalie declares her love for the young American, in the corpse of the small animal that Rosalie and Anna find during one of their walks.

In Tonio Kröger the leading character remarks that if an idea possesses you, you find it all about you, so that you can even smell it. The Black Swan creates its atmosphere of the charnel house in its sensuous effects. Beginning as the story of a sentimental matron absorbed in her deep love for nature, the novel is one in which the atmosphere surrounding the characters grows almost suffocating as the situation unfolds; and what seems at first a light, playfully humorous parody of the eighteenth century sentimental style becomes grotesque, almost diabolical, when we realize the contrast between the story that is being told and the manner of its telling. The book becomes a caricature, a brutal exposure of modern attitudes and failings. Perhaps Mann's intention was better illustrated in the original German title of the book—Die Betrogene—The Deceived. For the novel is a study of deception and self-deception, of betrayal and death.

In spite of its disturbing and sometimes repellent details and somberness of vision, The Black Swan is a miniature work of art. Thomas Mann wrote it at an age when most writers are content with the place they have won by their performances in the past. Yet here the hand of a master is still apparent. Though the novel has been written in a diminished tone, it probes deeply into areas of the strange and the perverse for its reflection of an age divided between the opposing forces of nature and the spirit.

THE BOOK OF THE COURTIER

Type of work: A treatise on manners

Author: Baldassare Castiglione (1478-1529)

First published: 1528

Principal personages:

LADY ELISABETTA GONZAGA, Duchess of Urbino

LADY EMILIA PIA, her witty friend and attendant

COUNT LEWIS (LUDOVICO) OF CANOSSA,

SIR FREDERICK (FEDERICO) FREGOSO,

LORD OCTAVIAN FREGOSO,

LORD JULIAN (GIULIANO) DE MEDICIS,

M. BERNARD BIBIENA,

LORD GASPAR PALLAVICIN, and

PIETRO BEMBO, Italian noblemen, courtiers to the Duke of Urbino

FRANCESCO MARIA DELLA ROVERE, heir to the Duke of Urbino

Baldassare Castiglione's The Book of the Courtier was one of the most widely read books in sixteenth century Europe. Noblemen and poets looked upon it as a portrait of the ideal man of the Renaissance, and such men as Sir Philip Sidney are said to have modeled themselves on Castiglione's imaginary courtier.

The book, the account of several evening's conversation at the court of Guidobaldo di Montefeltro, Duke of Urbino, is a fascinating record of the life there. In the first part, after an introduction and some scene setting, the Duchess, Elisabetta Gonzaga, asks the gentlemen of the court to choose a topic of conversation for the evening's entertainment. They settle on "what belongeth to the perfection of Courtiership," and Lewis, Count of Canossa, begins the discussion.

His ideal courtier must be, he says, nobly born, with a pleasant disposition, wit, and "a comely shape of person and countenance." Since his chief profession is to be a soldier, he must have training in all the skills that will make him an able warrior for his prince: riding, handling weapons of all sorts, wrestling, swimming, and other sports that increase strength and agility. The courtier also needs certain social talents, easy conversation, wit, the ability to dance, and, above all, a certain "grace" that makes all his activities seem effortless and unconscious.

The conversation turns to language, a burning issue in the Renaissance when the vernaculars were struggling with Latin for supremacy. The Count recommends that the courtier avoid using antiquated or unfamiliar words and that he take his vocabulary from those familiar Italian words "that have some grace in pronunciation." Sir Frederick Fregoso argues that the Count depends too much on custom; the courtier should shun the "vices of speech," though they have been adopted by the multitude. The Count concludes the argument by stating that it is the courtier's knowledge, rather than his diction, that is ultimately important. The first evening's conversation ends with a brief consideration of the importance of a courtier's having some skills in music and art.

On the second night Sir Frederick Fregoso is instructed to discuss the proper times and places for the courtier to exercise those virtues that have been declared essential for him. He points out that most of all an ideal gentleman needs discretion to determine when to speak, when to be silent, how to act so as to win praise and avoid envy. Fregoso recommends "little speaking, much doing, and not praising a man's own self in commendable deeds." He cites as a bad example an uncouth courtier who on one occasion entertained a lady with a description of his prowess with a two-handed sword and terrified

All courtiers are expected to be able to entertain ladies gracefully, and the ability to sing can be a particularly valuable accomplishment. Sir Frederick notes that a gentleman must have the wisdom to recognize that point in his life when his age makes it ludicrous for him to perform in public; if he must sing, let him do it privately.

This point leads to a general consideration of the proper demeanor for the young and the old. Fregoso praises mildness, deference, and hesitancy on the part of the fledgling courtier, but he suggests that the more restrained older man strive for a little liveliness. A golden mean is the ideal.

After a serious discussion of the value of friendship with loyal, honorable men, Sir Frederick turns, at the request of the cynical Lord Gaspar Pallavicini to a consideration of court entertainments. In this area, too, Fregoso pleads for moderation; too great a concern with dice or cards can become a vice, and a man may waste the better part of his days in becoming a brilliant chess player. The best entertainment comes from a courtier's wit, as Castiglione shows by weaving into his narrative a number of anecdotes and "merry pranks." M. Bernard Bibiena, who tells many of the witty tales, cautions the company to be mindful of the time, the place, and the individuals in jesting; maliciousness and cruelty should have no part in court life.

At the end of the second part the conversation turns to the character of women, whose honor and trustworthiness are wittily attacked by Lord Gaspar and defended by the Lady Emilia; this sparing couple has been considered Shakespeare's inspiration for Beatrice and Benedict in Much Ado About Nothing. Lord Julian de Medicis is instructed to fashion an ideal court lady for the next evening's amusement.

men asserts that "no court, how great soever it be, can have any sightliness or brightness in it, or mirth without women, nor any Courtier can be gracious, pleasant or hardy, nor at any time undertake any gallant enterprise of Chivalry, unless he be stirred with the conversation and with the love and contentation of women."

Lord Julian wants for his ideal woman sweetness, tenderness, and womanliness, a pleasing disposition, noble birth, and a certain amount of beauty; she needs the same virtues of courage, loyalty, and discretion that the courtier requires, and her position, too, may be enhanced by pleasant conversation and modesty. She should avoid that common feminine failing, a fondness for gossiping about other women. The ladies, as well as the gentlemen, of the court need some skill in the arts, so that they may dance, sing, or play musical instruments with ease. Lord Julian would have the court lady at least acquainted with literature and philosophy.

Lord Gaspar, who has injected anti-feminist sentiments throughout Lord Julian's discourse, scoffs at the notion of educated women and proclaims that the sex is an imperfection in nature. Lord Julian counters by enumerating those qualities in which he finds women superior to men and by relating the stories of famous women in history.

Sir Frederick asks Lord Julian to consider what he feels most important for women: "what belongeth to the communication of love." The latter answers that a lady must first distinguish between true and false protestations of affection. A good Christian, he can approve only of love which can lead to marriage. To the objection that an aged, unattractive, or unfaithful husband might justify favors to a lover, Lord Julian replies: "If this mishap chance to the woman of the palace, that the hatred of her husband or the love of another bendeth her to love, I will have her to grant her lover nothing else but the mind; not at any time to make him any certain token of love, neither in word nor gesture, nor any other way that he may be fully assured of it."

The fourth part opens with a brief reflection on mortality, as Castiglione relates the fates of members of the court of Urbino during the years between the nights he is describing and the time he completed his book. He turns then to the topic of the final evening's discussion, the courtier's role as adviser to his prince. Lord Octavian Fregoso points out that this role is often made difficult by the arrogance and pride of rulers, who consider that their power automatically confers wisdom. The courtier must lead his prince gently and subtly toward goodness, courage, justice, and temperance, mingling moral instruction with pleasure, one justification for his acquiring skills in the "polite arts." Lord Gaspar questions Fregoso's basic premise, that virtue can be taught, but the latter affirms his conviction that if moral virtues were innate, man would never become evil. Morality is acquired, rather than inborn, and education is therefore of inestimable value.

The discussion shifts to government itself, and arguments about the relative value of the kingdom and of the commonwealth are weighed. The group concludes that the rule of the virtuous prince, a man attuned to both the active and the contemplative life, is best. Lord Octavian suggests that a council of the nobility and a lower advisory house chosen from the citizens of the land might increase the virtue and knowledge of the prince; such a government would combine the best aspects of monarchy, aristocracy, and the commonwealth.

The Book of the Courtier concludes with a famous and highly influential passage, Pietro Bembo's discourse on Platonic love. The passions of youth are unfitting for the older courtier; he must recognize that all love is, in fact, a yearning for beauty, and he must raise his thoughts from admiration of a single lovely woman to contemplate the idea of beauty. Purified of his human faults by this contemplation he can reach "the high mansion place where the heavenly, amiable and right beauty dwelleth, which lieth hidden in the innermost secrets of God." Bembo's discourse becomes more and more enraptured, and when he breaks off at last the others realize that it is daybreak. The book ends as the courtiers and ladies disperse for the last time.

There is, perhaps, no finer or more appealing picture of life in the Italian Renaissance than that in The Book of the Courtier. Castiglione had a brilliant dramatic gift that enabled him to bring to life his friends at Urbino and to express their ideals clearly and powerfully in his natural, rapidly moving dialogue.

THE BOROUGH: A POEM IN TWENTY-FOUR LETTERS

Author: George Crabbe (1754-1832)

Locale: An English seaport

First published: 1810

Principal characters:

PETER GRIMES, a fisherman

ELLEN ORFORD, a pauper

SWALLOW, a grasping lawyer

BLANEY, an inhabitant of the Alms-House

THE MAYOR OF THE BOROUGH

THE VICAR OF THE PARISH

A BURGESS, who writes the Letters

George Crabbe was a writer of provincial background who had made good in the capital by using his provincial material. His initial success in London with

The Library, published in 1781, made it possible for the son of a fisherman and petty customs officer to enter the Church in 1782 and be given a respectable living as an Anglican clergyman. He gave up poetry after The Newspaper, in 1785, and did not resume writing until he began publishing again in the 1807 Poems. In the decades between his two periods of composition much had changed in English poetry, and Crabbe's continuation of his original style and matter makes it difficult to place him in the Romantic Period.

He was really the last and best representative of the host of adventuring, provincial poetasters who flocked to London to make their fortunes in the eighteenth century—Chatterton, Goldsmith, Mallet, Samuel Johnson, to name but a few. This is to repeat a truism in Crabbe criticism—that Aldeburgh, where he was born, is all his material—but it also places Crabbe in literary history and shows his strength, and perhaps accounts for his durability; the most obvious manifestation of that would be the present Aldeburgh Festival and Benjamin Britten's opera, Peter Grimes, derived from Letter 22 of The Borough.

The Village, published in 1783, and The Borough contain and are contained by a seaside community in which the folk are at the mercy of the elements, their only salvation against bad times being native prudence. In their world no help comes from the outside, only temptation and danger. Despite his absence from Aldeburgh after the age of twenty-six, Crabbe was unable to forget youthful privation and misery by adopting a tourist's attitude to provincial society and nature, an increasingly common mid-Victorian attitude of which Balmoral is the symbol. Few of his heroes and heroines have private incomes, and if caught in a storm at sea they are more likely to perish than to find themselves washed up on the sand.

Crabbe's realism was reinforced by parish duties; it is not the pessimism of which his mid-Victorian and Romantic critics accused him. Today we appreciate the salt in his stories more than the sugar in the work of other poets writing at the same time as Crabbe but equipped with a less immediate experience of people and place. His second importance in the history of English poetry is the fact that he casts a shadow beside the major figures of his second period and prepares the narrative form in English poetry for the genre work of Tennyson's Idyls of the Heath, Browning's Men and Women, and Hardy's local-color sketches in verse. In the early years of the nineteenth century Crabbe's work was paralleled in prose by Maria Edgeworth's Irish Castle Rackrent and John Galt's Scottish Annals of The Parish, rather than the country novels of Jane Austen. All the foregoing is summed up in Crabbe's best known line from The Village—"I paint the Cot, As Truth will paint it, and as Bards will not"—and illustrated in The Borough, the most unified of his works.

To "paint the Cot" Crabbe used the pentameter couplet, a meter noted for its wit and music and not for the narrative use to which Crabbe put it; that The Borough is made up of twenty-four letters or "epistles" to some extent restricts the narrative and encourages general observation, conventional in the eighteenth century verse epistle. In place of wit and music Crabbe relied on rugged and compact language which reflects that of his characters, especially the bourgeois who is supposed to be writing the letters. The most tiring feature of the succession of couplets is the regular placing of the caesura, which makes too obvious the antithesis and balance which supports the lines:

Then he began to reason and to feel
He could not dig nor had he learn'd to steal;
And should he beg as long as he might live,
He justly fear'd that nobody would give:

Crabbe arranged the letters in a certain order, preceded each with a curt prose Argument, added a long Preface, and subscribed a brief Envoi. After the "General Description" of Letter I Crabbe arranges his aspects in the proper order, beginning with the most important person in the Borough and its center the Vicar and his church, but concluding with the schools. His arrangement falls into two major divisions, the provident and the improvident, of the adult world, with the children bringing up the rear. The provident come under three headings or activities in order of importance: religion, work, and play; the improvident are divided into those in the almhouse and hospital and the poor outside parish relief, with a final letter on those in prisons. Seven of these letters narrate the miserable histories of those in or out of the almshouse. Within each of the three sections of the first division Crabbe also observes a declining order of importance: after the church and the Vicar have been described, Crabbe turns to the "Sects and Professions of Religion" which he defends at length in his preface as a strong but essentially true picture of the "Calvinistic" and "Armenian" Methodists who so disturbed the parson and his church, as Crabbe knew from bitter experience. The professions of law and physic are followed by the "Trades." The third section begins with "Amusements," followed in descending order by "Clubs and Social Meetings," "Inns," and "Players," which last leads straight down the path of destruction to the whole division on the improvident. The strength of this latter division is the seven narratives, but many readers will prefer for the extraordinarily vivid scenes briefly sketched in the letters of the first division, especially those in "Elections" and that on the "Players," which include brief vivid portraits, such as that of the lawyer, Swallow, who lives up to his name.

Crabbe's Preface, like his Arguments, outlines what is to come in each letter but also deals with the work as a whole. The whole scheme of The Borough is that Crabbe has apparently written to "an ideal friend," a burgess in an unnamed large seaport, asking him to describe his borough, and the letters sometimes begin with a brief question which the correspondent answers. Crabbe then admits that the resulting picture of the Borough is uneven but the envoi provides the answer:

Man's vice and crime I combat as I can, . . .
(The giant-Folly, the enchanter-Vice)
. . . I point the powers of rhyme,
And, sparing criminals, attack the crime.

Here the country parson drops his mask and admits that he is preaching one of his regular sermons to encourage industry and thrift and avoid the enticements of riches and city life. Most of the Preface, including the long passage on the Methodists, is taken up with apologizing for the satire of religions, professions, and amusements in the first division and for the repetitious falls from fortune in the second. An exception is Letter XX, "Ellen Orford," which ends in resigned piety. Crabbe's justification is that of "fidelity," that he did know such a person or instance, as when in Letter V he cites a rich fisherman who had never heard, until a friend told him, of the practice of lending money at interest, with this result:

Though blind so long to interest, all allow
That no man better understands it now: . . .
Stepping from post to post, he reach'd
the chair,
And there he now reposes—that's the mayor.

Crabbe is the bard who will paint his Borough "as Truth will paint it," and in the envoi to Letter 24 he looks forward to his readers' reaction:

"This is a likeness," may they all declare,

"And I have seen him but I know not where. . . ."

It is sometimes difficult to see the "likeness" in the seven narratives of the poor and the almshouse because they all seem to decline with celerity into remorse and destitution, but it may be that time has removed such objects from what must have been Crabbe's daily observation both as a boy in Aldeburgh and as a country parson. Certainly the most surprising decline is that of Peter Grimes, which is at the same time the most convincing, partly because in this account Crabbe uses nature to much greater effect than in the other narratives. More than nature, society is his object, and especially the quirks of character and turns of fate in family histories well known to those who stay long in any place. If Crabbe seems to relish the misery and vice exhibited in the citizens of his borough, he is adopting what is often the provincial's revenge against his native town: a scarifying of its mean soul and low manners in gripping detail. This is not the whole effect of The Borough, but what there is marks it as a forerunner of the supremely provincial novel, James Joyce's Ulysses.

THE BOSTONIANS

Author: Henry James (1843-1916)

Time: The early 1870's

Locale: Boston, Massachusetts; New York City

First published: 1886

Principal characters:

OLIVE CHANCELLOR, a Back Bay woman of modest means

MRS. ADELINE LUNA, her sister

BASIL RANDOM, her cousin from Mississippi, who marries Verena Tarrant

VERENA TARRANT, Olive's protégée, a platform prodigy

"DOCTOR" SELAH TARRANT, a mesmeric healer, Verena's father

MRS. TARRANT, the daughter of Boston Abolitionists, Verena's mother

MISS BIRDSEYE, a veteran of New England reform movements

DR. PRANCE, a woman doctor attending Miss Birdseye

MRS. FARRINDER, a campaigner for women's rights

MRS. BURRAGE, a New York society hostess

HENRY BURRAGE, her son, a Harvard undergraduate who courts Verena

The Bostonians is the longest of James's novels in an American setting, and in spite of his later dissatisfaction with its middle section or the high promise given to the unfinished The Ivory Tower, it is his most important fictive statement on America. The name and setting of the novel are significant; two other American novels, Washington Square and The Europeans, are set in New York City and Boston respectively; The Bostonians begins in Charles Street and ends in the Music Hall in Boston, but its second half begins in New York, which James always claimed as his native city. James had difficulty selecting the title but when he had settled on The Bostonians he knew it was an exact description of the contents and of his meaning.

The best commentary on the work is found in James's preface to the New York Edition; its significance in James's American canon is discussed by F. O. Matthiessen in his introduction to The American Novels and Stories of Henry James. James had several times tried to clarify his famous passage, in his life of Hawthorne, on what America offered and lacked in respect to the novelist. By his experience James himself was limited as an American novelist, and The Bostonians was his attempt to write on a subject that was at once local and typical, a local manifestation of a national trait. James naturally chose that distinguishing feature of American life, the American woman, whose novelty he had presented in Isabel Archer and other heroines. The locality was the Boston he knew of in the early 1870's and the New York he lovingly introduces in the novel. For his purpose, more important than the locale of Boston was its atmosphere of exhausted triumph after abolition and the hectic pursuit of new reform movements, especially that of women's rights. James's general distaste for the reformers if not for their proposals may be sensed in his portraits in the novel.

The "Bostonians" may be variously identified as one, two, or more characters, but the term, used only once, refers to Olive Chancellor and Verena Tarrant. Although James referred to Verena as the "heroine," the true "Bostonian" is Olive, the embodiment of the clash between discrimination and indiscriminating action in Boston of the 1870's. Destined by nature and appearance to be a "New England Nun," she becomes in the very last paragraph of the novel a Boston battler, haranguing a capacity crowd in Boston's largest auditorium in place of Verena, who has in the nick of time been carried away by Basil Ransom to meet her proper destiny as his wife. These three play out an ironic and psychologically penetrating form of the eternal triangle.

James seems to approve Verena's fate, largely because she is unawakened throughout almost the whole novel; she remains a pretty young girl with no mind and of little interest to James. Basil Ransom is a Mississippian trying to revive the family plantation by practicing law in New York; he does not have ideas (until he begins to write reactionary articles)

but lives by a code: everyone must do his or her work well in one's appointed station in life. When he tries to express this idea to Verena as they sit in Central Park, she is horrified and fascinated because there is no "Progress" in his code. But in the end Basil and Verena pair off as a fairly normal couple. What Mississippi was to make of Verena would have made a superb sequel to this work, but James did not know the South, and treats it simply as the last reservoir of acceptable masculinity from which he plucks his necessary hero.

Olive Chancellor was much more in James's acquaintance. With no other family ties except those to her sister, Mrs. Luna, comfortably settled in Charles Street, she had time, intelligence, taste, and money which she diffused quietly through twenty committees and reform groups. She is the very portrait of a Boston lady; her tragic flaw is to allow her desire for real action to overrule her taste: she falls in love with Verena's sweet stream of humbug as Basil falls in love with Verena's voice. This is not wholly Olive's fault, as is shown by the gallery of Bostonians introduced at the suffragette party in Miss Birdseye's tasteless apartment at the beginning of the novel. The two male Bostonians are a hack journalist and "Doctor" Selah Tarrant, a mesmeric healer and a fake not only to Basil's eyes but also to those of Dr. Prance, a woman doctor who is really active in her role of "new woman" and who has little time for talking about the subject. As the real and fake doctors are contrasted, so is Dr. Prance contrasted with the suffragette campaigner, Mrs. Farrinder, who is not a Bostonian and who is also suspicious of Tarrant and his Verena's "inspirational" views. Mrs. Farrinder's weak husband shows what men will amount to and what Basil fights against in the new regime, and Mrs. Farrinder herself, in thinking that talk will achieve the revolution Dr. Prance quietly demonstrates, shows what Olive could and possibly does degenerate into.

Also ranged about Olive in contrasting positions are the other three Bostonians. Mrs. Luna is completely worldly and contemptuous of any womanly activity but that of the salon. Equally worldly but totally vulgar is Verena's mother, who urges her daughter to accept Olive's impulsive invitation to visit Boston. Verena's visit ends in her staying with Olive and becoming the latter's protégée instead of "Doctor" Tarrant's prodigy: Olive pays the Tarrants to keep away from Verena.

The last and best of the Bostonians is Miss Birdseye, James's favorite creation in the novel. At the age of eighty she is still a compulsive reformer in a completely selfless and ineffectual manner which contrasts with the practical Dr. Prance and Mrs. Farrinder, and with the worldly creatures of Boston and New York. She appears only three times in the novel: at the initial party which introduces most of the characters; when she plays the part of destiny in giving Ransom Verena's Cambridge address, under the impression he is interested in the movement for women's rights; and at Olive's summer cottage, at Marmion, where she dies happily, mistakenly believing that Verena has enlisted Ransom in the cause. She stands for Boston's true nature, which Olive ignores in trying to achieve a triumph through Verena.

In the second part of the novel Olive compounds her failure of discrimination by accepting the invitation of Mrs. Burrage, a New York society hostess, to show off Verena in New York; Olive thinks she has triumphed in securing Verena's promise not to marry and in diverting young Henry Burrage's attentions from Verena. Olive thus overreaches herself at the same moment and in the same way as Verena: Olive's initial mistake was to invite Ransom to Boston; Verena invites him to the Burrage evening party, partly as a result of his seeking her out in Cambridge. She thinks she is working for the cause, but she is shown as very slowly awakening to her love for Ransom, which precipitates the catastrophe.

Verena is the fulcrum of the plot, and her affection first for Olive, then for Ransom, is reflected in the structure of the novel. The first twenty chapters contain four scenes: Olive's dinner with Basil, Miss Birdseye's party that night, Basil's call on Olive and Verena the next morning, and some months later a tea party at the Tarrants for Olive and, as it turns out, Henry Burrage. This first half concentrates on Olive's developing affection for Verena. But Verena is incapable of decision or action and in the second half of the novel, as Basil Ransom takes the center of the stage, she gradually falls under his influence. Four principal settings are employed: Cambridge, where Ransom visits Verena; New York, the scene of Mrs. Burrage's party and the discussion between Verena and Basil in Central Park; Marmion, where Olive's cottage is the scene of Miss Birdseye's death and Olive's looming defeat in the suit Basil Ransom presses on Verena; and Boston, where in the anteroom of the Music Hall on the evening of Verena's first public appearance Basil finally defeats Olive and carries off Verena as most of the remaining cast make a final appearance—the Tarrants, the Burrages, the Farrinders.

Throughout the novel the characteristic devices of James's late middle style are apparent: lengthening paragraphs, alternating direct and indirect colloquy, the use of idiomatic terms to carry nuances of meaning. More obvious, especially in the dramatic close, is the growing dependence on set scenes to show the stages of the drama. Over all these is the play of James's irony and pity directed at the latter-day Bostonian, Olive Chancellor, the local representation of a national type and the heroine of this distinctly American tragedy.

James Boswell left his family at home near Edinburgh in the autumn of 1762 to spend the winter in London, where he hoped to obtain a commission in the Guards. He was convinced that the military life, which would allow him to live in the city he loved so much, would suit him far better than the legal profession chosen for him by his father, a noted Scottish jurist. He recorded the activities, the hopes, and the disappointments of this year in London in a diary, which he sent in regular installments to a young friend who remained in Scotland. This journal, which miraculously survived for two hundred years and came to light in the twentieth century, is a remarkably revealing document, for reticence was not one of Boswell's marked characteristics; the frankness of his account of his activities brings him vividly to life.

Boswell was just twenty-two when he traveled south into England. He had passed his legal examinations, and his father had at last grudgingly agreed to give his son an allowance to allow him to pursue the career he thought he wanted. Lord Auchinleck's decision proved to be a wise one, for, after months of discouragement, Boswell finally realized that he was not going to obtain the desired commission, even with the help of noble friends, and he agreed to take up law again, on the condition that he might travel on the Continent before he returned to Scotland to begin his practice.

However frustrating these experiences

proved to Boswell, they provide fascinating reading in the London Journal. The author's youth is evident in many of the actions and impressions he records. He went to the city to turn himself into a polished English gentleman, and the pages of his diary are filled with resolutions for the improvement of his character and manners. At times this desire for sophistication manifests itself as a rather unattractive snobbery. Boswell records his disgust at the familiarity with which some of his Scottish friends treated him, at the provincialism of their conversation, and at the lack of restraint in their manners. In these moods he overlooked the fact that these hospitable people, especially Captain Andrew Erskine and his sister, had done much to alleviate his loneliness.

However, Boswell is for the most part perceptive about his relationships. He knows that William Temple, an old comrade from university days, a reserved and studious young man, is a good influence on him and that Lord Eglinton, who had introduced him to various dissipations during his first trip to London in 1760, encourages those vices for which his inclination is already too strong. Toward the end of the journal Boswell comments that Temple and Johnston, the Scottish friend to whom he was sending the diary, were those in whom he could confide his deepest feelings, while he feared to expose his sentiments to Erskine and Eglinton, though he valued their company for amusement. Boswell did, on occasion, lay himself open to their scorn with his supersensitive view of his own dignity; he violently resented criticism of his writing, and he sent indignant letters to Lord Eglington when he felt that he had not been treated with the civility to which he felt he was entitled. This overblown sense of his own importance was perhaps the hardest of Boswell's faults for him to recognize. It never occurred to him even to doubt that courtiers, ladies, and distinguished literary figures would consider themselves privileged to make his acquaintance.

Boswell is, however, acutely aware of many of his other shortcomings; his daily memoranda constantly remind him to correct them. However, his resolutions were notoriously short-lived. A vow of increased economy was sure to be followed by some extravagance, generally charitable, but nonetheless prodigal; intense remorse over his profligate relations with women generally preceded new debauchery; and promised rejection of his more frivolous acquaintances often led only to renewed amity. His later works show him still at his youthful routine, repenting and renewing his wrongdoing with equal fervor.

He was often the victim of his essentially trusting nature, especially in his relations with women, as the first entries of his diary show in the account of his affair with Louisa, an actress. Anxious to see himself as a romantic hero, he trusted her protestations of affection, fidelity, and morality, lent her money, pursued his conquest, and as a reward spent five weeks in his rooms convalescing from the disease with which she infected him.

For all Boswell's bravado and his apparent self-assurance, he suffered at times from a deep sense of melancholy and inferiority, probably the lingering result of a nervous disorder that had struck him when he was in his late teens. He had a childish fear of ghosts, and in his darker fits, when he could not bear to sleep alone in his lodgings, he would seek refuge for the night with one of his friends. This melancholy strain in his personality may have been one of the things that drew Boswell close to the great lexicographer, critic, and essayist, Samuel Johnson, whom he met for the first time during the winter of the London Journal. Johnson was himself subject to inexplicable terrors, and throughout his life he showed great compassion for this type of human weakness.

It is sometimes difficult to understand just what drew Boswell and Johnson together, but the account of their early acquaintance shows the appealing quality of Boswell's naïveté, however brash it might be at times, the hero-worship he felt for Johnson, his anxiety to please, and his eagerness for the older man's counsel. Johnson's attitude toward Boswell, as scholars have pointed out, is in many respects paternal. He responded warmly to both the adulation and the appeals for help, and he seems to have found Boswell's enthusiasms refreshing. His insistence on accompanying his young friend to Harwich to see him sail for his studies in the Netherlands provides touching testimony of the older man's affection.

Boswell's friendship with Johnson changed the character of the London Journal to a degree. From the time of their meeting, Boswell recorded increasingly more about Johnson's opinions on life and literature and less about his own feelings, though the latter were never ignored. Inevitably, his widening interests tended to decrease his introspection.

The London Journal is not simply jottings of the day's activities, but a conscious literary effort. Boswell seems to have composed the account of several days at a time, basing the diary on sketchy memoranda, and this practice allowed him to build some dramatic suspense. His ability to capture the conversations of his day, the remarks of London citizens at Child's coffee house, or the discussions of Johnson and his circle, shows the gift for narration that makes the Life of Johnson a masterpiece. Spurred on by Johnson's praise of the practice of keeping a journal, Boswell strove with great diligence to improve the literary quality of the latter portions of his work. As a result the book presents a remarkably lively and accurate picture of life in Boswell's time.

In 1961, Ivo Andrić, a Yugoslavian writer, was awarded the Nobel Prize for "the epic force with which he has depicted themes and human destinies drawn from the history of his country." The award was primarily for his novel The Bridge on the Drina, published in 1945 as part of his Bosnian trilogy.

The Bridge on the Drina is a fusion and expansion of many of the themes that have preoccupied Andrić since 1920. In a series of short stories written between 1920 and 1931, Andrić had portrayed the life of the Bosnian people, both as a collective unity and as separate and very different individuals. In The Bridge on the Drina the life of the people of Višegrad is depicted through the events of centuries, and the description of countless characters and their reactions to life takes the place of plot. The Drina is the river which marks the boundary between Bosnia and Serbia. Spanning it at Višegrad, the Turks built a bridge in the sixteenth century, and the novel describes life as it moves around and over the bridge during the course of three and one-half centuries, up to the time of World War I.

The bridge itself has been much discussed as the central symbol of the novel. As a historical symbol the bridge united Serbia to the east and Bosnia to the west, and was originally built to make travel easier. But this function was lost when a railroad was built from Višegrad to Sarajevo. Another possible interpretation is Biblical. Andrić refers to the bridge as a suprahuman existence; it endures and unites all of the inhabitants of Višegrad through time. In the sixteenth century mothers scream when their sons are taken to Stambul as a blood tribute to the Vezir, and almost four centuries later they shout and plead again when their sons are forcibly recruited for the Austrian Army. The bridge serves as a Calvary; for in the course of the novel a peasant, a religious pilgrim, a young mill attendant, and a parish priest—all innocent of any real crime—are impaled on the kapia, the wide terraces on either side of the middle of the bridge.

Yet if the bridge is the scene of human sacrifice, it is also the place of spiritual purification. Milan Glašćanin is cured of his desire for gambling when a mysterious stranger gambles with him in the kapia of the bridge and forces Milan to pledge that if he loses he will leap into the Drina. Milan does lose, but the stranger disappears and in his stead Milan sees only the value of life. Cor-kan, a drunkard, is forced by his taunting companions to walk on the icy bridge. Suddenly an unknown power fills him, and he dances to an unheard music which gives him serenity and balance. The bridge has almost magical powers, and the idea of the bridge as something more than it appears to be is exploited by the author's use of legend in the novel. Andrić had also used Bosnian folklore and legends in many of his earlier works, and in his short story titled "The Journey to Alije Djerdjeleza," published in 1920, he had told the tale of a traditional Moslem hero. In his fiction, however, the popular material is highly modified and serves only as the starting point for an elaborate tale.

At the beginning of The Bridge on the Drina, Andrić retells the legend of the bridge that demands human sacrifice before it can be completed, and then he modifies the story by combining it with the tale of a peasant, Radisav. During the building of the bridge the men of Višegrad were forced to work without pay, and they resented both the work and the Turkish overseers. Some of the local men began to sabotage the work at night. Radisav was captured and executed by being impaled in front of the populace. The old legend thus acquires new significance. Andrić was also interested in intense emotions and the delicate line between sanity and madness. The "Man from Plevlje" is a good example; captain of the guard, he realizes that he would have been executed if Radisav had not been chosen. This thought haunts him until he loses all control of himself and eventually goes mad.

"Eastern" or Moslem thought also plays a part in the novel. The Moslem view of the symbolic meaning of the bridge is expressed by several characters in the novel, especially by Alihodja. The bridge stands for man's creative work which achieves something lasting and good. At the end of the book Alihodja says that in this world anything can happen, except that wise and great men who would build bridges for the love of God and the beauty of the world should never vanish. If they did, indeed, vanish, that would mean the love of God no longer existed, and such cannot be. Andrić had used the bridge symbol with this same meaning in his 1931 short story, "The Bridge on the Dzdeka."

The first section of The Bridge on the Drina begins with the birth of Mehmed Pasha Sokolli, the Grand Vezir, and ends with an account of his senseless murder by a religious fanatic. In this account, as in many of his stories, Andrić portrays death as blind and unjust. In the second half of the eighteenth century the bridge survived a great flood, and in the house of one of the Moslem leaders, Turks, Christians, and Jews were forced to live together like castaways in the flood of time. The theme of unity in the face of adversity among the different ethnic populations of Višegrad reappears during the Serbian revolt against Turkish domination. The Turks pray for the destruction of the Serbs and the Serbs pray to destroy the Turks. In 1878, when the Austrian troops entered the town, the people were suspicious of one another. But soon representatives of Turks, Jews, and Christians begin to gather on the bridge to await the arrival of the Austrian commandant. The bridge for a while unites them and reveals a greater force than their ethnic differences. Nevertheless, through the centuries there is more conflict than harmony; thus the bridge becomes an idealistic symbol of what could be.

The second part of the novel concerns the Austro-Hungarian domination of the region and the course of World War I. Two characters especially symbolize the fate of the bridge. Alihodja, a conservative Moslem, is killed in the bombardment of the bridge in 1914. Lotte loses her shop and wanders senselessly about the town. Both characters have been displaced by the cruel force of circumstance. Similarly, the bridge itself loses its reason for being with the advent of the railroad, and when the Balkan wars alter the boundary of Serbia and Bosnia the bridge is no longer the meeting place of East and West. In 1914 one of the eleven arches of the bridge is damaged. Andrić expresses the hope that men will not have to live through ten more broken arches.

If The Bridge on the Drina has a fault, it is that the relationship between the characters is too loose. It is less of a story than a grand panorama combining legend, folklore, and political history. Andrić has expressed in his work a sympathy for idealism. Perhaps it is not yet an anachronism today to value man's endeavors and to view his failures as tragedy. For Andrić does not share the existential point of view. He sees the history of a people as a valuable human document, and he views man's mistakes and crimes as deep tragedy.

BRIEF LIVES

Type of work: Biographies
Author: John Aubrey (1625-1697)
First published: 1813

John Aubrey was interested in the biographical rather than the historical elements of great events. He found out all he could about the people of his time; some of it is gossip, some of it actual historical fact. At Oxford he came under the influence of antiquaries, and he began to do research on biography of a more sophisticated and indeed scientific kind than had previously been practiced. He worked from local records, birth and death registers, letters, legal documents, and even from tombstones in order to acquire information for his great series of Brief Lives. He evaluated this material as well as he could and wrote frequently of the need to possess accurate information of the past lest it become simply a myth. For his scientific spirit of inquiry he was honored by the Royal Society, becoming one of the original founding members.

The people described in the Brief Lives, first published as Lives of Eminent Men in 1813, are the great men and women of the seventeenth century. There is very little in this biographical work that reflects on those who are not notable, who have not, by birth or accomplishment, become the leaders of their time, among them John Florio, George Herbert, John Milton, William Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Sir Walter Raleigh. Aubrey's method of dealing with his subjects is both factual and interpretative. In his life of Milton he begins, for example, with a short account of the verifiable facts of the poet's birth and ancestry. Next he presents an account of the subject's family. Aubrey then devotes sections to education, travel, and accomplishments. The latter are treated with much care, and his account of things done and written is an important repository for our own historical inquiries. Aubrey is particular to add other information about the men and women in his work; of great interest is his recounting of their appearance and taste. He frequently concludes his biographical sketch with a brief evaluation of the work or character of the subject.

One of the great constants of Brief Lives is its emphasis on what may be called the human element. Aubrey, like most men of his age, was fascinated not so much by facts of a statistical kind as he was by the human personality itself. In this respect his book is a landmark of interpretative biography. For example, we find that John Milton had an "ingenious Soul" in "a beautifull and well proportioned body." Aubrey then remarks that he and Milton were approximately of the same size and build. The comparison is not intended to be invidious; Aubrey is simply interested in the most obvious and actual things about the subject. He adds other information that would seem superfluous if it did not reveal matter of interest both about the subject and the man describing him, pointing out that Milton was generally a healthy man, and that he seldom "tooke any physique."

Aubrey is able to write about things that a historian would give a great deal to have witnessed. When he writes about General Monk, the man responsible for the restoration of Charles II, he goes to his own memory of the events of 1660 and describes his personal impressions of the event. He mentions not only the day but the very hour, noting that Monk arrived in London at mid-day and went shortly thereafter directly to the House of Parliament. Aubrey adds that Monk refused, in modesty, to sit down while in the house, that he went to dinner with certain of the members, and that he was instrumental in causing the Parliament to vote for the return of Charles Stuart. In the midst of these recollections, some trivial and some vital, Aubrey delivers himself of obiter dicta: his own opinion of certain members of Parliament and their actions.

Often the matter of the biography seems apocryphal. The life of Sir Thomas More repeats the ancient story of the encounter of More with a madman on the gate-house of his manor. More, who was then old and feeble, was surprised to find a lunatic approach him and tell him that he was going to be thrown over the battlements. More, supposedly, or so the biography (or legend) states, picked up a little dog that was with him and proposed that they first throw the dog over to see how it was done. After this he rid himself of the madman by sending him down to get the dog and try it again. It is matter like this which reveals, if not the actual nature of what happened, the idea of what would happen if a philosopher were to find himself in such a spot. The most famous of these fictional facts is of course in the life of William Shakespeare. Aubrey repeats the ancient tale of Shakespeare as a butcher's apprentice; whenever he killed a calf "he would doe it in a high style, and make a Speech." Aubrey adds many other items which have since become part of the Shakespeare legend: the good looks of the playwright; his wit; his acting ability. Yet there are many things which we know are facts, among them Ben Jonson's opinions of Shakespeare as a writer.

Probably the best known of the lives, and certainly the most detailed, is that of Thomas Hobbes. This life offers no such difficulties as that of More or Shakespeare, for Hobbes lived in the lifetime of his biographer, and the facts were more easily garnered. Aubrey has many valuable things to say about the writing habits of Hobbes; he remarks that he has often heard Hobbes himself say things that revealed his inner thoughts. We find that Hobbes tried many kinds of writing and indulged in a good deal of reading, but that he was most taken with scientific and quasi-scientific affairs. There is the famous account of Hobbes and his frequent walks, having always in his pocket a notebook, and having in his hand a cane the head of which was a pen set in a bottle of ink. In this way Hobbes was able to capture every stray thought, "or else he should perhaps have lost it." Aubrey reveals that Hobbes' Leviathan was not written for personal advantage, as has often been suspected. At least Hobbes informed Aubrey himself that the spirit of inquiry alone sustained the volume. If this is true, Aubrey's information is invaluable; if false, it reveals the danger of consulting the man whose life is to be reconstructed. Biography is perhaps less liable to distortion than autobiography, but Aubrey's method does allow for exaggeration or misinformation, even while it permits far greater involvement of the subject and revelation of his motives.

Invaluable to historians is Aubrey's account of the relationships, public and private, of the figures in his studies. He reveals, for example, that the Earl of Danby was a model estate manager; that his mother was a superb politician and practical economist; that Danvers had advised the Earl of Essex to discuss his position with Queen Elizabeth but that he failed to do so, and consequently was executed for treason. We find that Robert Hooke, Curator of Experiments at the Royal Society, made his fortune by speculation after the fire that destroyed London in 1666 by being appointed one of the surveyors of the ruins. Perhaps most interesting in these biographies is Aubrey's account of the conditions at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. His work, although principally focused on the famous men who taught and did research at those universities, offers a wealth of information on the student body, the curriculum, the fees and costs of education, even the amusements of the students. In short, although Aubrey is principally concerned with the events of individual lives, he has an enormous amount of peripheral information on the institutions of the day.

Characteristic of the work as a whole is Aubrey's wide interest in matters of geography, architecture, literature, and other Renaissance studies and arts. The biographies are full of quotations from the literature of the day, and Aubrey often alludes to the various fields of study to which his subjects applied themselves. Aubrey delivers himself of opinions on the nature of a well-run household, a good education, a pleasing poem, an attractive painting. He is never better than when he is bringing these opinions to bear on his subjects, for he enriches the facts of biography in a thoroughly characteristic Renaissance manner. His leisurely observation on such matters is, at least in part, responsible for our knowing exactly what it was that Milton read as a young man (Hesiod, Afer, Oppian, and others) and whether this reading was worth anything (Aubrey thought very highly of these authors). Aubrey brings to our attention other things as well: his opinion of the accuracy of other books; his opinion, and that of others, of the poetry of Cowley, Denham, and other poets; his reflections on the causes and nature of the Civil War. In all, the Brief Lives is far from a brief book, but the information and opinion it offers, in addition to the simple facts of birth, accomplishment, and death, give us an admirable sense of the total quality of life in the seventeenth century.

THE BRONZE HORSEMAN: A PETERSBURG TALE

Author: Alexander Pushkin (1799-1837)

Time: 1824

Locale: St. Petersburg, Russia
First published: 1841

Principal character:
EVGENI, a clerk

Alexander Pushkin was born in the last year of the eighteenth century and died thirty-seven years later in a duel. But within that brief span he not only revolutionized the language of Russian literature, but also wrote some of the finest poems to be found in that literature. It is generally held that the narrative poem The Bronze Horseman, an impressionistic romance written in 1833 and published posthumously in 1841, is Pushkin's masterpiece.

By 1831, Pushkin had completed the novel in verse entitled Evgeni Onegin and had planned on writing a sequel to it. This plan gradually changed to the idea of writing a new realistic poem centered on a new hero with the same name. In this poem Evgeni would be a St. Petersburg clerk of noble descent, and the poem was to include a short genealogy. Instead of the digressive, rambling style of Evgeni Onegin, this poem was concise and almost laconic. In 1836 a revised fragment from the first draft was published with the title "My Hero's Pedigree." But the poem was criticized by liberals as being essentially aristocratic, and it subsequently fell into obscurity. The heart of the poem, now relieved of the genealogical matter, was eventually published as The Bronze Horseman.

The subject of The Bronze Horseman is the St. Petersburg flood of 1824. To understand the poem the reader must have some knowledge of the historical background of the city. St. Petersburg was built at the beginning of the eighteenth century by Peter the Great as his capital and "window to the West." The city is located on the swampy shores of the Neva River, and there are various tales of the thousands of workers who died of disease and mistreatment during the building of the city. In the spring there were often floods, and in 1777 and again in 1824 the flooding amounted to disaster. It is known that Pushkin contributed anonymously to the 1824 flood victims, and it is of the flood of that year that he wrote nine years later.

Evgeni, the victim-hero of The Bronze Horseman, is an insignificant clerk. From the genealogical fragment published in 1836 we know that he lost his social position and wealth through the incompetence of his father as a landlord. His hopes for the future now include only a bed, two chairs, a pot of cabbage soup, and a girl named Parasha. During the flood Evgeni saves himself by clinging to a statue of a lion on the Senate building directly opposite the famous bronze figure of Peter the Great by Falconet. Later Evgeni, learning that Parasha was killed by the flood, wanders, lost and dispirited, about the city for weeks. One night as he is walking through the Senate Square he sees the bronze statue again, and, thinking of the flood, curses it. Suddenly the metal horse seems to rear. Startled and frightened, Evgeni runs, but he hears behind him the clatter of hooves on the cobbled streets. From then on Evgeni avoids the statue, and when he must pass it, he lowers his gaze. Later, he is found drowned, and through a deed of charity he is buried.

The Bronze Horseman presents the struggle between the individual and society. The gap between Evgeni and what the statue represents is immense. Evgeni, the petty, insignificant clerk, is destroyed in spirit, mind, and body, and if Pushkin had not made his protest known, he would have gone unheard. Evgeni curses the statue of Peter the Great because he sees in the building of St. Petersburg an act defying both God and nature; people like Evgeni must pay for the splendor of the artificial capital. It is the sacrifice of the individual to the destiny of the nation, where progress gives men neither peace nor happiness. In this context, Pushkin offers a sympathetic and compassionate description of Evgeni, the first "little man" of Russian literature, and he is followed by the creations of Gogol, Dostoevsky, and Chekhov.

Despite his sympathy for Evgeni, however, Pushkin speaks of Peter the Great in superlatives. He is "awesome," he is "magnificent," he is "like God's tempestuous wrath." Pushkin had already portrayed Peter in earlier works such as The Blackamoor of Peter the Great and Poltava. Peter the Great's energy and determination and his goal of making Russia the equal of any Western nation especially appealed to Pushkin. In the prologue to The Bronze Horseman Pushkin wrote, "Filled with grandiose thoughts he stood upon the shore where broke the lonely waves . . . Here will a great city be founded." The "he" is, of course, Peter. "I love thine [the city's] aspect graceful and severe, Neva's mighty stream, her granite banks." Pushkin has sometimes been called "the Bard of Peter the Great." Actually, he was the first Russian poet to accept the St. Petersburg period of Russian history. Despite Pushkin's description of the greatness of Peter, the reader must feel that Pushkin's underlying sympathy is with Evgeni. Pushkin does not attempt to reconcile the separate demands of state and individual. He leaves it to the reader to resolve the moral conflict or accept the tragedy as a necessary evil.

The laconic but expressive diction of The Bronze Horseman has presented difficulties to translators, for as the distinguished critic, D. S. Mirsky, has said, the language is charged with a tremendous weight of meaning. The description of the flood is realistic and devoid of superfluous detail, and yet the poem as a whole is highly impressionistic. Pushkin used the spoken language, but he was able to extract poetic meanings from workaday words. It is easy to become annoyed with the assertion that Pushkin cannot be adequately translated into English, yet of all Russian writers it is probably most true in his case.

The Bronze Horseman was not published during Pushkin's lifetime. It is historically curious that Russia's golden age of poetry, of which Pushkin was the most outstanding representative, occurred at a time of great political repression. Not only was The Bronze Horseman suppressed by the censor, but Pushkin himself was subjected to various political pressures. Several times he was exiled from St. Petersburg, and the tsar once threatened to confine him in a monastery on the White Sea. In 1825 a rebellion of intellectuals and noblemen erupted in the Senate Square, and Pushkin alludes to the uprising. Yet despite these sympathies and the repression he suffered, Pushkin does not use The Bronze Horseman to condemn the state. His attitude is more stoical, as if it said that any government whether of the left or right will compromise the individual and will sacrifice the weak for the strong. History is merciless and injustice is often the price of progress, so it seems to him.

Besides the dominant theme of state and citizen, the poem also speaks of the violence of life. St. Petersburg itself exercises an oppressive power over Evgeni. It is cold stone and metal; instead of protecting people it merely intensifies their problems by its detachment and impersonality. The Neva is a destructive influence, which unpredictably ruins not only the creations of men but also men themselves. Evgeni cannot protect himself against such overwhelming forces: "his baffled wits gave way before these blows. The mutinous roar of the Neva and the winds were now resounding in his ears." Evgeni is destroyed by life itself. The Bronze Horseman remains as a memorial of the tragedy of an unknown man and as proof of the power of Pushkin's craft.

BROTHER ASS

Author: Eduardo Barrios (1884-1963)

Locale: Santiago, Chile

First published: 1922

Principal characters:

BROTHER LÁZARO, who tells the story
BROTHER RUFINO, who practices cruel self-discipline
THE FATHER GUARDIAN
BROTHER ELIAS, a cruel and cynical man
GRACIA, the girl Lázaro once loved
MARÍA MERCEDES, her younger sister
SEÑORA JUSTINA, their mother

Unamuno, the Spanish philosopher, once declared that Spanish philosophy is based on mysticism. Certainly there is nothing more essentially Castilian than the work of the sixteenth century mystic Santa Teresa, whether one considers its spirit, its doctrine, or its style. Mysticism has been defined as a direct relationship with God or some other unifying principle of life. This merging of the individual consciousness with the Supreme Consciousness was not confined to Spain. Europe had other mystics, like Thomas á Kempis in Germany and Anselm of Canterbury in England, but nowhere were there more practitioners of mysticism than in Spain. The bibliographer Nicolás Antonio in his Bibliotheca Hispana lists more than 4,000 local mystic writers, including those who studied the relationship of the soul with God and the ascetics who sought the way of virtue and happiness through abnegation, love, and sacrifice.

Among the Spanish mystics were the poets Fray Luis de León and St. John of the Cross, as well as a host of prose writers with Santa Teresa de Jesús and Fray Luis de Granada the most outstanding.

Their speculation took two paths. To some, God was a metaphysical entity existing outside the soul, to be approached in a series of stages. To others, God was everpresent, dwelling within the soul, to be discovered by going deeper into one's own reality.

The beginning of the movement in Spain represented a revolt against the paganism of the Renaissance. It had its sources in Platonism and the Neo-Platonism of Plotinus, and was spread through the influence of Franciscan and Erasmian doctrines. Also, the translation into Spanish in 1568 of a treatise on divine love by the Spanish Jew León Hebreo, called Dialogues of Love, supplied the metaphors and comparisons that were augmented by a terminology borrowed from human love.

The dearth of mystic writers in the New World makes one wonder about the reason, in view of their abundance in Spain. Because of the contemplative nature of mysticism, it is easy to attribute their scarcity to the activity demanded in the settlement of a new continent. Actually many of the priests in the New World were active in many other lines. Perhaps the intellectual caliber of most of the religious leaders in the early period provides an explanation. They were selected for their ability to tuck up their robes and slog through the trackless jungle to win converts among the illiterate aborigines who would not have understood even the most persuasive of mystical writing. Yet America had many writers, as is proved by the vast quantity of chronicles and travel books. Diego de Hojeda, a Peruvian priest-poet composed a twelve-book Christian epic, La cristiada. However, about the only practicing mystic known was Saint Rosa of Lima, the first American saint. She lived largely withdrawn from the Peruvian world and left no important writing when she died at the age of thirty from the severity of her religious practices.

Brother Ass, by the Chilean Eduardo Barrios, practically the only mystic literary work of Spanish America, springs from many sources. Barrios' other novels mark him as a master of abnormal psychology. One critic noted that he excelled in painting abnormal personalities, not exactly neurotics but, rather, human beings whose emotional nature is overwrought and who end in insanity or spiritual disintegration. That is true of his earliest intensely poetic novel, actually a novelette, El niño que enloqueció de amor (The Boy Who Went Crazy with Love, or as generally translated, Sentimental Madness), which was published in 1915. It purports to be the diary of a ten-year-old boy who falls in love with Angelica, a friend and contemporary of his mother.

For his second long fiction, Un perdido (A Lost Soul), published in 1917, Barrios chose a Chilean city environment, in which the abnormally sentimental hero—suggested perhaps by Frédéric Moreau in Flaubert's A Sentimental Education—spends a life of maladjustment and frustration.

Among his other works are a more realistic novel of life on a nineteenth century Chilean farm, Gran señor y rajadiblos (Great Man and Hell-raiser), which came out in 1948, and Los hombres del hombre (A Man of Many Aspects), published two years later, a psychological novel in which each aspect of the protagonist assumes a different name. Different from all of them was his 1922 novel, El hermano asno (Brother Ass).

The author was able to vary his themes because he himself was a man of many facets. His father was an officer in the Chilean army during the War of the Pacific, and his mother came from occupied Peru. The child was born in Valparaíso, Chile, but was taken by his mother to Peru shortly after the death of his father. At fifteen he was returned to Chile to attend a military school from which he ran away to live his own life as a bookkeeper in a Chilean nitrate mine, as a rubber worker in Peru, as a weight lifter in a circus, and as a traveling salesman hawking stoves in Buenos Aires. For a time he lived in a Franciscan monastery that gave him local color and inspiration for his greatest novel.

Its title comes from the words of the Italian Saint Francis of Assisi, who called his body "Brother Ass" and begged its pardon for treating it so harshly by fasting and scourging. The founder of the Franciscan Order enters the story again in connection with Brother Rufino's miracle of creating a friendly feeling between cats and mice, as Saint Francis considered all birds and beasts fellow creatures.

Brother Ass is supposed to be an autobiography by Brother Lázaro. According to Barrios, who retells his story, on the first page of the manuscript, in one corner and written in tiny letters and watery ink, as if the Brother had wished to whisper them, were three lines from the poetry of a Mexican poet of mystical tendencies, Amado Nervo, an invocation to the temple of his dreams, a place of deep silence, not dogma.

A medieval legend of a juggler in the Abbey of Cluny, later retold by Anatole France as "The Juggler of Notre Dame," has as its chief character an impoverished juggler who was given shelter in the abbey before Christmas. Others of the abbey were using their skills to make Christmas gifts for Our Lady. One wrote a poem, another composed a hymn, one painted a fresco, another carved a statue. But the juggler had no artistic ability. So he decided to contribute as best he was able by juggling before her shrine. When the priests, horror-stricken by such sacrilege, tried to drive him from the temple, Our Lady descended with a smile from her shrine and wiped the juggler's brow.

similar predicament. He had no great ability. In fact, he was a failure as a priest. For more than seven years he had been a member of the Franciscan community without being ordained. He still felt unworthy to become even a good minor friar. A similar feeling is frequently described in mystic literature as "the dark night of the soul." In the approach to God, first to come is a purification of the soul and a feeling of illumination, followed by increasing love. But poor Brother Lázaro had discovered only that morning, while accompanying the Father Guardian to a nearby hospital to hear the confession of a dying man, that he could not discern the love of God in his fellow monks. Too clearly he saw the flaws of all of them, especially of Brother Rufino, like himself still unordained. Brother Rufino's obstacle was his life of penitence that prevented the completion of his studies; Brother Lázaro's difficulties were worries that his worldly past made him unfit for religious duties.

Going to the monastery garden to meditate about leaving the Church, he was interrupted by the appearance of another Franciscan, Brother John, bursting with news of a miracle. Brother Rufino, seeking as had the founder of the Order to be a friend of all creatures, had set scraps of food on a plate in his cell. Both cats and mice were sharing it in harmony.

More evidence of his lack of Christian qualities came to Brother Lázaro when he let the joking of Brother Elias at his expense enrage him so greatly that another brother felt impelled to draw him aside with a reminder of the need for brotherly love.

Animal brotherhood can go too far. The monks in the monastery discovered that when the mice were no longer frightened away by their natural enemies, they began devouring the wafers, the wax, and the oil. So, reluctantly, the Father Guardian ordered Brother Rufino to stop putting out food.

So far, Brother Ass has been like a medieval legend. Now comes the plotting and complications to make it a story. At the communion, Brother Lázaro was sure he saw Gracia, the cause of his withdrawal from the world when she jilted him eight years earlier. However, it was not his former sweetheart, but her younger sister María Mercedes. He learned that Gracia had a family now, but the sister, much more beautiful, represented a temptation to the flesh that he had difficulty in resisting. He tried to discourage her from coming back to the monastery by refusing to help her see Brother Rufino, now considered a saint and adored by all the children.

However, Brother Rufino had also seen the lovely girl, and his soul, once filled with a mystical longing for perfection and humility, was tormented almost to madness. He tried to fight temptation by fasting. He became cadaverous. He refused to tell Brother Lázaro his trouble, except to say that it was the vileness of Brother Ass.

The more Brother Rufino tortured his flesh, the greater grew his saintly reputation. Even people from beyond the parish sought him out, imploring prayers and cures.

Eventually Brother Lázaro mastered his thoughts of María Mercedes and found peace in the monastery despite frequent sight of her and Gracia. Not so Brother Rufino. One day while in his cell, Brother Lázaro heard María Mercedes scream. He saw her rush out of Brother Rufino's cell, crying and with torn clothes. When he entered, the gaunt Franciscan was moaning that Brother Ass had been too strong for him. A few moments later he died.

The girl brought no charges, but her angry mother arrived as the bells were tolling for the funeral of Brother Rufino. She cried that the dead man had attacked her daughter. That was the moment when Brother Lázaro made to God his supreme gift. He took the accusation upon himself and confessed that he was the guilty one.

Later he told the truth to the Father

Provincial, but it was decided that for the prestige of Brother Rufino and for the good of the Order, Brother Lázaro should be the one publicly considered guilty. He would be transferred to a distant province. He agreed to the decision and prayed that God would accept his sacrifice and make of him a good minor Brother of his order.

Eduardo Barrios began his literary career with a volume of short stories published in Iquique. Later he turned to the theater, first with a brief dialogue, Papa and Mama. Then in 1912 came a satire on government bureaucracy, Por el decoro (For the Good of the Office); in 1913 he published the first of his fantasies, Lo que niega la vida (What Life Denies), taking place in the soul rather than in any definite locality; and in 1916 appeared his best play, Vivir (Life), a psychological tragedy filled with frustrated women. However, the impossibility of earning a livelihood in Chile's theaters turned him to novel writing, a profession he combined with such occupations as Chile's Minister of Education, and Director of the National Library. When he died in Santiago in 1963, in his eightieth year, Barrios was esteemed as the dean of Chilean literature and the man chiefly responsible for the present popularity and high quality of its psychological fiction.

THE BROWN DECADES

Type of work: Cultural history

Author: Lewis Mumford (1895-)

First published: 1931

The Brown Decades is a study of the building arts in America between 1865 and 1895. It is based on the assumption that these years were the autumn period of American civilization; that they followed the brief "renaissance" summer which was ended by the Civil War. Mr. Mumford begins by asserting that the prevailing style of life in this period was not conducive to the arts. The old style of life, which was quiet, ordered, and based on a nonindustrial culture, gave way to a new one dominated by business and production. This change endowed the postwar decades with two kinds of problems. The first was the moral problem, and this is a subject that has been gone over thoroughly by the historians. The Gilded Age was an age of excess, and its central figures were those who achieved success by heroic dishonesty. They were inclined to look upon industrial expansion as purely a matter of dollars and cents; accordingly, they endowed this period with a brutal system of labor and an extraordinarily ugly series of centers of production. The second problem faced by Mr. Mumford is closely allied to the first: the new money that went into burgeoning factories and buildings and bridges had the aim principally of practicality, and the urban centers of America were created with the built-in problems which are today so evident.

These problems were of two orders, Mr. Mumford points out. First, the natural landscape, particularly in the East, was sacrificed to the interests of production. Factories and especially railroads dominated the structure of the cities and of the countryside into which they swiftly overflowed. Second, the cities themselves took on the chaotic, vertical character they continue to exhibit. They became overcrowded and unhealthful, and they forever united in America the large city with the large slum.

The heroes of The Brown Decades are our great naturalists, engineers, conservationists, and architects. It was these men, Mr. Mumford declares, who, laboring against the odds of bad taste and mass indifference, in a manner redeemed this thirty-year period. The first of these is Henry David Thoreau, who, although not directly connected with reforms in our cities, was the principal figure to direct our attention back to the beauty and values of nature. A second naturalist praised by Mumford is George Perkins Marsh, the first man in America to deal practically with the idea of human ecology. He pointed out in his Man and Nature, published in 1864, that geography was by no means a study of natural formations and divisions, rather, it had to be understood as a branch of ecology, because geography was continually in the process of change as a result of human action. The moral and aesthetic influence of men such as Thoreau and Marsh, Mr. Mumford asserts, affected and in a manner created our great school of conservationists. He points out that conservationism began actually in our cities, and that Frederick Olmstead, the designer of Central Park in New York City, was just as important as wilderness figures such as Thoreau, John Muir, and John Audubon. Indeed, the creation of Central Park is one of the central episodes of The Brown Decades, since it brought into the open the great conflict between those who wanted land for purposes of rental and taxation and those who conceived of it as necessary for beauty and recreation. The landscape park, according to Mumford, was an affront to the reigning business ethic. It was to prove in New York and in other cities, however, both beautiful and useful. Olmstead justified his park by pointing out that cities did not have to grow haphazardly; in a famous statement, and one basic to our present conception of urban development, he demonstrated that a park was not simply an adjunct of a city, but its proper center. As he proved in Central Park, the landscape could become important for its direction of transportation and for the creation of new residential neighborhoods.

The men who worked with nature are not the only heroes of The Brown Decades. The Roeblings, those engineers who designed and built the Brooklyn Bridge, are central to Mr. Mumford's thesis that the time was saved from artistic negation by a few men of great learning and strong will. The importance of the Brooklyn Bridge was not only that it was the first attempt to expand the city from Manhattan, but that it was one of the first combinations of engineering and artistic design. The steel cables of the suspension, Mr. Mumford believes, were no more important than the stone of the supporting masonry and the design of towers and piers. The bridge was the first public structure since the Washington Monument to be of architectural as well as engineering importance. In the use of steel as structural support it opened up a whole new world of uses, and in uniting metal with masonry it brought the customary materials of construction into a new age of their design.

There are many great architects whose works are studied in The Brown Decades: principal among them are Henry Richardson, John Root, Louis Sullivan, and Frank Lloyd Wright. Richardson is singled out as the man responsible for the creation of a new architecture, a man whose influence equaled that of Christopher Wren. It was Richardson who departed from the old formulation that Gothic architecture was suited for churches and "classical" for other public buildings. He brought back to life a massive Romanesque style, and his libraries, railroad stations, and tall buildings demonstrated that a variety of styles was available for any form. He departed from traditional practice when he considered windows not as merely parts of a façade, but as integral to interior design. And he contracted with the best artists America had to offer for their advice on color, design and proportion. He was par excellence the artist in masonry, and he handed on to his successors a real feeling for the texture of his medium.

Root carried the principles of Richardson about as far as they would go; his Monadnock Building is one of the great monuments of the Chicago of the late nineteenth century. It is fifteen stories tall, an immense height for a non-steel structure. Its importance, according to Mumford, is its simplicity and its mastery of form. Instead of creating an enormous brick box, the kind of thing which, purely in terms of dollars and sense, would have been most practical, he lavished a tremendous amount of time and energy on the imaginative design of window-units and spacing, making the Monadnock one of the lightest and airiest buildings of the century, in spite of the fact that it was at the same time one of the most massive.

Louis Sullivan, according to Mumford, was the most original and inventive of the architects of this period. It was he who designed Chicago's enormous Auditorium Building, a triumph of simplicity, formal design, and function. He thought out a theory of the skyscraper, which, although confined by his premise that the unit of construction was the steel cage, worked out in practice to such masterpieces as the Wainwright Building in St. Louis (1891), and the Schiller Building (1892) and the Gage Building (1898), both of Chicago. Sullivan was most important, Mumford suggests, for the amount and kind of ornamentation he brought to buildings of masonry and steel. This was for him the great realm of individuality, and he brought to the building trades a renewed use of sculpture and design. Perhaps most important, Sullivan was a literate man, and he brought into articulation many ideas that had been only half expressed, and badly at that. He conceived of architecture as a "social manifestation," and he held strongly to the organic view of building design. Structures had not only to express their function individually, but were obliged to fit into a larger community. He went on record for spaciousness and wrote that those who allow congestion and disharmony in the design of buildings were bringing "outlawry" into the life of cities. In short, he symbolized the great and thoughtful amount of social consciousness that distinguished the best minds of the Brown Decades.

A BURNT-OUT CASE

Author: Graham Greene (1904-)

Time: The present

Locale: The Belgian Congo

First published: 1961

Principal characters:

QUERRY, a spiritually maimed man of arid heart

DR. COLIN, an atheist doctor serving at a leprosarium in the Belgian Congo

MONTAGU PARKINSON, a news correspondent

ANDRÉ RYCKER, the manager of a palm-oil factory

MARIE RYCKER, his wife

THE SUPERIOR, head of the White Fathers mission and the leprosarium

FATHER THOMAS, a credulous monk

DEO GRATIAS, Query's native servant, a burnt-out leper case

The novels of Graham Greene suggest those landscapes of the spirit that we see frequently in impressionistic paintings. Sometimes the scene is a bleak wasteland over which a sad, cold wind blows, twisting a few withered leaves on the boughs of stunted, storm-wrenched trees. The ground is bare and ashy. Behind the stark outlines of the trees the sky appears dark and menacing; before long snow will begin to fall quietly on this place of blight and desolation. Again, the scene may be a jungle riotously choked with monstrous plants. Leaves hang motionless in the heavy, fetid air. Strange flowers bloom, their hot yellows and sultry reds set against the poisonous green of the vegetation. From a tree limb a snake hangs like a drooping vine. A beast peers through the cane stalks or stands motionless over a prostrate figure lying on the bank of a river flowing through this world of silence, rank growth, and decay.

Images of the jungle and the wasteland merge in A Burnt-Out Case to provide a contrast between the tangled emotionalism and moral corruption in a man's past and the sterile emptiness of spiritual death in his present. The scene of the novel is a mission hospital and leprosarium maintained by the White Fathers, a minor order of Catholic monks, on a remote river in the Belgian Congo.

This is Conrad country, but in this novel it is described without Conrad's poetic, brooding vision and intensity. Perhaps Graham Greene was aware of the difference when he wrote in his dedication that his Congo is a region of the mind. There is another important difference as well. Conrad sent his Marlow on a voyage of discovery: Africa, with its heat, jungle, and tribal mysteries, becomes the symbol of the greater darkness in the heart of man where we are all secret sharers. Querry, the central character of Mr. Greene's novel, carries his own darkness of spirit with him. He is the Roman Catholic of arid heart. Having passed beyond all that the world calls good or evil, he asks for nothing, and he has nothing to share. When the river boat reaches the mission landing, he disembarks. He has traveled as far as he can go; beyond there is only the overgrown jungle. Dr. Colin, the doctor at the mission, asks him if he is stopping there. Querry makes the only answer when he answers that the boat goes no farther.

Querry—Mr. Greene is adroit in his use of symbols—is that phenomenon of modern society, the burnt-out case, a term used to describe a leper in whom the disease has been halted, but not before it has eaten away its victim piecemeal. In this mutilated condition he no longer feels the excruciating pain of those who are taking the cure for their malady and whose bodies are still whole. Querry's mutilation is spiritual, not physical, but the results are the same. He has lost the capacity to feel.

Once the monks and Dr. Colin have decided that their strange guest has not come to the mission to satisfy a morbid interest concerning leprosy, they accept him with little curiosity. They learn that he is a lapsed Catholic, a matter of concern to some of the fathers, of complete indifference to the atheist doctor, but that is all. What they do not know is that Querry is world-famous, a distinguished church architect and a notorious womanizer. But the buildings he designed and his affairs with women had been little more than the expression of his own absorbing self-love. Now the creation of beauty and the beauty of women have become meaningless to him, and he is in flight from his past. No matter how isolated a man may feel, however, and regardless of the causes of his spiritual death, no man is an island. Before long Querry is doing small tasks about the mission, often as the doctor's assistant in the infirmary. One night he has a glimpse of what he might be seeking. Deo Gratias, the crippled, burnt-out native who has been assigned to him as his servant, disappears unaccountably, and Querry goes looking for him in the jungle. During the night he spends with the exhausted native he hears Deo Gratias mutter something about Pendelé, the place of innocence, simple pleasures, and joy. Querry transforms into terms of his own past his servant's words about Pendelé.

Then the world intrudes upon his refuge, first in the person of André Rycker, a colon who manages a palm-oil plantation, and then in the curious prying of Montagu Parkinson, a vulgar journalist to whom Rycker has communicated the fact that the guest at the mission is the Querry. (Rycker had recognized him after reading a magazine cover story about the famous architect.) With the help of Rycker and information gained from a sentimental priest who places the wrong interpretation of the shepherd and his lost sheep on Querry's night search for his servant, Parkinson proceeds to write several sensational stories in an attempt to make Querry look like another Albert Schweitzer, possibly a St. Francis, or at least a saint manqué. The fact that Querry is designing a new hospital for the mission seems to substantiate his report. This presentation of Querry as a sainted, whole man provides a titillating accompaniment to a morbid rehash of all the scandals in Querry's life, including the suicide of one of his mistresses. Parkinson is as horrible as his journalistic style and as false as the principle by which he operates, the belief that anything is true if it is believed.

Having come to Africa to report on the native riots, he is going ahead with his plans to exploit Querry after the political disturbance has died down. He is on the scene when Querry innocently spends a night in the same hotel with Rycker's wife. He says that his version of the story is as likely to be believed as Querry's. He also tells Querry that he intended to build him up, but now it may make a better story if he tears him down.

Melodrama, common in Greene's fiction, sets the scene for the final tragedy. Marie Rycker, trying childishly to be revenged on the husband she despises, allows him to believe that Querry is the real father of her child. Rycker follows Querry to the mission and shoots him. Parkinson, who could have told the truth about the dead man's innocence but failed to do so, writes an article headed "Death of a Hermit. The Saint Who Failed." He also sends as a decoration for Querry's grave a wreath, supposedly from the readers of his magazine and bearing an inscription credited to Browning: "Nature I loved and next to Nature Art." Parkinson's quotations from the anthology poets are as mistaken as the facts in his lurid news stories.

In his dedication, Graham Greene speaks of this novel as an effort to express different types of belief, half-belief, and non-belief. This announcement suggests at the outset that Greene intends to pigeonhole his characters and show them as limited and recognizable types. The effect of the novel, however, is quite different. His people spill over as they would in life. They are innocent and guilty, wise and foolish, skeptical and devout. Marie Rycker is in many ways an innocent child, for example, but she is the cause of Querry's death. A priest, Father Thomas, believes what he wants to believe when he sees Querry as a man destined for sainthood. Rycker, the failed priest, seeks an object of veneration outside himself and thinks that Querry is the man to revere; the murder he commits is more the sign of his own weakness than the act of an outraged husband. Only Dr. Colin, the humane atheist, and Parkinson, a monster of abstraction and a builder of the big lie, are completely themselves in their uncomplicated and thoroughgoing traits.

The quality of ambiguity exhibited in presenting his view of man's morality and faith is the secret of the appeal Graham Greene holds for many readers. He raises questions; he clarifies; he withholds answers. He suggests by indirection the nature and mystery of man's relation to God. His concerns, bitter, disillusioned, argumentative, make A Burnt-Out Case a serious novel, a religious parable on the possibility of redemption. William Faulkner once wrote that the world's solution lies in the suffering of man. This is Graham Greene's theme as well.

CALL IT SLEEP

Author: Henry Roth (1906-)

Time: 1907-1913

Locale: Lower East Side, New York City

First published: 1934

Principal characters:

DAVID SCHEARL, a young Jewish immigrant boy

GENYA SCHEARL, his mother

ALBERT SCHEARL, his father

JOE LUTER, a print shop foreman

BERTHA, Genya's sister, David's aunt

YUSSIE MINK, David's friend

ANNIE MINK, his sister

LEO DUGOVKA, another of David's friends

NATHAN STERNOWITZ, a widower, later Bertha's husband

POLLY STERNOWITZ, and

ESTHER STERNOWITZ, his daughters

RABBI YIDEL PANKOWER, David's teacher

Henry Roth's only novel was first published in 1934, a year that produced Scott Fitzgerald's Tender Is the Night, Graham Greene's It's a Battlefield, John O'Hara's Appointment in Samarra, William Saroyan's The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze, and Evelyn Waugh's A Handful of Dust. The same year saw the publication of forty-three other works considered memorable enough to be listed in the second edition of Annals of English Literature. Call It Sleep is not listed, nor is the novel or its author referred to in such compendia as Willard Thorp's American Writing in the Twentieth Century or Herzberg's Reader's Encyclopedia of American Literature.

But the novel survived its early neglect. For Call It Sleep is one of those books written in the wrong generation. Just as the poems of Emily Dickinson and the great whale book of Herman Melville waited decades for full appreciation, so Henry Roth's book came to full public attention thirty years after its publication in 1934. One obvious reason for its success in the 1960's is its subject, life in the Jewish Ghetto. In the meantime novelists such as Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, and Philip Roth had made the American Jew significant in contemporary literature. It is no wonder that the American public should respond to another book on this popular subject, especially after it has been called one of the most distinguished novels telling of Jewish life in America.

But the real achievement of the book derives more from technique than from subject. The chief merits of the novel are its harsh but poetic realism, its remarkable power of vivid evocation, and its technical control. Realism implies a picture of life as it is. The life Roth chooses to portray is that of an Austrian Jewish boy enduring four acutely and painfully formative years in the New York ghettos. Reminiscent of Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie and of Stephen Crane's Maggie, Call It Sleep portrays the day-to-day existence of David Schearl with a sophisticated accumulation of sensuous detail. One critic, in fact, believes it must be the noisiest novel ever written, so vivid are the sounds of shouts, groans, whispers, insults, streetcars, clocks, feet tramping, mouths chewing.

Detail for its own sake does not make literature, however. Roth's success is in the relevance of the detail and in the controlled use of detail to stir and alter emotion in the reader. Aunt Bertha, for example, is a bawdy, loud-mouthed woman who exists as a foil to sensitive, fearful David. Through her Roth evokes both the truth of David's uncomfortable life and the necessary sympathy that the reader must have if the novel is to come alive.

Call It Sleep is a masterpiece, and to read it is to be astounded at its neglect. It is difficult to think of another writer (Dickens? Wolfe?) who can recall the agonies of childhood with such urgency and immediacy. David Schearl is a child of his race, his time, his environment, but he is all children as well; one experiences something close to discomfort as his memory is jogged by the universality of David's search for understanding of, and reconciliation with, the world about him.

David's world is presented mainly through a careful documentation of the boy's consciousness, but Roth, in a brilliant stroke, begins with a prologue that creates both the physical and psychological environment with which David will have to struggle. We are taken first to a steamer leaving Ellis Island in 1907. Among the immigrants are David, then about two years old, and his mother, Genya. Albert, the father, had come to America earlier and the family is now to be reunited. But in Albert's behavior there is a coldness markedly different from the outspoken joy that pervades other such groups around him. His remarks to his wife and son are contemptuous and accusatory; in a gesture full of shame and pathetic pride, he snatches David's old-country hat and hurls it into the river simply because he does not want his boy to look like an immigrant.

The prologue is wonderfully graphic, but it is also important as a source of basic themes and metaphors. First, it establishes the Schearls as people in an alien culture, a circumstance that colors the whole novel. Secondly, it establishes another and more profound kind of alienation existing between mother and son, on the one hand, and father on the other. Finally, the prologue suggests a metaphor that underlies the entire work: the voyage that David must take into the alien world of complex experience. In this sense, the sheltering arms of Genya are the old world; David is the immigrant in life who must leave their haven and seek his own meanings in the new culture of maturity. It is one of the particular triumphs of Call It Sleep that these closely related themes lead us from the surface of life to the depths of inner experience, and finally into a pattern that lies under the lives of us all.

The stages of David's three-year voyage shape the four books into which the novel is divided. David is six as the narrative begins. His attachment to his mother is profound, not only for herself but also for shelter given because she stands between him and the icy contempt of his father. Critics have pointed out that the mother-son relationship is strongly Oedipal. Irving Howe has had the wisdom also to observe that through David's observation of the placid and beautiful Genya we are made to relive a relationship that is profoundly touching to most men, whatever its psychiatric implications.

In sharp contrast is the brilliantly realized character of the father: aloof, suspicious, gullible, eaten away by a tragic pride. Albert is at war with the world. His great fear, induced partly by an awareness of his own foreignness and partly by some deeper insecurity, is that he will be laughed at, cheated, made a fool. And so, of course, he is; in an early episode David's immature but meticulous consciousness records that Albert's foreman, Luter, is flattering Albert only in order to be with Genya.

The first two books are largely concerned with the traumas of David's broadening experience: the Luter episode, a repugnant sexual encounter with a neighborhood girl, a terrible thrashing by Albert. In the second book David watches the courting of Aunt Bertha by the laconic Sternowitz and listens in confused fascination to his mother's account of an earlier love affair in Russia. Throughout these chapters Roth portrays with great skill a young boy's developing awareness of sexuality, particularly his uneasy realization that his mother is also a sexual being.

The third book is centered in the Hebrew school, the cheder, where David's intellect is awakened by the rabbi, Yidel Pankower. Pankower is one of the great achievements of the novel, a tragi-comic figure of classic proportions. The cheder dances to the tunes of his invective. David learns rapidly, but one afternoon a verse from Isaiah puzzles him: It tells how Isaiah saw the Lord seated upon a throne and was afraid. Then a seraph touched a fiery coal to Isaiah's lips, and he heard God speak. David yearns to ask about that coal but does not get the chance. At home he asks his mother to explain God. He is brighter than day, she says. And He has all power.

On the first day of Passover there is no school and David wanders toward the East River. He stares at the river, meditating on God's brightness. The experience is almost a mystical trance, but the dazzling contemplation is broken by three boys who come up and taunt him. They can show him magic if he will go to the car tracks and drop a piece of scrap metal in the groove between the tracks. David does so. Suddenly there is a blinding light. David is terrified. His child's mind connects God's power and light with the electrical flash.

David sometimes does not get along with the rough boys of the neighborhood. One day he discovers the roof of the flat as a place of refuge. From there he sees a boy with blond hair flying a kite. Leo Dugovka is confident and carefree and he has skates. Leo is surprised to learn that David knows nothing about the Cross or the Mother and Child. David desperately wants Leo to like him.

Next day David goes on a long walk to Aunt Bertha's candy shop to see if she has any skates he can use. The living quarters behind the store are cramped, dark, and filthy. Bertha tells him to get Esther and Polly out of bed while she watches the store.

Aunt Bertha has no skates. David goes to Leo's flat. There he is attracted to a picture of Jesus and to a rosary. Leo is sexually interested in David's two cousins after he hears about them. Next day Leo promises David the rosary if he will take him to see the girls. Though uncomfortable, David agrees. Leo is successful with Esther, but they are caught in the act by Polly. She tattles.

David is terrified; he will be implicated. At cheder in the afternoon he reads nervously before a visiting rabbi. Bursting into tears, he entangles himself in hysterical lies fabricated out of the secret in his mother's past. He says his mother is dead and that his father was a gentle organist in Europe.

While the puzzled rabbi goes to clear up matters with the Schearls, Nathan is angrily blaming David for what happened to Esther. The rabbi soon learns that David has lied, but the mention of the organist arouses Albert's suspicion. He accuses his wife of unfaithfulness and believes David to be someone else's child. Genya cannot convince him he is wrong.

When Bertha and Nathan arrive, David, terrified, runs into the street while his elders argue violently. Images, recollections, and fears spin through his mind. Finding a steel milk-dipper, he desperately decides to produce God again at the car tracks. At first nothing happens as he inserts the dipper; then, suddenly, he receives a terrific electric shock that knocks him out. The flash draws a crowd of anxious people, but David has not been hurt seriously. Even his father seems slightly relieved that he is all right.

Soon it is night and he can go to sleep and forget it all. In sleep all the images of the past—sights, sounds, feelings—become vivid and alive. While life was painful and terrifying, in sleep he triumphs.

A fundamental aspect of Roth's triumph is his mastery of style. The dialect of a slum street is rendered with unshrinking fidelity; the cultural dilemma of the immigrant is touchingly demonstrated in the disparity between David's American street-language and the dignified language of his home, representing a translation of the family's native Yiddish. When the reader enters David's stream-of-consciousness, language becomes direct experience, and Call It Sleep takes its place beside the great lyrical novels of the century.

It would be tempting to summarize

Roth's achievement through comparisons. One could say that as an example of urban naturalism Call It Sleep rivals the best of Dreiser and Farrell; that in some elements of its stylistic virtuosity it rivals the work of Joyce; that as a novel of growing up it must be ranked with Huckleberry Finn and Look Homeward, Angel. Yet such comparisons are beside the point. What one most admires about the novel, what must make it survive, is the incomparable richness of its experience re-created in the totality and finality of the work of art.

In The Cannibal, one of the most accomplished American "experimental" novels of the 1940's, John Hawkes makes Spitzen-on-the-Dein representative of Germany during the early stages of the Allied occupation after World War II; it is also the scene of an extended flashback to World War I. With the collapse of normality in every phase of their daily lives during both wars, the people of the town move upon a nightmare landscape. Even in the midst of almost total ruin, aristocratic, majestic Madame Stella Snow, who runs a boardinghouse, feels a sense of community. Most of the major characters are tenants in Stella's house. Stella's sister Jutta, who was about the age of her little girl, Selvaggia, at the end of the first war, has always lived a life of rigid restraint, but now, neither man nor woman, she wallows in listless sexuality with Zizendorf, leader of the insurrection, while the drunken Census-Taker watches. The Duke, a brave tank commander during the war, is already in pursuit of Jutta's effeminate son when the novel begins. Resentful of Stella, Jutta fears her family's and the Duke's aristocratic heritage and has no sense of patriotism. The only person Selvaggia fears is Herr Stintz, the one-eyed school teacher, who plays a dirge on his tuba every night and who is perversely attracted to her. Balamir, escapee from the local asylum, lives in the basement; the real or imagined son of the Kaiser, he thinks of Stella as the Queen Mother.

Fragmented images of the landscape, past and present, are repeated as haunting motifs throughout the novel. The scenic props of the glorious German past rot in the present: flags, brass band instruments. The architecture is expressive of the Germanic concept of the race's soul: the focus in 1914 is the Sportswelt Brauhaus and Stella's ancestral house; in 1945, it is the asylum and Stella's rooming house. The novel begins, repeatedly refers to, and ends with the asylum, situated just outside town. Animals make their lairs in rooms vacated by patients. Balamir and his brother inmates do not realize they are out; they merely move on a landscape that is an objectification of their own private lunacies. The novel is rife with images expressive of the Nordic-Teutonic-Prussian heroic stance and nationalistic tradition; of the relationship between father and son, an exalted notion of family, seen in terms of generations perpetuating ancestral pride; of blustering notions of masculinity and of the enduring long-suffering of females. The degeneration of the race is manifested in dry, sterile, impotent copulation—promiscuity, prostitution, perversion; infected men and women with shaven heads dance a waltz like zombies in a storehouse on the asylum grounds; Allied parachutists rape women whose vaginas are packed with poison; pregnant women expose themselves to death by freezing, while others suckle children as old as six; German soldiers carry suicidal cyanide capsules. These people struggle to survive in a town where there are no clocks, no postal service, no radios, no newspapers, no fluid for embalming corpses; where all the keys for the machines are welded together; where excrement burns in pits, gas explodes in sewers, typhoid breeds in wells, and flabby rubber rafts, corpses, and fog drift in the canal where the ghosts of British tank soldiers come to drink. Across this landscape creep maimed horses, dry cows, terrified birds, mangy chickens, wild dogs that snarl at train wheels, rabid monkeys, and rats. When ravaging animals are turned loose in a world of violent death, mutilation, and disease, and become assimilated into the human population, people begin to respond to one another in animal terms and resort, finally, to cannibalism. In 1914 and again in 1945, an incredible cold grips the landscape; then a damp air descends, the cold dissolves into a fog, and moonlight reveals things soft with rot and the final acts of horror.

Although he has been compared with Kafka, Hawkes resembles him not at all in technique. Kafka's seemingly unreal world is presented rationally. While Hawkes' images seize the reader and hold him in a tension created by forces of repulsion and abnormal attraction, he deliberately attempts to break the illusion of reality by employing literary elements and devices that act upon one another in such a way that the dream becomes reality, making questions of literary appropriateness irrelevant. Elements of parody, black humor, lyricism, mock sentimentality, farce, and the conscious, controlled use of clichés cause frequent, sudden, and absurd shifts in tone and perspective. Through an eclectic method that is more often expressionistic than impressionistic, Hawkes attempts to project a series of images that reflect the mental climate of an ignobly defeated people whose aspirations were pathologically nationalistic. Hawkes uses a point of view strategy which makes great demands of the reader; if the reader co-operates, he finds himself in the same relation to the author that exists between the novel's victims and victimizers. Obsessed by the past, Zizendorf, editor of the town's defunct newspaper, The Crooked Zeitung, is the surrounding narrator. As the present action begins, he is preparing to kill Leevey, the Jewish-American soldier who patrols one third of the nation on a rusty motorcycle as its sole overseer. Zizendorf's monomaniacal purpose is to free his people, rebuild the town, and resuscitate the old nationalistic pride. Thus it is appropriate that all the streams of consciousness, the nighttime reveries and nightmares of the other characters, converge and become assimilated in him. He is the voice, the mind, the collective subconscious of vanquished Germany.

With this device, so expressive of his theme, Hawkes shifts frequently from one character to another—illogically, in view of Zizendorf's limited access to the raw materials of his narrative; but there is a kind of Jungian truth in this technique. The shifts are made without preparation, as thoughts shift erratically in a deranged mind. The reader is into a scene; then, suddenly, he is briefly somewhere else; then he is thrust into yet another character's field of vision. Sometimes the shift is made within a sentence. Though there are few scenes of sustained length, Hawkes will present, after a relatively long scene, a series of brief images, bringing the separate action of each character forward a little, usually with ironic effect.

But there is almost none of the sustained stream of consciousness passages one finds in Virginia Woolf or Joyce. Hawkes' characters simply respond to the stimuli the author provides for all their senses. In Hawkes' surreal (but all too real) world, the reader's senses are assaulted by violent odors, ghastly sights, eerie sounds, foul tastes; and he feels the touch of soft rot. The characters are defined in terms of extreme experiences to which they are always subordinate. A relative lack of individualization gives the effect of a single, many-faceted character. Thus, the all-embracing mind of Zizendorf, the Hitlerian temperament re-emergent, becomes the reader's own consciousness; to his horror, he discovers that it is a consciousness in which values of all kinds are suspended, just as in a dream we commit or witness atrocities upon which we make no judgments. What the reader experiences are extreme moments of bestiality, not as a social creature, but as a beast would experience them—purely.

Hawkes uses a technique that is more poetic and cinematic than novelistic. The shifts among points of view are made by a method of juxtaposition, or montage. The juxtaposition of poetic images, which are charged with vivid visual components expressive of theme, character, and event, has the effect one experiences when two shots in a movie are juxtaposed to create a third dimension of emotion or thematic significance. The rhythm of the movie camera is, at its best, the rhythm of poetry rather than that of prose. The montage is essentially the method of Eliot's The Waste Land, which, along with "The Hollow Men," is one poetic influence upon The Cannibal. Eliot's principle of the objective correlative is basic to this novel. Hawkes externalizes the internal neuroses of a people. The method of juxtaposition operates throughout the book, within each section, each scene, and often within each paragraph and sentence, creating a kind of continuity that proceeds according to a logic quite different from that of a conventional novel. Here again the effect of pure vision—of things seen as they are—is apparent. Hawkes' images come to the reader as though from electronic impulses bounced off the moon rather than from an author; with the distance of a movie director, he achieves control and restraint in the way he handles images which assail us as though poured out chaotically by an extremely undisciplined writer. The roving camera eye—going in and out of focus, zooming in like a telephoto lens for a microscopic scrutiny of, for instance, the mouth of the dead merchant clotted with cobwebs—is being very coldly guided. A vividly descriptive style which employs all the devices of rhetoric enhances the impact of these images.

There is as little order in the sequence of images as there is in the spread of shrapnel; as though a camera caught it in slow motion, that is what we see—the explosion of a mine which the reader steps on in Hawkes' field of view. Just as there are lines of force in an explosion that give it a unity, which the victim cares little to imagine, so beneath the apparent chaos of the novel's images and occasional scenes, a pattern of events may be discerned. The novel is in three parts; the present action in 1945 surrounds an extended flashback to events in 1914. This structure emphasizes the oneness of the two wars; and within each chapter the method of juxtaposition conveys a sense of the simultaneity of all events.

If in Part I Hawkes tries to make the reader feel he is having hallucinations, he deliberately eases him into a rather traditional narrative occurring around 1914. Stella sings in the Sportswelt Brauhaus; Ernst, the son of Herman Snow, the proprietor, falls in love with her. A coward, Ernst resents his father, a virile lover, sportsman, and soldier, who urges him to "join in the chase"; sullenly, bitterly observing the masculine way of the frequenters of the Brauhaus, Ernst, too, wants to earn a place in Valhalla. When Cromwell, a friend of Herman, takes Stella home in a carriage, Ernst desperately runs after them. An English traitor, Cromwell admires the German spirit of nationalism, tradition of heroism, and ideals of conquest; he is eager to see it demonstrated in a prolonged war.

War begins the next day. Hawkes presents the members of Stella's family, including the children's nurse Gerta. The mother dislikes the world she sees, but the ninety-year-old father, a general, who is dying, shouts "War!" at breakfast and "Victory!" at noon, thinking the war is already over. Women and children, Hawkes shows, are the innocent victims of such insane masculinity: a lone British plane falls in the marketplace and the mother is killed. Stella nurses the old general, who dies with his plumed helmet on his chest. Already prefigured in the death of Stella's parents, the decline of the German nation is symbolized by the death of the old horse that moves between the lower world of dogs and the upper world of the mountains where Stella and Ernst go on their honeymoon. A parallel to this old horse is the legless, headless statue of a horse in the square, a monument to the heroic past. When Cromwell arrives in the mountains, gleefully reciting the details of the war and praising the German troops, Ernst and Stella return to Stella's house; in her father's room, Ernst is dying of a fever.

A further suggestion of decline is Herman Snow's failure as a soldier and a lover; he encounters Gerta in the wreckage of the Brauhaus where she goes in the course of her promiscuous prowling among soldiers. Hawkes' montage method operates with great rapidity, shuttling back and forth over the ruined town (images of which are a mild foreshadowing of the devastation of World War II) between Gerta and Herman and Stella and Ernst; the strong women take care of the weak men. The role of coincidence in such a world is demonstrated when Gerta brings Herman to the very room where Stella is nursing Ernst. Herman, who had imagined, in his own delirium, of passing on to Ernst the spirit of love and war, accuses his son of "feigning."

At the end of the 1914 section, Hawkes focuses on Jutta. A student of architecture when the war began, she has gone into a convent and is seriously ill with a fever; she is a victim of the stern love of the mother superior and is violated by the Ober-Leutnant who is staying overnight at the convent. It is her vision of life that Hawkes would have us see: not miraculous, yet clear; not right, though undeniable. The perspective on life which circumstances give these people is one divested of a moral dimension; it is simply clear (and by it we see clearly and are terrified) and undeniable (though under "normal" circumstances we daily deny it to maintain our precarious sanity).

By returning, at the opening of Part III, to Zizendorf where he left him on the embankment of the Autobahn, Hawkes makes his structure comment thematically upon his raw material: the present encloses and carries forward the past. The bizarre parallels of nightmares pervade the novel, merging past and present. While the Duke pursues Jutta's son, Jutta, who has been taking care of the drunken Census-Taker, sleeps; but her little girl, Selvaggia, watches for her brother at the window. Passing through the sleeping mother's room, Herr Stintz finally goes to Selvaggia. Though his single eye is the threatening moon in whose glare all horror occurs, Selvaggia goes with him, and thus, like most Hawkes victims, collaborates in her own violation. He wants the child, who has been protected from the slaughter of the Allied offensive, to witness her father's, Zizendorf's, murder of Leevey; then Stintz intends to inform. While this psychological rape is going on, the Duke corners Jutta's son in a wrecked movie theater, where Stella's son, who returned from the war with only one leg, lives with his wife; Stella's son is flattered by the Duke's visit. Before Zizendorf kills Leevey, Hawkes provides a long flashback to the day when the American Colonel and Leevey first came to the town to execute Miller, the pastor who had changed his views during the war. Stintz, out of a motiveless malice, and the Mayor, from fear of the Colonel, had co-operated: Zizendorf had been forced to join the firing squad and it was his bullet that killed the pastor. Miller fell into the frozen canal, where his body thawed and bloated in the fog. It is appropriate that Zizendorf should begin his insurrection by killing a Jew. But Hawkes makes of Leevey merely a simple soldier who says, "Hi ya, Mac," and wishes he were back in the delicatessen. When Jutta's husband was reported missing in Siberia, Zizendorf took over both Jutta and the editorship; Hawkes connects Zizendorf with the husband by having Jutta, seconds before Zizendorf kills Leevey, reread a letter in which her husband tells of shooting a Russian leader from his horse. After Leevey strikes the log in the road, Hawkes shifts back to the morning of his death when, ironically, he had lain with a vicious German girl who infected him with disease. With the insurrection under way, Hawkes has Stella, the strong woman whom Zizendorf admires, recall the riot in the insane asylum, a riot that began among the monkeys kept for experiments and spread to the psychopaths. Under Stella's leadership, it was the women, bereft of men, who put down the riot. The continuation of this ironic juxtaposition climaxes the book: with the institution of a new government, the insane people who have been at large return to the madhouse. Society's pathological drives are pushed underground once more, while their manifestations are worked out in various guises of normality until the nightmare of history visits us again. Childhood fears, in Hawkes' prophetic vision, prove to refer to the childhood of the race which civilization never entirely outgrows.

When the riot began, Stella was strangling a mangy chicken under the gaze of Balamir, who had just escaped from the asylum. As the Duke hacks up the body of Jutta's son with a rusty sword cane as though the child were a fox, furious with himself for his lack of aristocratic finesse, Zizendorf tosses Leevey's body among countless other dead soldiers in the swamp; handbills inciting the people to rise up against the Allies are being printed in the chicken house behind Stella's place; Stella is nursing Balamir, who, ironically, is thinking of himself as the one who will free his people and rebuild the town; learning from Selvaggia of Stintz's betrayal, Zizendorf bludgeons him with the old man's tuba, carts the body to the Mayor's house, sets fire to it, while the Mayor sleeps fitfully, as he has throughout the novel, afflicted with chronic nightmares of Miller. As Zizendorf goes to sleep with Jutta, Selvaggia, seeing the fire, stays awake with her fears. Stella accepts the Duke's invitation to dinner (she does not know that she will eat the body of her nephew whom she has rejected as having no resemblance to her aristocratic family); a few seconds later Zizendorf's handbill invites her to kill Americans. Thus, she becomes one of the cannibals of her reverie in 1914. Ironically, the Duke is driven to the extreme act of cannibalism at that very moment when Zizendorf has succeeded (or so he is convinced) in restoring order and well-being; nor does the Duke know that Zizendorf has made him Chancellor; other

"qualified" persons have been appointed to positions in the new government. Hawkes' irony asserts that Zizendorf's methods perpetuate and will ultimately reaffirm the kind of atrocity the Duke has committed, for the German (and in a sense all) national ego grows out of the carnage of its past wars. The piecemeal mutilation of Ernst in his bungling duels anticipate the butchering of Jutta's son; Ernst dies clutching one of the Christ figures carved by an old idiot in a shack near the mountain hotel. Men become Christs or cannibals.

The Cannibal is a short novel. It can be experienced in one sitting, just as one can suffer a nightmare in one sleeping. But just as the aura of some nightmares persists throughout the day, this is a nightmare from which the reader as cannibal is a long time waking.

THE CARETAKER

Author: Harold Pinter (1930-)

Time: The present

Locale: A house in west London

First presented: 1960

Principal characters:

DAVIES, the proposed caretaker

ASTON, a tenant who lives in the room and takes care of Davies for a time

MICK, Aston's brother and owner of the house in which they have a room

The Caretaker is a dramatic study of the relations among three men in a cluttered, unkempt, crudely furnished room: Aston, the slow-witted tenant, a man in his early thirties; Mick, the landlord, who is Aston's younger brother; and Davies, an old tramp subsisting on the brothers' hospitality. At the beginning of the play, which takes place entirely within the confines of a single room, Aston has rescued Davies from a fight at a nearby café. Because the old man has been fired from his job at this establishment, Aston has brought him to the room. Charitably he gives Davies a chair, a bed, and a little money, and offers him cigarettes, a pair of shoes, and a job as caretaker of the flat—an offer that is repeated by Mick. But Davies' persistent complaints about the arrangements made for him gradually antagonize the brothers, and at the end of the play, in a moment that is almost tragic in impact, Davies is driven out. The power of the play derives from the skill with which Pinter moves his characters toward the inevitability of this final expulsion.

Davies is established at the outset of the drama as a lonely derelict, at once pathetic and ludicrous. From the moment that Aston ushers him into the room, the audience sees that he is utterly dependent on the kindness and generosity of his host. So simple a convenience as a chair to sit on gives Davies satisfaction, for this is a man deprived of common comforts, dispossessed of the amenities and securities that insulate the life of the average working man. During his job at the café, he says, he could never get a seat during the tea break. But Davies is less often grateful for small favors than dissatisfied with large ones. In spite of his position as a mendicant, he masquerades as a man to be reckoned with. He tells Aston, for example, that the fight at the café started because he refused to empty a bucket of rubbish because he thought the task beneath his position and he resented this affront to his dignity as an old man. He therefore challenged the Scotsman who had given him the order (as he later threatens the innocuous Aston with a knife), but actually he was capable only of saying what he might have done to his antagonist had he been younger, or what he may do later in revenge. His Falstaffian bravado collapsed in the face of imminent violence, from which Aston saved him just in time. In retrospect, he is forced to admit that the Scotsman could have put him in the hospital with a single punch.

The incident, even in the retelling, graphically reveals the central paradox in Davies' character: the conflict between his situation and his pretensions. He is a beggar with appalling arrogance, a petty, useless hobo who presumes to be a man of stature and importance. His presumption takes a number of forms. He is fanatically xenophobic, denouncing to Aston the numbers of Poles, Greeks, and Blacks who would crowd him out of a seat at the café; he accepts pipe tobacco only after explaining that he has been recently robbed of a tin of it; he declares that he has dined in the best company, that he abandoned his wife shortly after their marriage because of her slovenly housekeeping. He contends, too, that he has a number of friends who help him, among them a lavatory attendant who gives him soap, and he repeatedly maintains that papers establishing his identity are available in Sidcup, where he intends to go as soon as the weather clears. But as the play proceeds, Davies' claims, his demands, and his cantankerous assertiveness gradually appear for what they are, the threadbare covering of a helpless old man, clutching desperately at the rags of a tattered self-respect. The story about his papers is patently spurious, and even his name is subject to question, for he has been living much of his life, he says, under the pseudonym of Jenkins. He pretends to be a connoisseur of shoes, preferring leather to suede and pointedly expressing his dissatisfaction with the fit of the footwear offered him by Aston, but he must confess that his own shoes are almost entirely worn out. He does not like his bed, which is situated directly under an open window and is consequently exposed in the night to rainy gusts, but he has no other place to sleep and must accept it.

In large part, of course, Davies' character is defined and elicited by the two other figures in the play. Each punctures the old man's noxious presumptuousness in a different way, Aston by his disarming modesty and Mick by his cool, cruelly penetrating tone of sustained mockery. Aston is deceptively mild in appearance and manner. He is thoughtful, quiet, patient, and generous to a fault, qualities which make him seem the perfect putty for Davies' rather heavy-handed manipulation. When Davies rejects the proffered shoes, Aston does not chide his guest for ingratitude; instead, he returns to the room, in the third act, with another pair of shoes. He opens not only his house and purse to Davies, but also his heart; in a long speech at the end of Act II, he unfolds the bleak horror of his past—of his early hallucinations, of the insidious rumor which sent him to a mental institution, of the electric shock treatment he received there, of his discharge, of his present life as a kind of human vegetable. Aston, in fact, is clearly the sort of man who needs the compassion that a personal caretaker would give him, and he seems unconsciously to imply this fact when he offers Davies the job of caretaker; the meaning of the term vacillates between "house janitor" and "sympathetic guardian." Pinter exploits this ambiguity throughout the play. But the ambiguity is especially enriched by the circumstances in which the job offer is made. As a crude, demanding intruder, Davies is fitted to be a caretaker in neither sense. On the contrary, we see from the beginning that as a homeless, destitute old man, he himself requires a caretaker. In Aston, his kindly, unassuming, uncomplaining host, Davies thinks that he has found his man.

But Davies woefully underestimates Aston. The old man shortly discovers that his modest host is perfectly capable of self-assertion when the occasion demands. On the morning after their first night in the room together, Aston charges Davies with jabbering in his sleep, creating a disturbance that awoke Aston. The next morning, when Davies complains that rain and wind came in upon him through the open window as he slept, and he therefore demands that the window be closed, Aston insists that the window shall remain open. Still later, in Act III, Aston reacts sharply when Davies explodes over the treatment he has been getting. After accepting the second pair of shoes which Aston offers him, after churlishly objecting to the color of the laces, Davies goes to sleep. Once more his mutterings awaken Aston, who in turn arouses the old man. When Davies spews out a torrent of abuse at Aston's mental status and draws a knife on him, Aston quietly tells the old man that he smells and that he must leave. Davies can do nothing for the moment except leave. He goes off in a flurry of feckless imprecations.

From his first encounter with Davies at the end of Act I, Mick is almost ruthlessly in command, supremely confident of his power to strip away every one of Davies' pretensions and to expose him for the selfish, useless parasite he is. Davies, significantly clad only in his underwear, is rummaging in a sideboard drawer when Mick enters the room, surprises him, forces him to the floor, and calmly launches on a cross-examination calculated to drive the old man mad. He taunts Davies by withholding his trousers, all the while questioning him about his name, his bed, his sleep of the night just passed, his reason for being in the room, and his intentions, all the time mockingly pretending that Davies might be a prospective tenant of limitless means. When Aston enters the room with a bag for Davies, Mick takes it and teases Davies with it before letting him have it. It is Mick, too, who restates Aston's offer of the caretaking job, but he defines the duties in flamboyantly elaborate terms. The man he wants, he tells Davies, must be a first-class interior decorator capable of transforming the rudely furnished room into a sumptuously appointed flat. Davies, of course, is compelled to admit that he has no such qualifications; this is only one of the many retractions and evasions to which Mick's merciless questioning drives him. The final blow comes in Act III when Davies turns to Mick for support against Aston, who has just asked Davies to leave. With that astounding presumption which has marked his conduct and attitude from the beginning, Davies expects to displace Aston in Mick's affection, in effect, to gain Mick as a caretaker. But it shortly becomes clear that Mick has no intention of evicting his own brother, for whom he has generously provided living quarters; instead, he tells Davies that Aston can do what he likes with the house. At this point Aston returns and firmly repeats his order that Davies must go. It is a tribute to Pinter's power as a playwright that Davies' plight here is almost tragic. He has proved himself a thoroughly boorish, obnoxious, petulant, cranky, and ungrateful guest, but he somehow holds out sympathy in the final moments of the play. He is no longer ludicrous; he is now desperate and forlorn. The would-be caretaker must roam the world in search of care.

In the light of this ending, the play might be called a comedy-turned-tragedy. It has its moments of laughter, for Pinter has an uncanny gift for reproducing the banalities of ordinary conversation—its trudging pace, its cul-de-sacs, its involutions, its maddening regressions. His dialogue, therefore, is often amusing, as are the ludicrous claims, evasions, and self-deceptions of Davies. But like the climate in so many of Pinter's plays, the atmosphere of The Caretaker is subtly, treacherously charged with potential menace. The characters who move about in the room are never directly exposed to the dangers of the outside world, but Davies must sleep with a gas stove above his head (the gas jets make him apprehensive), and with the wind and rain blowing in upon his head. He wants to close the window, to insulate himself from the world outside, but Aston will not let him; and it is into that world that Aston ultimately thrusts him. As the curtain falls on the final act, one is left with the spectacle of a lonely, desolate, dispossessed man, still talking of papers in Sidcup which do not exist.

CAT AND MOUSE

Type of work: Novel
 Author: Günter Grass (1927-)
 Time: World War II
 Locale: Danzig, Germany
 First published: 1963

Principal characters:

PILENZ, the narrator and an admirer of Mahlke
 JOACHIM MAHLKE, a frail boy with a large and active Adam's apple
 TULLA POKRIEFKE, a skinny girl
 FATHER GUSEWSKI, a practical-minded priest
 WALDEMAR KLOHSE, a severe school principal

The spiritual recovery of Germany has lagged far behind its economic recovery, and nowhere has this lag been more apparent than in the failure of German literature to regain the eminence it had attained before World War II in the work of Thomas Mann, Franz Kafka, and Herman Hesse. All of these writers diagnosed the malady then festering in the German soul, a spiritual malaise to be seen in the horrors of the Nazi regime. That malady and its effects have been long in healing, but the recent emergence of several writers of the first rank suggests that the new Germany is finding its voice and being spiritually reborn. Perhaps the most notable among them, certainly the most heralded, is Günter Grass, whose first novel, The Tin Drum, established him as a major figure in the postwar rehabilitation of German literature. In Cat and Mouse, his second novel, he reinforces his claim to that status by perceptively probing into what continues to ail the German spirit.

Though narrated in 1961 by an adult named Pilenz, who works as a secretary for a parish settlement house, Cat and Mouse is set in the years of World War II, when Pilenz was a teenager and schoolboy. Caught up in the dull round of secular life in a socialist state and poignantly aware of a great spiritual emptiness in his world (he is a Catholic who lost his belief in God in his youth), Pilenz feels compelled to tell the story of his boyhood friend, Joachim Mahlke, who disappeared, after deserting the army, by diving into a sunken minesweeper where they played as boys and Mahlke had a secret retreat. Though fifteen years have elapsed since then and the time of writing, Pilenz has anxiously sought out Mahlke on every occasion and in every place where he could possibly appear; he has never given up hope that his friend will "resurface." Thus Cat and Mouse is dedicated, as it were, to resuscitating the spirit of Mahlke, to rediscovering a spiritual basis for German life and art.

The resuscitation, or the writing of the novel by Pilenz, is a complicated matter. Time has dimmed and confused his memory, so that his story is as much a reconstruction of the past as a recollection of it, as much the re-creation of Mahlke, and of that part of himself Mahlke represents, as memory. A self-conscious artist, Pilenz realizes that his story, written out of inner necessity, is like all art a fusion of reality and the imagination. What he remembers most vividly, providing him with a grip on the past and himself, is a boyhood scene in which he or one of his friends—he remembers it differently each time he returns to it—encouraged a black cat to pounce on Mahlke's mouse, that is, his Adam's apple, while he lay asleep. About this fable-like incident Pilenz constructs his tale of how the beast of death eventually kills Mahlke's mouse. Ultimately a novel about writing a novel, Cat and Mouse is a definition and revival of those spiritual qualities lost with Mahlke's disappearance, the dialogue of recollection being a way of making him reappear in the narrator and his public.

Endowed with an abnormally large and active Adam's apple and lacking in qualities of physical grace, Joachim Mahlke was an unnoticed figure among the children of the neighborhood until he learned to swim at the age of fourteen. Thereafter he was a moral force—in leading them in the swim to the sunken boat, in diving into dangerous depths and staying beneath the surface for long periods while collecting trophies, and in being modest and considerate. He was not, however, nature's darling: besides being awkward in appearance and manner, he never tanned and the cold water chilled him blue and coarsened his skin. Furthermore, he had no interest in girls or in displays of virility. Rather, he was driven by self-consciousness to use the power he was blessed with to hide his Adam's apple, to redeem his natural being and shortcomings. For that purpose he devoted himself to self-transcending ideals, represented alternately by the Virgin Mother and military heroes. These provided him with religious idols before which he could kneel in purifying devotion.

Growing up audience-conscious, Mahlke originally wanted to be a clown so that he could make people laugh and help them be happy, but the Catholic Church, the German state through its heroes and schools, and the war sapped his faith and channeled his power toward destructive ends. Eventually, he who had been called the Redeemer by a classmate caricaturist, is refused recognition for his military exploits by the school that had taught him that heroes are made by slaughter in the name of the state, and is led to betray his initial religious and humanistic impulses by the pressure of social and political circumstances. Frustrated in his aspiration to reveal the truth to school children, he is left with nothing to believe in, with no honorable task to perform. His disappearance into the minesweeper comes as a final gesture of knowledge and repudiation, perhaps an awareness of his inability to hide his Adam's apple, certainly a recognition of the inability of his society to harbor his spiritual talents and aspirations or acknowledge their source. Thus his was the hero's dilemma: he was the victim of the contradictions between his inordinate desire to serve and the refusal of the common order to tolerate him and his idol.

The disappearance and absence of the heroic, then, is what ails Germany in Günter Grass's diagnosis. But the traditional heroes are not those whose loss he laments, not the supermen of the Nibelungs championed by Nietzsche and Wagner. What Grass resuscitates, replacing them with the Virgin Mother, is the Christian-chivalric vision in which masculine power is bound in service to feminine tenderness, in which nature is tamed and saved from its inherent evil through devotion to purifying spiritual values, in which the magnetism of love replaces domination by tyrannical force.

Mahlke's ultimate defeat hinges on the triviality of a medal stolen from a war hero at school, a circumstance which seems at first glance a narrative weakness; but it is actually the novel's strength. Though it is in places reminiscent of Kafka's allegory and Mann's irony, conspicuously absent from Cat and Mouse are the demonic powers that haunted and doomed the characters in their works. Pilenz, though he cannot be sure he incited the cat to pounce on Mahlke's mouse, knows he is implicated in his disappearance and so writes out of guilt, using art as a vehicle to redeem his sin. Recognition of what he has lost, of how far he has fallen, implies a spiritual awakening sufficient for the first steps toward freedom from necessity, the bondage of the past. Correspondingly, Grass's fable-like story, blending symbolism and irony with realism, expresses the power of the imagination to transform the "real," to forget enough of the past to entertain ideals again, to believe enough in its spiritual origins and power, as Mahlke did in the Virgin Mother, to make genuine art again possible.

Lyric and comic as well as tragic, the final import of the novel, then, is that the German spirit can face its past with history, avoid possession by its demons, and be aware of the spiritual power and transcendent values necessary for a truly new and healthy life.

CAT ON A HOT TIN ROOF

Author: Tennessee Williams (1914-)

Time: The present

Locale: The Mississippi Delta

First presented: 1955

Principal characters:

BIG DADDY, a wealthy Mississippi landowner of humble origins

BIG MAMA, his wife

GOOPER, a son sometimes called Brother Man

MAE, his wife, sometimes called Sister Woman

BRICK, another son, a dipsomaniac

MARGARET, his wife

On March 24, 1955, The Playwrights' Company presented Tennessee Williams' Cat on a Hot Tin Roof at the Morosco Theatre in New York. The play starred Barbara Bel Geddes as Margaret, the Cat; Ben Gazzara as her troubled husband Brick, and Burl Ives as Brick's Big Daddy. This presentation marked the tenth anniversary on Broadway of Tennessee Williams, who started his string of theatrical successes in 1945 with The Glass Menagerie.

As Williams himself admitted in an article which appeared first in the drama section of The New York Times and then was reprinted as the preface to Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, previously he had been preoccupied with emotions that tend to bind people ever more closely to a cell in solitary from which as prisoners they cry out. Feeling that all of us live in solitary confinement, he believes that we can understand the emotions with which he has clothed his lonely characters. He endeavors to make his audiences feel not only that they understand his characters but also that they can identify themselves with the persons on the stage. Consequently, the subject matter of his plays lies not in the everyday surface aspects, but in those subjects people do not ordinarily talk about, the hidden, inner concerns of spiritual life or spiritual death. But in his plays Tennessee Williams' characters do talk about their problems to such an extent that there is a close rapport between characters and audience whether or not there seems to be a similar closeness between character and character.

Williams' control of his characters is such that, having presented them, they take care of the situations that arise. He seems never to manipulate them; these are no puppets pulled into position by strings. They are, instead, vastly troubled, earthy creatures who speak out their hearts.

The Mississippi Delta family presented in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof is not a pretty one. Ruled over by Big Daddy, who emerged as a wealthy landowner after pulling himself up from the position of overseer, each member has gone his separate, lonely way until the time comes to celebrate Big Daddy's sixty-fifth birthday. One son, Gooper, has a brood of five, going on six. The other son, Brick, is a dipsomaniac whose wife Margaret is childless. Big Mama is a hearty, playful, and vacuous creature.

The plot, involving an attempt by Gooper to get possession of the plantation when Big Daddy dies, is as negligible as Gooper himself. Only three characters are the meat of this play. The people who matter are Big Daddy, Brick, and Margaret.

Each has been living a lonely life, but has put up a front to preserve the social amenities. While they cannot explain themselves to one another, the explanation of their thoughts and feelings comes clearly across the footlights in language that is as bold as their thoughts.

Brick and Margaret have been living under a sort of truce since the death of Skipper, whom Margaret had accused of being in love with Brick. Brick accused Margaret of responsibility for distorting the friendship between himself and Skipper to such an extent that Skipper took to drink and succeeded in blotting himself out. Brick and Skipper had been such a successful pass combination in college football that they could not resist the attraction of a professional team. Margaret, by then married to Brick, felt that the boys refused to grow up to their adult responsibilities, but went along with them as an ardent rooter for their team. Before long they were a jealous triangle. After Skipper drank himself to death, Brick refused to sleep with Margaret and began to drown his own sorrows.

This much comes out in the first act, which is really an extended monologue by Margaret. She feels that the situation has become so intense that she is merely a cat trying to stay on a hot tin roof as long as possible. She intends to stay if she can because she loves Brick.

He is almost oblivious of her, though patient in an impersonal sort of way. Each day he drinks until he feels a click in his head that promises peace for a while. On this day, Big Daddy's birthday, he has not yet been able to drink enough to feel the click. The night before he had broken his ankle while trying in the dark to jump the hurdles on the high school athletic field, and so he has not attended the birthday dinner. The rest of the family intends to celebrate the cutting of the birthday cake in his room to have him join in the festivities. Impatient and inarticulate, Brick wants nothing to do with any of them, but Margaret persuades him to be as gentle as possible with Big Daddy, who does not know that the doctors, although assuring him that he suffers only from a spastic colon, have really found him fatally ill with cancer.

The second act is again almost a monologue carried on by Big Daddy with Brick as the nearly silent objective, just as he was in the first act with Margaret. After the candles on the cake have been lighted, Big Daddy practically orders the rest of the family out of the room, as he is determined to uncover the reason for Brick's drinking. In an intense scene Big Daddy pierces through Brick's protective armor by showing that he has had to develop a tolerance for people in spite of their habitual lying and by admitting that he has endured the company of Big Mama and Gooper, although he has hated them for years. It is with love that he reaches through to Brick. When Brick finally explains his reason for drinking, Big Daddy finds it incomplete until Brick remembers that the last time he had talked to Skipper he had hung up on a telephone call during which Skipper had tried to make a drunken confession. Pointing out that Brick was disgusted with himself for failing to face the truth of the situation, Big Daddy feels that he has found the reason he looked for. But Brick, emotionally involved as he is, faces one truth with another and tells his father that the doctors have lied to him. There is only one satisfaction for both men; neither has ever lied to the other, though they have lived among liars all their lives.

When Tennessee Williams gave this play to Elia Kazan to read, Kazan, who was to direct the play, objected to the third act on three counts. He thought Big Daddy too vivid to be kept off stage after the second act. He wanted Brick to show some effect of his father's loving insight in the second act. And he wanted Margaret to appear more sympathetic to the audience as the play ended. Williams debated the first suggestion; a return of Big Daddy could only be an anticlimax after the second act. He thought Brick's paralysis of spirit could not undergo a change so soon after even so revealing a diagnosis. But he was willing to make Maggie the Cat as charming to the audience as she had become to him. In the published play, therefore, the reader has a choice of two third acts; the original as Williams wrote it, and the version used in the Broadway production.

The third act is involved with Gooper's telling Big Mama that her husband really has cancer and suggesting a plan of trusteeship for the plantation after Big Daddy dies. Big Mama will have none of Gooper's plan. Instead, she turns to Big Daddy's favorite, Brick, and suggests that Big Daddy would like best to leave the place to Brick's son if he had one. Aroused by the noise of a family argument inside and a thunderstorm outside the house, Big Daddy comes back. Margaret, telling him she has kept his big birthday present until last, announces that she is carrying Brick's baby. As Big Daddy goes out happily to look over his land, Gooper and his wife pounce on Margaret and declare that she is lying. Brick defies them both. As the play ends, he feels the click of peacefulness and prepares to make Margaret's lie come true.

As is usual with Tennessee Williams' plays, there were mixed reactions among the reviewers following its dramatic presentation. Some found it deep in theme and insight; some found it enjoyable; some thought Williams had evaded the main issue; some thought it had tremendous dramatic impact. All agreed that it had an important place in the Williams canon.

In 1961 the publication of Catch-22 became an occasion for some rather free-wheeling critical acclaim. Many reviewers called it the best novel out of World War II, and at least one proclaimed it the best American novel out of anywhere in years. "Comic," "horrifying," "Rabelaisian," "exhilarating," "devastating," "rowdy," "cruelly sane," "compellingly moving"—these were among the epithets used to describe Joseph Heller's rambunctious first novel. In short, the book got off the ground with all the speed and thrust of jet propulsion.

Some of this acclaim was probably a tribute to the author's daring and prodigality. At a time when most of our young writers appeared so much obsessed by the idea of the well-made novel that their books tended to resemble carefully composed mood studies or tone poems, Joseph

Heller broke all the rules. But energy and imagination such as he displayed are determinants rather than coordinates in fiction. The simple truth is that Catch-22 is somewhat less and something more than the conventional novel. As a novel it is turgid, loose-jointed, and always threatening to break out at the seams. As a piece of writing, however, it is an altogether remarkable performance. Ferociously and bawdily funny in part, banal in spots, fantastically gruesome at times, it achieves a lunatic identity and wild inner logic of its own. The book is what one might expect in a collaboration between Kafka and Crazy Kat, to which have been added dialogue passages by a Hemingwayesque master of speech patterns, some scatological scenes suggested by Henry Miller, hallucinated nonsense out of Lewis Carroll, and some chunks of the most undisciplined writing since Thomas Wolfe. It is not, as some have suggested, Mauldin's cartoons in prose or an American version of The Good Soldier: Schweik. It is a collage of wartime violence, sex, military snafu, black market dealing, hymns of hate, and guffaws of gutty humor.

The scenes shuttle back and forth between Pianosa, an imaginary Italian island where an Air Force bombing group is sweating out the closing months of World War II, and Rome where the flyers go on leave to stage latter-day Roman orgies in that city of prostitutes. Men who behaved like madmen, as Heller notes, were awarded medals. In a world of madmen at war the maddest—or the sanest—of all is Captain John Yossarian, a bombardier of the 256th Squadron. Having decided that death in war is a matter of circumstance and having no wish to be victimized by any kind of circumstance, he tries by every means he can think of—malingerer, defiance, cowardice, irrational behavior—to get out of the war. That was his resolve after the disastrous raid over Avignon, when Snowden, the radio-gunner, was shot almost in two, splashing his blood and entrails over Yossarian's uniform and teaching the bombardier the cold, simple fact of man's mortality. For some time after that Yossarian refused to wear any clothes, and when General Dreedle, the wing commander, arrived to award the bombardier a Distinguished Flying Cross for his heroism, military procedure was upset because Yossarian wore no uniform on which to pin the medal. Yossarian's logic of non-participation is so simple that everyone thinks him crazy, especially when he insists that "they" are trying to murder him. His insistence gets him into an argument with Clevinger, who is bright and always has an excuse or an explanation for everything. When Clevinger wants to know who Yossarian thinks is trying to murder him, the bombardier says that everyone of "them" is trying. Clevinger says he has no idea who "they" can be. Yossarian then asks how he knows that "they" are not. Clevinger merely sputters.

Yossarian goes off to the hospital complaining of a pain in his liver. If he has jaundice, the doctors will discharge him; if not, they will send him back to duty. Yossarian spends some of his time censoring the enlisted men's letters. To some he signs Washington Irving's name as censor. On others he crosses out the letter but adds loving messages signed by the chaplain's name. The hospital would have been a good place to stay in for the rest of the war if it had not been for a talkative Texan and a patient so cased in bandages that Yossarian wondered at times whether there was a real body inside. When he returns to his squadron he learns that Colonel Cathcart, the group commander, has raised the number of required missions to fifty. Meanwhile Clevinger had dipped his plane into a cloud one day and never brought it out again. He and his plane simply vanished, and now he is not around the officers' club any longer to explain what had happened that time.

It is impossible for Yossarian to complete his tour of combat duty because, first, Colonel Cathcart wants to get his picture in The Saturday Evening Post and, second, to become a general. Consequently he continues to increase for his outfit the number of required missions above those required by 27th Air Force Headquarters. By the time he has set the number at eighty, Kraft, McWatt, Kid Sampson, and Nately are dead, Clevinger and Orr have disappeared, the chaplain has been disgraced (the C.I.D. accuses him of the Washington Irving forgeries), Aarfy has committed a brutal murder, Hungry Joe screams in his sleep night after night, and Yossarian is still looking for new ways to stay alive. It is also impossible for him to be sent home on medical relief because of Catch-22. As Doc Daneeka, the medical officer, explains, he can ground anyone who is crazy, but anyone who wants to avoid combat duty is not crazy; so he cannot be grounded. This is Catch-22, the inevitable loophole in the scheme of justice, the self-justification of authority, the irony of eternal circumstance. Catch-22 explains Colonel Cathcart, who continues to raise the number of missions and volunteers his men for every dangerous operation in the Mediterranean theater. He also plans to have prayers during every briefing session but gives up that idea when he learns that officers and enlisted men must pray to the same god. It explains the struggle for power between General Dreedle, who wants a fighting outfit, and General Peckem of Special Services, who wants to see tighter bombing patterns—they look better in aerial photographs—and issues a directive ordering all tents in the Mediterranean theater to be pitched with their fronts facing toward the Washington Monument. It explains Captain Black, the intelligence officer who compels the officers to sign a new loyalty oath each time they get their map cases, flak suits and parachutes, pay checks, haircuts, and meals in the mess. It explains, above all, Lieutenant Milo Mindbinder, the mess officer, who parlays petty black market operations into an international syndicate in which every man, as he says, has a share. By the time he has his organization on a paying basis he has been elected mayor of half a dozen Italian cities, Vice-Shah of Oran, Caliph of Baghdad, Imam of Damascus, and Sheik of Araby. Once he almost makes a mistake by cornering the market on Egyptian cotton, but after some judicious bribery he unloads it on the United States government. The climax of his career comes when he rents his fleet of private planes to the Germans and from the Pianosa control tower directs the bombing and strafing of his own outfit. Men of public decency were outraged until Milo opened his books for public inspection and showed the profit he had made. Then everything is all right, for in the writer's strange, mad world patriotism and profit are indistinguishable; the world lives by Milo's

Eventually Yossarian takes off for neutral Sweden, three jumps ahead of the authorities and less than one jump ahead of Nately's whore, who for some reason or other blames him for her lover's death and tries to kill him, but not before he has spent a night wandering alone through wartime Rome. This portion of the book is appalling in its picture of greed, lust, and brutality. Catch-22 is a work reaffirming the ancient ties of cruelty and humor in its vision of everything vicious and absurd in our muddled society. Joseph Heller seems to say that in this world men of good will must either escape or perish, that if this world is sane, then madness alone makes sense. Without being profound, his novel is a work repudiating the world's values and society's behavior.

Despite its obvious flaws, Catch-22 is brilliant, devastating, apocalyptic, and since its publication it has become a pivotal work in our contemporary literature of the absurd sometimes, and somewhat inaptly, called black humor or bitter comedy. It is not, as in the case of novels out of World War I, a story of initiation. In theme, fable, and mood it deals with the simple, grim realities of survival in a world with all values reversed by the violence of war. As such, it is an assault, made in hilarious prose, on the mechanical, institutionalized, homogenized, anesthetized society we live in today. Black humor has as the objects of its guffawing satire the clichés of thought, feeling, and action that color almost every aspect of modern life, from stereotypes of love, home, religion, and death to the Bomb. If Heller's novel has an underlying purpose, it is to be found in the writer's apparent belief that a comic vision of experience and a sense of the outrageously absurd in human affairs provide the only possible stance for the rational man in a world in which the dividing line between graspable reality and wild fantasy has all but disappeared.

CEREMONY IN LONE TREE

Author: Wright Morris (1910-)

Time: One day in March, 1957

Locale: Acapulco, Mexico; Lincoln, Nebraska; Lone Tree, Nebraska

First published: 1960

Principal characters:

GORDON BOYD, a middle-aged writer

DAUGHTER, his girl friend

WALTER MCKEE, Boyd's boyhood friend, a cattle raiser

GORDON MCKEE, Walter's little grandson

LOIS MCKEE, Walter's wife, once in love with Boyd

TOM SCANLON, Lois' father, ninety years old

CALVIN MCKEE, Scanlon's great-grandson

ETOILE MOMEYER, Calvin's cousin

MAXINE MOMEYER, Lois' sister

BUD MOMEYER, Maxine's husband, a mailman

LEE ROY MOMEYER, Bud's nephew

CHARLES MUNGER, a pathological killer

JENNINGS, a writer of pulp Westerns

In his first nine novels, Wright Morris processed fragments of a vision that focused on the American Land, Character, and Dream. In The Field of Vision, the first novel of a trilogy, these fragments began to cohere. Ceremony in Lone Tree is the second novel in the trilogy.

Morris' usual method has three phases: he describes the scene; next he conducts a roundup of the characters; then he depicts a kind of ceremony that serves to set up significant relationships and to evoke transient moments of self-knowledge which cause a faint transformation in the characters.

Through a flawed pane of glass in the hotel lobby, old Tom Scanlon gazes upon Lone Tree, Nebraska, a ghost town; his view is to the west over the arid plains; but to the east, the prairie town of Polk prospers. Morris describes "The Scene" in such a way as to suggest his themes and to convey an impression of the spiritual desolation of his characters. The ancestors of the old Western pioneers have now turned eastward again. Having no perspective on the present, Scanlon's point of view is restricted to the wasteland; for the rest of the novel, Morris pushes the old man into the background;

In Ceremony in Lone Tree, Morris exhibits most impressively his talent for creating people who illustrate aspects of the American character; if they appear grotesque, they may prove to be similar to the folks next door. In "The Roundup," Morris presents each character in a separate section of his own. Boyd, a self-exiled Nebraska writer, approaches the homeplace from Acapulco, where he has been trying to forget an encounter with his childhood friends, Walter and Lois McKee, at a bullfight in Mexico City. When McKee impulsively invites him to a reunion in honor of Tom Scanlon's ninetieth birthday, Boyd is drawn by perverse nostalgia. To shock the folks back home, he takes with him a woman whom he calls Daughter; audacious, youthful spirit of the present, she sustains him during his journey into the past. Next come the viewpoints of McKee and Lois, who approach Lone Tree from the modern city of Lincoln, Nebraska. McKee has lived his empty life vicariously through Boyd, hoping the hero will fill it with meaning. Lois, the opposite of Daughter, epitomizes the suppression of emotions that make everyone tense and nervous. Characters not presented in The Field of Vision appear next. Maxine Momeyer has a difficult life; her daughter, Etoile, is sexually precocious, and her husband, Bud, has never grown up; when he goes off duty as a mailman, he collects bounty on stray cats by shooting them with a bow and arrow. Etoile is in love with her stuttering cousin Calvin, who rejects people in favor of horses. Events in the present occur within the frame of a recent incident that shocked the world: the slaughter of ten people by Charles Munger of Lincoln, while his friend, Lee Roy, Bud's nephew, killed two bullies with his hotrod. Jennings, who writes pulp Westerns, is so intrigued by the mystery of life that he has no life of his own. Boyd wonders whether he is drawn to these people because they are so hopeless or so full of hope.

Because there are nine viewpoints, with twenty-eight shifts, unity could have become a problem for Morris, but it is maintained by a controlling conception, by various patterns of relationship among the characters, and by a consistency of style among the viewpoints—a sophisticated manipulation of the clichés of everyday speech, as filtered through the third person. The tone is comic, but Morris' mingling of the bizarre and the humorous creates a strange atmosphere in which the comedy frightens as it amuses. In the absence of an overt pattern of novelistic action, the relationships among the characters generate suspense and excitement by the controlled development of their many twists and turns, nuances, suppressions, and flare-ups. To common situations, past and present, the characters' differing responses are always active, creating an impressive sense of motion. In ways representative of Morris, character, theme, and motif evolve organically as the novel moves to its climax.

Like a ghost town movie set, the Lone Tree Hotel inspires the enactment of an outdated drama, the personae of which are Buffalo Bill, Billy the Kid, Santa Claus, Charles Lindbergh, Robin Hood, and Davy Crockett; shifting from one to another, most of the men play roles whose styles were shaped in the American past; less inclined to play roles, the women lament the failure of the men to make something real happen in the present. Nothing is what it seems because the characters are disposed to see anything suggested to them; what is there (fact) is no more vivid than what the mind can project (fiction). In the rhetoric of magic, the effect is that of "now you see it, now you don't." Just as Bud's attic and basement are full of the junk he collects from people on his mail route, each character is a repository of cast-off lives; though Lee Roy can make one smoothly running car out of many wrecked ones, a human may break down if he is a composite of other people with no strong self-nucleus. Boyd is like a carnival barker, talking about freaks who try, in an exaggerated way, to be what they are not.

Trains, cars, bombs, and guns are other outward, material symbols of the American experience and of the personalities of the characters. The plains are like the sea, and everything seems to move like ships over a metaphysical landscape. Experience has blended, and blurred, fact and fiction, nourishing illusions that aggravate the problem of identity. In Lone Tree, where moonlight illuminates the romance and the nostalgia of the past and real events have an aura of the imaginary, the characters behave as though they are in a motion picture and thus free of responsibility, but they experience disillusionment and nausea in the present. In the foreground Morris presents a parody of American popular culture, but in the background hovers the image of the atomic bomb; near the end, past fiction and present fact collide in the lives of the characters and either wake them or lull them to sleep.

To Morris, the suppression of emotion is a trait in the American character; emotion is released vicariously in unconscious parodies of violence. By suddenly expressing their suppressed emotions, Lee Roy and Charles Munger exemplify themes that relate less drastically to the other characters. Though the spirit of the times helped make them what they are, their audacity differs from Boyd's and their violence contrasts with that of the old frontier. In Munger, Morris shows an exaggeration of the nightmare side of the American dream of success: the boy shoots everybody he encounters in order to be somebody. Fear of themselves and of each other, of Munger and his kind, and of atomic annihilation keep the characters tense, but responsive to the unexpected.

In quiet, "normal," even prudish people, Morris suggests, there is an inherent wildness. Giving in to impulse by word or act, each character has a moment of truth, audacity, love, or imagination in which he tastes wildness and freedom. Smothered in Maxine, sexuality breathes deeply in Etoile. Boyd's presence stimulates each character to reveal himself. The reader follows a spontaneous ceremony in which characters rid themselves of the inessentials of the past, improvising upon new personalities. Before the explosion of the bomb (made up of the convergence of lines of tension among the characters), Boyd clowns and indulges in an outburst against the concealment of true feelings. But he is made speechless by the behavior of his old witnesses. Ironically, only Boyd and Scanlon, heroes of the past, fail to act audaciously.

The confrontation of the present with the past is dramatized in the most highly charged of the concentrated moments of which the novel is composed. When Etoile and Calvin roar into the ghost town in a wagon, a dead show dog in back, shot by Bud with his bow and arrow, Boyd's audacity finally affects Lois; she fires her grandfather's Colt .45 as an impulsive act that rouses her from emotional stultification and sets off a beneficial chain reaction among the other characters. Symbolically, she kills her father and the mythic past represented by his father's pistol. Now the past has come full cycle. Scanlon's birthday is his death day, but it also the birth of the present for the others. In the wagon in which he was born, old Scanlon is taken to be buried. But Morris does not allow this sensational event to jar the primary focus, which is on character consciousness; he goes back to points before the incident and presents it over again through several other points of view.

Ceremony in Lone Tree is a continuation of Morris' exploration of the male-female conflict. Having waited long enough for the men to break up the routine and monotony of their lives, the women act. From a ceremony of death, they try to salvage something for the living. In control, the women will build on the ruins created by the sleeping males.

The relationship between a hero and his witnesses, developed in most of Morris' previous novels, ends in Ceremony in Lone Tree. Boyd has always tried, like America, to be more than he is, prompted by his witnesses who have always hoped for something to live by. But between the promise of the amateur and the performance of the master something more than audacity is demanded. Boyd once attempted to walk on water; later he wrote a book about the incident. But in his audacity there is no longer an element of spontaneity and surprise, for after Boyd squirts a bull with pop in Mexico, McKee can anticipate the hero's antics. At the end, Boyd, trapped in his own childhood (in a sense he never left the plains), is asleep at the feet of Scanlon, dead embodiment of the heroic past, while McKee, the disenchanted witness, holds the reins; as they move over a landscape that was once arid plains, McKee gazes over the green wheat of the present, which promises a future unbeguiled by men like Boyd. The present eludes the hero; only the past has pattern. From childhood, he has, as Lois knows, put the later appreciation before the immediacy of the moment. If the kiss Boyd gave her on the porch thrilled Lois, it was the audacity of his own act that charmed Boyd. Lois senses that Boyd's audacity was camouflage, that he was as much afraid of her as McKee was. She sees that Boyd, McKee, and her father have not grown up. Like America itself, they are still adolescent. Hero Boyd and witness McKee begin to merge, but it is not clear whether the virtues and the faults of the two roles will make an effective blend. Having discovered that it gives off no charge in the present, Boyd is free of the past, but he has as yet no indication of a future.

In the behavior of his characters, Morris depicts a conflict between the American past and present; the future is both promising and ominous. His purpose is to free his characters from the past. Concerned almost entirely with immediate or recent happenings, many seem unaware of their captivity in the distant past. Present and past coexist: a fossil himself, Scanlon recalls the exploration of the Western frontier, while overhead a jet crosses the face of the moon. The past is dead and the present is dying because America has failed to realize its promise and now lives in fear of fallout.

The real reason for the reunion is to get Calvin and Etoile together. On the landscape where things began and are now coming to an end, perhaps something can begin for the young lovers. Calvin is trapped in Scanlon's past (which is purely imaginary, for he has confused his father's past with his own uneventful one). But Etoile lives in her own present, eager to precipitate the future. The new generation transforms the past with new forms of audacity. Etoile is Lois' opposite; with Boyd-like audacity, she frees Calvin from the sexual restraint that has prevailed in the past; because the female seizes the day, Calvin experiences with Etoile what Boyd failed to experience with Lois. In the end, when the past and the present confront each other and explode, it is not clear who gains or loses, but the implication is that the ground is cleared, even though none of the younger generation seems promising material out of which to process a meaningful future.

CHICAGO POEMS

Author: Carl Sandburg (1878-1967)

First published: 1916

The publication of Chicago Poems created a furore usually characteristic of the introduction of material that is new both in subject matter and in style. The subject matter frightened and infuriated the conservatives, who insisted that Sandburg's topics were vulgar, indecent, and scarcely poetic. The poetry itself could not be scanned in the conventional way, was "free verse" virtually to the point of chaos, and could not in any sense be called poetically beautiful. Liberal critics and readers, however, such as Harriet Monroe, the editor of Poetry: A Magazine of Verse who had "discovered" Sandburg as she had also "discovered" Vachel Lindsay, was convinced that

Sandburg might be the great democratic poet called for by Walt Whitman and that his style of writing, his Whitmanesque barbaric yawp, was not only his own particular voice in poetry but also exactly the correction that conventional poetry needed to revitalize it.

But even Harriet Monroe's first reaction to Sandburg's totally new kind of writing had been unsympathetic at the beginning, so different was Sandburg from even the unconventional poets of the day. When Sandburg first submitted "Chicago," the title piece in the later volume, and eight other poems to Miss Monroe for publication in Poetry, her first reaction had been one of shock. But as she read on, shock turned to admiration. She published the poems and subsequently championed the author, defending him against the criticism leveled against him after the appearance of Chicago Poems.

The some one hundred and fifty poems in the volume, although of the same style and content, differ rather sharply in quality. At their best they are powerful, harsh when covering harsh subjects, but astonishingly gentle when discussing gentle subjects. At their worst they are chopped-up prose, sometimes duller than spoken language.

In the title poem, "Chicago," Sandburg looks at the boisterous capital of the Middle West, and with great love and admiration catalogues her glories as well as her degradation; or rather, in recognizing her weaknesses and seeing through and beyond them, he arrives at her greatness: the muscular vitality, the momentum, the real life that he loves. He showed Chicago as the capital of the meat-packing industry, the great manufacturer of the Midwest, the crossroads of rail lines. All of these are her glory. But he saw her also as the city of wicked people, of crooks and gunmen, of prostitutes. She is fierce, but she is a city of builders, proud of being sweaty, bareheaded, of destroying and rebuilding. She, like the poet who sings her praises, is proud of being all these things.

The volume continues in this vein. Sandburg sees the city from the scaly underbelly, the tenderloin, looking at it through the eyes of the men and women on the streets, the lost, the underprivileged, the exploited, the lonely, the hated. In these poems he is, as he was called, the "mystical mobocrat." So comprehensive is his view that to read all the poems is to cover the whole seamy side of city life. Sandburg's feeling about these people and the conditions of their lives is not, however, one of despair. Though he sees the terror of poverty and underprivilege, he believes in the happiness, the present and the future of these individuals. His treatment of them is optimistic and romantic.

"The Shovel Man" is a good example of this two-sided view of the same man. The laborer, as the poet sees him, is merely a person working with a shovel, a "dago," who works for very little money each day. But this man's lot is not discouraging, does not fill him with despair. For to an Italian woman back in Tuscany, he is a much greater success than one could imagine.

Another successful man, glad to be alive and doing what he does for a living, is the "Fish Crier," a Jew down on Maxwell Street, who with his sharp voice daily cries out his herring to hoped-for customers. Far from unhappy, he is delighted that God created the world as great as it is.

This theme is continued in the poem "Happiness." Sometimes there is a close approach to the mawkish and sentimental in Sandburg's sensibility. The democratic impulse has carried him out of the realm of observation and common sense and into that of romanticized fantasy. In this poem Sandburg says he has asked professors and successful executives for the meaning of life, and they could not answer him, looking at him indeed as though they felt he had meant to fool them. Then one Sunday afternoon he observed a group of Hungarians, with their beer and music, answering his philosophic question by unconsciously enjoying life merely by living it.

At times Sandburg quietly, in an undertone, states with telling effect the paradoxes and contradictions that exist in such a thriving city as Chicago, the city of the rich and the poor, the successful and the failures, the working and the workless. In "Muckers," for example, he writes that twenty men are watching a group of men dig a ditch in preparation for new gas mains. Among the twenty are two distinctly different reactions. Ten men see the work as the sorriest drudgery, while the other ten wish desperately that they had the job.

The contrast in the ways of life in Chicago is furthered in "Child of the Romans." In this poem an Italian eats his noon meal of bread, bologna, and water beside the railroad track he is repairing. The poverty of his meal is spotlighted by the train that passes on the tracks he is repairing so that the ride on the crack train will be so smooth that nothing will disturb the wealthy passengers and their splendid living.

Another aspect of Chicago life, the lure of the city for the country girl, is brought out in the poem named simply "Mamie." The namesake of the poem comes from a small Indiana town, where she was bored with the nothingness of life and ached for the romance of the big city. Once in Chicago, however, working in a basement store, she continues to dream of another bigger and more romantic city where her dreams can be realized.

"Fellow Citizen" is another study of true happiness, in which Sandburg barks his belligerent democracy. The poet says he has associated with the best people in the best of clubs, with millionaires and mayors. But the happiest man he knows is one who manufactures guitars and accordions. This man is happy because, in contrast with the rich and the powerful, he is not a money-grubber. He manufactures his accordions and guitars because he loves to, and he is so indifferent to money that he will scarcely mention price to someone who wants to buy his instruments. This man, says the poet, is the only person in Chicago for whom he ever held any jealousy.

There are other moods and other themes in this volume. Sandburg was familiar with the Imagist poets, their desire for simplicity and clarity, and although he disclaimed any influence from them, he did admit having been influenced by the Japanese poetry he had read. The section of his volume titled "Fogs and Fires" reveals characteristics of both types of verse.

"Nocturne in a Deserted Brickyard" is a gentle, hushed picture of a static moment of nature. Another quiet understatement is "Monotone." Here the author is concerned with beauty and with what is beautiful. The monotone of the rain has this quality, as does the sun on the hills. Most beautiful of all, however, is a face that the poet knows, for it contains the aspects of beauty caught in all other bits of nature.

Perhaps one of the most deservedly popular of Sandburg's brief nature images is the six-line poem called simply "Fog." Here with compelling gentleness the noise and violence of blustery Chicago is diminished to a single image in which fog steals catlike up to the city, looks over it for a moment and then moves on.

Other themes are evident in the volume. One, the weakness of words in conveying strong emotion, is revealed in "Onion Days," a poem concerning the Italian family Giovannitti caught in the iron grip of an exploiting millionaire named Jasper. Though they are wracked by economic necessity, there is a dignity about the Giovannittis, a simple goodness that, says Sandburg, no novelist or playwright could adequately express.

Another theme is the transitoriness of life, the ultimate disappearance of all. "Gone" tells the story of Chick Lorimer, a "wild girl" whom everybody loved, but who finally disappeared. Nobody has even the vaguest idea where she went.

"Murmurings in a Field Hospital," in the "War Poems" tells of a soldier longing for what is past: a singing woman in the garden, an old man telling stories to children, and his own past. This theme of the stupidity and uselessness of war constitutes many of Sandburg's powerful statements.

Early readers found Chicago Poems a work of tremendous impact; its voice was that of people talking and protesting in a manner never before attempted; its smell was of sweat, of the stockyards. Though Sandburg's real status in the history of poetry has not yet been established, there can be no doubt that this volume was a powerful influence on the poetic revival during and after World War I.

CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE

Author: George Gordon, Lord Byron (1788-1824)

First published: Cantos I and II, 1812; Canto III, 1816; Canto IV, 1818

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage is the poem which brought instant fame and notoriety to its author. In Byron's often quoted phrase: "I awoke one morning and found myself famous." The reasons why the virtually unknown poet should suddenly take the world by storm with this poem are obvious. It is a travel poem written at a time when the English were eager for travel literature. It is about places of interest to the English, especially Portugal and Spain. Further, the poem is sinewed and enriched by the character of the traveler, the Byronic hero who is dark and melancholy, haughty, diffident, jaded, introspective, wicked, and successful.

The first two Cantos were begun in 1809, when Byron was actually traveling through the countries described: Portugal, Spain, the Mediterranean, Constantinople, Albania, Asia Minor, Troas, and Greece. The term "Childe" for the designation of the hero, Byron says in the preface to the first two cantos, was used in accordance with the old structure of versification; it is used in the medieval sense of a young noble who is waiting to be knighted. The poem, a so-called Romance, that is, a romance or narrative of adventure, runs to 156 Spenserian stanzas. This particular stanzaic form was chosen, Byron said, because, traditionally, it admits of all kinds of variation.

The first two Cantos cover the author's journey through Portugal, Spain, the Ionian Isles, Albania, and Greece. In the Preface Byron insists that the poem is not autobiographical and that "Childe Harold" should not be misinterpreted as a person for the writer. He kept up this pretense through the publication of the third Canto, but in the fourth Canto Byron dropped his pretense and spoke out in his own person. That the poem was autobiographical from the first is demonstrated by the fact that in the manuscript version of Cantos I and II Byron called his hero "Childe Burun," which was the early form of his own name.

The first two Cantos are well directed and tightly controlled. The general tone of the poem and the stance of the Byronic hero is set at the very beginning. In an "Addition to the Preface" Byron apologizes for his hero by saying that he is in effect no worse than the knights of old, Sir Tristram and Sir Lancelot, for example, who surely were no better than they should have been. Therefore his hero is not to be censured for his character. This character is sketched in, beginning with the second stanza. Byron begins by saying that this Childe once lived in Albion's isle and did not take delight in virtue, but passed his days in dissipation, especially at night, and delighted in evil company and loose women. He sinned widely without atonement, and therefore fortunate was the virtuous girl who escaped his wicked influence.

Then, sick at heart, jaded by his wasting ways, Harold sails from England and his father's house, where, although he had reveled with many acquaintances, he had not been loved by any of them. His anti-feminist pose is reiterated, for the women he had enjoyed were dissolute and vain. Therefore, revolting from this dissolute life, or tired of it, Harold, that is, Byron, departs without remorse to visit other lands.

And now Childe Harold was sore sick at heart,
 And from his fellow bacchanals would flee;
 'Tis said, at times the sullen tear would start,
 But Pride congealed the drop within his ee:
 Apart he stalked in joyless reverie,
 And from his native land resolved to go,
 And visit scorching climes beyond the sea;
 With pleasure drugged, he almost longed for woe,
 And e'en for change of scene would seek the shades below.

His first stop is Portugal, a lovely land to him. Almost immediately his travels have a therapeutic effect. His melancholy pose is kept up by constant restatement of his troubles and his need for a cure. As he gazes on beautiful Portugal, he broods on his misspent youth and realizes that there is more to life than the ease of his early years.

In addition to the pose of the Byron hero that permeates the poem, there is another strain that constantly energizes it: Byron's real zeal for liberty. Throughout his life he had a genuine dedication to the freedom of both individuals and nations. In his own words: "There are but two sentiments to which I am constant—a strong love of liberty, and a detestation of cant." This strong love of liberty is immediately manifest in Spain, the second land Childe Harold visits, a romantic land teeming with songs, pregnant with glorious tale. Harold addresses himself to the proud Spain of yesteryear and to the liberty she then enjoyed.

From Spain he travels to Greece and Albania. A considerable amount of interest is maintained in these later sections by Byron's stirring up of classical memories. Here, for example, he sails past the spot where "sad Penelope" waited for the return of her husband, Ulysses, and where "dark Sappho" wrote. In writing of Greece, he addresses himself further to liberty. His feeling for the freedom of Greece was so genuine and so intense that he finally gave up literature for revolution. At his own expense he organized an expedition to help free the Greeks from the Turks, and in the town of Missolonghi, after an excellent display of military skill and leadership, he grew sick of fever and died just after his thirty-sixth birthday. Byron is at the present time revered as a national hero by the Greeks.

Canto III is generally felt to be superior to the other three. It begins with an affirmation of the Byronic pose. The hero is driven by fate to continue his travels. He is a weed washed by the seas of life whenever the waves of the ocean roll. He is the "wandering outlaw of his own dark mind," and he has grown old in this woe-filled world. One of the major characteristics of the third Canto is the poet's romantic love of nature, which sounds amazingly Wordsworthian. Byron had always maintained that he detested all the Romantic poets except Shelley. Shelley, however, had read Wordsworth aloud to Byron and had changed his mind about this poet. Consequently, there are beautiful passages in this Canto that sound Wordsworthian.

Historical associations are maintained in this Canto. Byron visits Waterloo, a battle which constituted a victory for the opponents of liberalism:

And Harold stands upon this place of skulls,
 The grave of France, the deadly Waterloo!
 How in an hour the power which gave annals
 Its gifts, transferring fame as fleeting too!
 In "pride of place" here last the eagle flew,
 Then tore with bloody talon the rent
 plain,
 Pierced by the shaft of banded nations through;
 Ambition's life and labors all were vain;
 He wears the shattered links of the world's broken chain.

The poet wonders if the earth is more free after Napoleon's fall, a lesson for all tyrants; he hoped that the answer is in the affirmative. In this Canto he continues his travels, going next to the Rhine, to the Alps, and to the Jura.

Canto IV, the longest of the four, was written eight years after the first. In it Byron abandons his pose of distinguishing between himself and Childe Harold; as he admits in a preface dedicated to John Hobhouse, with whom he had begun his European travels in 1809, the public refused to accept his statement that he was not writing autobiography but was fictionalizing a character. Byron says in this dedication that in this last Canto he had wanted to write on Italian literature and manners but could not do so under his former disguise. Therefore he had abandoned it.

Byron's comments on Italian literature constitute one of the major interests in this Canto. Venice, the first city visited, is still a beautiful place, though Tasso's echoes are no longer heard. The mountain village of Arquà sepulchers the bones of Petrarch, where he lived during his later years. Tasso is the glory of Ferrara. Dante sleeps far from "ungrateful Florence." Rome is haunted by the ghosts of her great men, stretching historically from the Scipios to Rienzi. But even more Byron is moved by the romantic aspects of nature:

There is a pleasure in the pathless
woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is society where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar:
I love not Man the less, but Nature more,

From these our interviews, in which I steal
From all I may be, or have been before,
To mingle with the Universe, and feel What I can ne'er express, yet can not all conceal.

The poem ends as it began, with the pose of the Byronic hero. He is weary of travel, jaded and wasted. He has written what he had to write. He wishes he could have done better, but he could not. With an irony that must have pleased him, he says that the pain of the travels of the Pilgrim must be his, but the moral should be the reader's:

Farewell! a work that must be, and hath been—
A sound which makes us linger—yet
—farewell!
Ye! who have traced the Pilgrim to the scene
Which is his last, if in your memories dwell
A thought which once was his, if on ye swell
A single recollection, not in vain
He wore his sandal shoon and scallop shell;
Farewell! with him alone may rest
the pain,
If such there were—with you, the moral of his strain!

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage is today a work of more than mere historical interest, more than one of the most characteristic books of the Romantic movement or important for its characterization of the Byronic hero. It is the revelation of one of the most whimsical, paradoxical, and gifted minds of the nineteenth century, and as such the poem remains stimulating and fascinating.

CHILDHOOD, BOYHOOD, YOUTH

Type of work: Novel

ST. JEROME, his French tutor
NATALYA SAVISHNA, the housekeeper at Petrovskoe

Childhood, Boyhood, Youth make up the three completed parts of a projected four-part sequence that is Tolstoy's first writing. One would suppose that with a novelist who generally used a certain amount of autobiography, these first works which appear in the form of an autobiography (using a first-person narrator) would be the bases for studying his work; but they have been neglected, and if anyone is to blame it is Tolstoy himself, who later in life rejected them for their false sentimentality. This is a pity, for, though the young man of the third volume is undoubtedly sentimental, the first two volumes show such a natural development of the character that his feelings seem natural, not only to himself but to all youth. This description of a particular childhood, boyhood, and youth has sufficient universal relevance to make it worth reading as a tender and real portrait of growing up anywhere at any time.

The three completed parts of the Four Epochs of Growth, the tentative title for the projected four, are of different lengths, with the first two amounting to slightly more than the third part, Youth, the longest of the three. Each section is structured around a chapter bearing the title of that part. Chapter 15 (of twenty-eight chapters) of Childhood is entitled "Childhood," Chapter 19 of the second part is "Boyhood," and Chapter 32 (of forty-five chapters in the third part) is titled "Youth." These central chapters indicate not only the careful organization of each part but also the steady development of the central character in the flow of interconnected events which makes up the narrative. The interconnections (for instance, in the reappearance of characters like Sonya or visits to the country) are highlighted by the appearance of certain individual and freakish characters like the godly monk in the first part and the student who joins the army in the last; yet no character makes only one appearance. All are part of a web of incidents which shows a novelist's ability to live in the midst of a whole raft of living characters and which anticipates what will be a feature of Tolstoy's mature work.

Childhood begins with scenes on the family estate at Petrovskoe, the setting of the first fourteen chapters before the family moves to Moscow. At the end of this section the family returns to the estate for the death of the narrator's mother, followed by the death of her faithful servant, Natalya Savishna. The two sections, each composed of fourteen chapters, show the family as a closely related group of parents, children, servants (including tutors like Karl Ivanych and Mimi, and serfs), and dependents. Although the characteristics of the family members are to some extent developed, as in the chapter titled "What Kind of Man Was My Father?" the less important characters make the deepest mark on the narrator as a child. These fall into two groups: adults like his tutor and grandmother, from whom he learns to see his father with a stranger's eyes, and playmates of his own age, from whom he learns about himself at the age of ten and knows that he is a dreamer and will suffer for his sensibilities.

Vladimir Petrovich's suffering begins when he notices as a child the contrast between rich and poor in his playmates, especially Katya. There is more to come in the second part, Boyhood, which begins with a journey to Moscow and ends with the death of his grandmother there, when he is nearly fifteen.

Volodya, his brother, and Lyuba, his sister, grow up with him but do not affect him as much as chance or unequal acquaintances. He begins to appreciate Katya's position now that her mother's protectress, his own mother, is dead. He sees that his family is not the center of the world. The consolation that we must endure what we cannot cure comes hard to him, especially when he begins to see what he amounts to in the eyes of the world. Then he begins to dream of solving the problems of the whole world as they continue to crowd in on his adolescent mind.

Thus Vladimir Petrovich concludes the second part, Boyhood, knowing both that he has a bad habit of dreaming himself into and out of situations and that he does so to escape conflicting feelings of pity and hate; these feelings, because they are inconsistent, he knows must be genuine. The narrator has become a sentimental boor and everything he touches turns to disaster. It is all very humorless and very Russian.

The second part ends with his discovery of his first real friend, Prince Dmitri. During the third and longest part, Youth, Vladimir Petrovich reaches the age of fifteen and is enrolled at the university in Moscow. He reacts to a much wider range of acquaintances by increasing heights of joy and depths of despair. From the outside he looks like a ridiculous and loutish poseur, obsessed with notions of what is comme il faut; inside he suffers religious and romantic torments, as when he falls in love with Sonya for the third time. Although, as in other parts, the chapter entitled "Youth" analyzes his case, an earlier chapter entitled "Love" shows the essence of his problem. He distinguishes three kinds of love: of nature, of the beloved, and of humanity. The first has been shown in the descriptive passages throughout the book; the second is revealed in his feelings for the young and the old around him; the third kind he learns from Sophia Ivanovna, and it is shown in his relations with his inferiors. In this excess and confusion of feelings we have an early sketch of Pierre in War and Peace and an indication of how true both Pierre and Vladimir are to Tolstoy himself.

The last fifteen chapters of the third part extend Youth beyond the length of the other two sections and are mainly concerned with the disruption of the family following his father's second marriage to Avdotya Vassilyevna and the growing up of the children. Vladimir progressively fails at the university. Gradually he has grown convinced that the differences he feels between himself and his world are real and not the illusions of a young dreamer. He settles for the unhappy inner reality. We can only guess at what Tolstoy would have done with Vladimir in the projected fourth part, probably to be entitled Manhood. The best hypothesis is that Tolstoy broke off Four Epochs of Growth because it had served as his apprenticeship and he was now ready to begin writing in earnest. Page after page shows his gift for analyzing and using a multitude of minor characters in building up the internal analysis and life of his principals. The three parts of this work show not only the gradual creation of a protagonist but also the formative work of a great novelist.

CHIPS WITH EVERYTHING

Author: Arnold Wesker (1932-)

Time: The present

Locale: England

First presented: 1962

Principal characters:

PIP THOMPSON, a recruit from a fine old family

CORPORAL HILL, the recruits' trainer

CHARLES WINGATE, a recruit who would like to improve himself

ANDREW MCCLURE, a sensitive recruit

ARCHIE CANNIBAL,

WILFE SEAFORD,

WHITEY RICHARDSON,

DODGER COHEN,

DICKEY SMITH, and

SMILER WASHINGTON, recruits

WING COMMANDER, the officer in charge of the installation

THE SQUADRON LEADER, the officer who is charged with locating infractions of rules

THE PILOT OFFICER, the officer who is the self-appointed guardian of cleanliness

P. T. INSTRUCTOR FLIGHT SERGEANT, the physical training instructor

This play was Arnold Wesker's first popular work, although his previous plays had enjoyed considerable artistic success. Like all of his plays, Chips with Everything delineates an aspect of contemporary society, not stopping at pointing out faults, but going on to point toward solutions. Wesker's drama is, in fact, an extension of a general concern with social causes, and his identification with those causes is as strong on the stage as it is off.

Wesker also continues his interest in the psychology of the individual character in Chips with Everything. At first the play seems to be without a plot. A group of recruits meet at a training camp and several episodes occur which have some comic or dramatic interest as episodes: Corporal Hill plays the stereotyped drill sergeant; the recruits have their first drill lesson during which it is discovered that Smiler is physically unable to stop smiling; the various officers introduce themselves and in doing so reveal their individual perversions; Pip Thompson tells the history of his distinguished family; there is a Christmas party which degenerates into a fight and a confrontation between Pip and the officers; and Pip organizes and directs a very funny sequence in which the recruits steal some coal from the camp's central supply. However, there is little apparent connection between these events except that the same people are involved in each before the second act.

In the second act the play begins to take shape, and what seems to have been a series of discrete events merges into a distinct pattern. That pattern cannot be equated, however, with the traditional plot in which a problem is introduced, complicated, and ultimately solved. Chips with Everything is closer to life than that: the basic assumption of the play is that in life the patterns lie inside the characters, and whenever anything significant occurs it happens within the individual. The only way to approach the play is through the characters who undergo the most changes in the course of the action.

The first characters who need to be accounted for in an analysis of the play are those who do not change, those in whom those changes have already occurred which are the builders of a man's eventual character. Corporal Hill is a contradiction. On the one hand, he is the caricature of the drill sergeant, tough, unfeeling, and dedicated to the single-minded purpose of turning out perfect fighting men. On the other hand, he is genuinely concerned with the welfare of the recruits assigned to him, with seeing that they have the opportunity to work out their individual problems on their own terms.

The Wing Commander is dedicated to two propositions: first, that the military commitment is the most important concern of contemporary society; two, that the fighting men of the line are trash and it is the duty of the upper classes to mold that trash into worthy articles to be adapted into the social apparatus. The Squadron Leader believes that the only duty of the average man is discipline and obedience and the duty of the members of the upper classes is to command that discipline and obedience.

The Pilot Officer is obsessed with cleanliness. He sees the whole world as a breeding place for bacteria that have no function but to create disease. It is his self-appointed duty to clean up that breeding ground and to make it sterile. Similarly, the Physical Training Instructor sees as his duty the building of Greek gods. The average man is, to him, an anaemic creature unworthy of living in an enlightened society.

These men are important because they form the environment in which the action takes place. It is in reaction to them that the character changes which form the substance of the play occur. In terms of any social allegory which may be intended, it is impossible to ignore the obvious affinities that this environment has with the kind of environment the Nazis tried to create in the 1930's.

Although all of the characters change, and significantly, two of the recruits exemplify the kind of change that informs the drama. Smiler Washington is, like all of the recruits except Pip, from the slums of London. He is afflicted with a singular malady—he is physically unable to stop smiling and his face is frozen in a perpetual expression of mirth. He is a kind of contemporary Billy Budd, overcome by a disability he has no means to correct. In fact, at the beginning the parallel with Billy Budd seems to be so exact that it must have been planned. Smiler seems to be beloved by all, a friendly, gentle man who can bring himself to offend no one.

Smiler soon reveals, however, that he is far from the epitome of happy innocence. He becomes petulant, constantly picking fights with his fellow recruits. He is morose and unpleasant, and the irony of his smiling face is soon apparent. His face is a constant irritation to his superiors. Corporal Hill sees the eternal smile as a satiric comment on the training itself and the Pilot Officer sees Smiler's ever-bared teeth as a breeding ground for germs. It is soon apparent that there is no place in this society for perpetual happiness.

Erasing the smile from Smiler's lips becomes an important project for the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, who berate him constantly in the attempt to prove that his smile is voluntary. Finally, he runs away, only to return to the camp for reasons of his own never revealed to the audience. The only explanation that is offered is that he found that he could not go on alone.

Pip Thompson becomes in the course of the play the most important character. Both his fellow recruits and his superiors are puzzled because he has chosen to enter military service as a lowly recruit. The first explanation offered is too simple: he is revolting against his father, who was a distinguished general in the last war. But it is soon clear that Pip's rebellion goes much deeper than that. He constantly denies that his father is the source of his rebellion, yet he just as constantly calls up his father and his family as being representative of his rebellion.

He is surely not possessed of an active social conscience. He reiterates time and time again his disdain for the problems and concerns of his fellow recruits and the only times he joins with them in any concerted effort to improve their conditions are a few occasions when his personal comfort is affected, when the recruits need coal for their fire. Pip rejects all offers of close friendship just as easily as he rebuffs those among his fellow recruits who try to bait him because of his upper-class background.

Consequently, all of the recruits and officers find that their most pressing problem is to decide what Pip's motives are. Some think that he is merely "slumming" for a lark. Others ascribe to him a social conscience he consistently denies. The officers are convinced that he is simply trying to punish his father by being as imperfect a follower as his father was a perfect leader. The only interest in the men's welfare that Pip ever evidences is his concern that they not let the officers manipulate them. He paints a picture of the lower classes as a mass of easily manipulated objects. What finally emerges as Pip's driving force is a concern that men not let themselves be treated so. He does not want the men to allow the officers to use them, and he himself does not want to be manipulated by his society into becoming an officer and a gentleman.

The irony is that at the end of the second act Pip has been successful in inspiring the men to a semblance of authentic action. They stand up to the officers and refuse to allow Smiler to be jailed for running away. But Pip has capitulated. The officers have evidently won and have convinced him to take what they conceive of as his proper place, that of an officer. In the last scene, as he dons his officer's uniform, he ironically congratulates the men on their action. Finally Pip, now an officer, reads off their assignments to the men.

The exact meaning of all this is not clear. Is Wesker saying that the lower classes have nowhere to go but up, but the upper classes have nowhere to go but further into decadence? Is he saying that there is hope for the reformed but none for the reformer? Or is he simply creating a powerful human experience which illuminates, however dimly, all experience. In any case the play is a strong statement about the importance of the individual and of his individual actions.

CHRONIQUE

Author: St.-John Perse (Alexis St.-Léger Léger, 1887-)

First published: 1960

To a man whose first poems were published in 1909 and who, though widely acclaimed by his fellow writers, remained for years totally unknown outside literary circles, public honors have at last come in rich measure. In the space of little more than a year he was awarded the Nobel Prize, the National Grand Prize for Literature in Paris, and the International Prize for Poetry in Belgium. Furthermore, he was chosen by eighty-six French poets to bear the title of "Prince of Poets," an honor that he declined. Lastly, he was given the Award of Merit by the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1960.

It is unfortunately true that today, in spite of an ever-widening reading public, poetry is less and less read, and a thousand times it has been explained that this avoidance of poetry is the direct result of its constantly increasing difficulty. Nowadays it is taken for granted that any contemporary poem will be obscure; that it will be packed with either literary or personal allusions that are incomprehensible to the reader, or that the syntax and imagery will be so densely woven as to present an impenetrable jungle. Of no modern poet are these statements truer than of Perse. The natural question of the reader: "What is this poem about?" is extremely hard to answer when the poem is by St.-John Perse, who is quoted as having described his poetry as "a long single sentence without break and forever unintelligible."

On the subject of obscurity in modern poetry the author had something to say in his speech of acceptance of the Nobel Award, to the effect that poetry is obscure, not because of its nature but because it explores the darkness of the human soul and the mystery of being. To this statement the impatient reader might conceivably reply, "Is the human soul any darker at the present than it has been hitherto? Is the mystery enveloping human existence any darker than in the past?" One would like to have the poet's answer.

But to turn to the poem itself. It is a prose poem, the author's usual vehicle, though somewhat shorter and hence more compressed than are some of his earlier works. It is written in his familiar style: an elaborate chant, a kind of solemn invocation, as if the author were addressing a divinity that could be approached only through a sonorous, ritualistic ceremony. In reading the poetry of Perse, one always has the impression of a ceremony—not of the rococo ceremony of Versailles but of an almost archaic rite out of some very ancient, primitive civilization. The long, sweeping sentences full of superlatives (très haut, très grand occur again and again) have the lofty dignity of a Greek chorus and the impersonality of a traditional invocation chanted by priests.

The invocation of Chronique, however, is addressed to the "Great Age" in which man now finds himself. It is an age, a century, whose entrails and viscera have been rent, when the finger of man has been probing into the sky. Man surges forward on his unlimited course like a horseman who is driving his steed with its last ounce of strength to cross some high mountain pass, buffeted by a great wind that bends him back. One might say that the poet beholds the countless generations of men without names, without even faces, pushing forward to this great victory at the crest. It is this age, in which man, having slowly gathered together all his forces over uncounted centuries, has at last reached his fulfillment, ready to face what may come, for tomorrow there will be the thunder and lightning of the summit.

This has been the age of man's probing into the sky to unravel the last secrets of nature because we could no longer accept ignorance as our lot. For the elders with their stone books have failed us: they did not speak the living word. Science alone cannot fulfill man's needs. Here the author touches on one of the most fought-over questions of the last century and a half: does the scientist or the poet offer the clearer way to truth? Beginning, perhaps, with Jeremy Bentham and the Utilitarians, the cry has grown ever stronger that only science can give us ultimate truth; that poetry is at best, as Bentham claimed, only a minor pleasure, to be cultivated by a few. In his speech already referred to, Perse put himself in the tradition of Blake and Shelley, for, though not claiming that poetry is pure reality, he does maintain that it gives us a reality beyond the scope of the scientist. Modern science has opened to man vistas filled with the greatest drama, but the spiritual adventure of poetry need yield nothing to science. Indeed, Perse claims for poetry a very high place: it rekindles the fire of man's passion in his search for truth.

In awarding the Nobel Prize, the Swedish Academy spoke of Perse's "soaring flight and the evocative imagery of his poetry." This citation expresses very well the special technique that the author has developed. We have returned to Baudelaire's "Correspondences," where "Les parfums, les couleurs et les sons se répondent." The difference is that Perse has turned his back on the source from which contemporary poetry has derived most of its images and correspondences and its unusual associations; that is, the stony city, the megalopolis in which modern man is trapped. Perse goes instead to the life of simple yet immensely dignified people: herdsmen, sailors, villagers. These people are timeless in that we never know when or even where they live, except that they are members of some primitive society and that their lives are marked by a kind of archaic gravity. Perhaps a childhood spent in the West Indies gave Perse this feeling for the primitive, as it unquestionably gave him the tropical luxuriance of imagery that has been characteristic of his previous verse.

One critic has said of Perse that he has used rare words with greater success than has any other French poet since Hugo. The reader, however, never feels that the poet has been combing lexicons for unusual language; these words seem to come naturally to him. Again, the background of the tropics has provided him with a vocabulary filled with names of plants and animals little known to the reader from other shores: the frigate bird, the harpy eagle, the wizard snake. He is fond of terms drawn from zoölogy, botany, geology. Chronique, however, is more restrained, even austere; the landscape is not that of a tropical island or of some unnamed ancient city (as in Sea-marks)—it is the whole earth from all sides. The landscape is more stylized, as in an illuminated manuscript, to suit the solemnity and impersonality of the invocation, for in Chronique the poet is even more impersonal than is his custom, as if he were speaking through the mask of a Greek actor. His style has even been called "haughty"; yet its manner is not so much haughtiness as the gravity befitting a solemn occasion. So much of modern poetry has been characterized by the conversational tone introduced by Eliot that we are no longer accustomed to the "grand manner" and it seems strange to us.

And what of this century when, as Perse says, man lives on what is beyond death? For the poet it is not an age of despair. Man is the herdsman of the future; he need not cover his face, for he has the knowledge that his soul is growing to greatness. It is an age that demands the most that man can give, and it is towards this crest that he has been struggling through the centuries. Perse's long, slow, solemnly chanted invocation ends with an appeal for the "Great Age" to look upon us and take the measure of our hearts.

THE CLOUD FOREST

Type of work: Nature notes and travel

Author: Peter Matthiessen (1927-)

Time: November, 1959-April, 1960

Locale: The Amazon jungle, the Andean cloud forest and sierra, Tierra del Fuego

First published: 1961

If nature books are not widely read today, one reason may be that among naturalists the scientist has taken precedence over the poet. Good nature writing is more than a process of observation, classification, and reporting, and our best natural historians from William Bartram on have infused their work with the larger vision which gives grace and wonder to the particularities of landscapes and things. But for every Henry David Thoreau, W. H. Hudson, John Burroughs, John Muir, or Rachel Carson to whom we can point, there have been scores of other writers about nature who showed themselves strong on facts but short on insight and style. The qualities of a good naturalist, like those of the good writer of travel books, are not hard to catalogue: curiosity, imagination, the power to absorb and organize facts, the ability to re-create scene and image in language, a sure hold on the world of the senses. When the naturalist and the traveler exist in the same person, the combination is a happy one.

Peter Matthiessen belongs to the select company of those who have enriched our knowledge of the wilderness and the wildlife to be found there. He is a novelist also, and a good one, and he brings to his nature writing the same sense of scene, imagination, and passion for realistic detail that we find in his fiction. Matthiessen is more than a novelist who makes nature his hobby, for there is nothing dilettantish in his method. When he writes about the wilderness and its creatures, his intelligence and his feelings are alike involved; he penetrates beneath the surfaces of things and creates an act of vision or a mood. Wildlife in America was the book in which he first demonstrated the clean skill with which he joins scientific information and illuminating perception in his spare yet evocative prose. In that forthright, disturbing book he presented the first really comprehensive survey of the endangered wildlife of forests, prairies, and waters in the diminishing unspoiled regions that are being swallowed up by industry and urbanization all the way across America. In The Cloud Forest, he has ventured into an almost unmapped part of the world in order to bring back an honest and fascinating report on what he found there.

The book is beautifully structured, a traveler's journal bringing together nature notes, descriptive sketches, and personal adventure. The long journey, covering in all some twenty thousand miles in the next five months, begins quietly enough with the departure of the M.S. Venimos from a Brooklyn pier on a cold November evening. The freighter is bound for Iquitos, Peru, a river port twenty-three hundred miles up the Amazon. Matthiessen's destination is less certain: the Andean rain forest and the sierra, Mato Grosso, and Tierra del Fuego. Though his route may remain unplanned, his reason for the trip is clear in his mind, the desire to see the last wild terrains of the earth's last wilderness before they are transformed by advancing civilization. Today these are to be found, except for Antarctic and the oceans, in South America. But if Matthiessen is in a hurry to reach those faraway places, the Venimos is not. The freighter follows a leisurely course that takes in the Bermudas, Haiti, the Windward Islands, Barbados, Trinidad, and British Guiana before it finally arrives at the Brazilian port of Belém. Along the way Matthiessen has had time to make a record of everything he sees—sea birds, weather, the marine life of the Sargasso Sea, the native life in a dozen ports of call.

Once the Venimos has begun the long voyage up the Amazon, Matthiessen is aware that he is following a course already covered by several distinguished travelers who also wrote books about their observations and experiences, the naturalist H. W. Bates in the nineteenth century, H. M. Tomlinson and Peter Fleming in this. Although comparison is inevitable. The Cloud Forest holds its own beside The Sea and the Jungle and Brazilian Adventure. Matthiessen's account of the upriver voyage lacks the metaphysical dimension of Tomlinson's travel classic; that is a loss, but the only one. Certainly he has written a more thoughtful and personal book than the story of exploration that Fleming told with such Etonian nonchalance.

Like all travelers in the outlands, Matthiessen falls in with the ubiquitous missionaries and like most, again, he is of mixed opinions about them. He finds a note of the incongruous in the village where two loudspeakers regularly carry Baptist hymns and messages to the Catholic natives. For the missionaries in the lonely jungle compounds he has a great deal of respect, but recognition of the good they do is tempered by the realization that frequently the missionary is speeding up the destructive processes of "civilization" to which the Indian finds it almost impossible to adapt. His belief is that the Indian tribe brought into contact with the white man on the latter's terms has possibly only half a century of tribal identity and existence left; and he supports this claim by citing examples of the Carajas, who declined in number from approximately one hundred thousand to about two thousand between 1845 and the present, and of other tribes already extinct. Matthiessen's sympathy is clearly for the Indian, lost in the time of his own customs and remote beyond jungles and rivers, creatures as much a part of the wilderness as the birds, animals, and reptiles that he writes about with such vividness and clarity.

In Pucallpa, a colorful but ugly Peruvian outpost at the foot of the Andes, Matthiessen first heard of a tremendous fossil mandible, so large that five or six men could not lift it, to be seen in the jungle not far from the Inuya River. Incredulous at first, he was told by others whose word he respected that his informant was a man not given to tall tales. That story, as well as vague rumors of some pre-Inca ruins, still unknown to explorers, to be found near the Picha River, led eventually to Matthiessen's hazardous journey through the rushing Pongo de Mainique in flood time. First, however, he went on to visit Lima and Cuzco, inspected the monolithic Inca fortress, Sacahuaman, and traveled to the famous mountain city of ruins, Machu Picchu. Then he was off to Bolivia, Argentina, Chile, and Tierra del Fuego. Puerto Montt, in Chile, is the southern limit of travel in South America. Cape Horn, however, is more than one thousand miles to the south, and that was Matthiessen's destination, or as close to it as he could get. For no other reason than a long-standing desire he visited Patagonia, the Strait of Magellan, and Tierra del Fuego, bleak regions made famous by Darwin, and then returned to the Mato Grosso in Brazil.

By early April he was in Cuzco preparing to set out on an expedition to find the giant fossil he had heard about in Pucallpa several months before. His white companion on the venture was Andrés Porras Cáceres, a jungle veteran and the brother of a Peruvian friend. Their journey took them down the Urubamba River through a region partly unmapped and almost unknown to white men. From the beginning things went badly. They had difficulty with Indian guides, supplies, suspicious or hostile planters. A guide, César Cruz, failed to show up at the appointed meeting place. By the time they arrived in an area controlled by a sinister family named Pereira they had practically committed themselves to the descent of the flood-swollen Urubamba through the dreaded rapids called the Pongo de Mainique. Aboard a raft made of six balsa logs and guided by three Machiguenga Indians—Torbio, Raul, and Agostino—they passed through the dreadful canyon without accident. Later Matthiessen learned that few travelers have ever traveled the rapids during the season of high water and that he and Andrés Porras were probably the first white men ever to do so in flood time.

The discovery of the fossil jaw—for Matthiessen finally found Cruz, who guided him to the site—is almost an anticlimax after the adventure of riding the Pongo. The aftermath was even more anticlimactic. Peruvian authorities confiscated the fossil on the complaint of an alleged owner and refused to allow the jaw, the remnant of some giant prehistoric reptile, to be removed to the American Museum of Natural History in New York. Matthiessen had to be satisfied with some excellent photographs reproduced in his book. He never did find the Picha ruins.

The Cloud Forest may easily become a classic of its kind in the succession of books about South America by such writers as Hudson and Bates. It has the authentic touch that Thoreau once described in his journal: "In literature it is only the wild that attracts us. Dullness is only another name for tameness. It is the untamed, uncivilized, free and wild thinking in Hamlet, in the Iliad, and in all the scriptures and mythologies that delights us,—not learned in the schools, not refined and polished by art. A truly good book is something as wildly natural and primitive, mysterious and marvellous, ambrosial and fertile, as a fungus or a lichen." Peter Matthiessen's book tells us about the conditions of nature and of man among other creatures in nature's wilds. Henry Thoreau, walker in the wilderness, naturalist, and poet, would have approved.

COLD COMFORT FARM

Cold Comfort Farm is the private jest of a young woman of high spirits and firmly sensible convictions. In form it parodies the English "country" novel from Thomas Hardy to D. H. Lawrence, Constance Holmes, and Mary Webb, particularly the work of the two women writers who were popular in prewar England about the time Stella Gibbons composed her counterblast.

The guiding genius is that of Jane Austen who, like the heroine, Flora, did not approve of mess; "Let other pens dwell on guilt and misery" announces the epigraph in a quotation from Mansfield Park.

The novel contains a number of ripostes to fashionable fads which now tend to confuse the issue, but the object of the parody has become so popular, especially

Lawrence, that the novel's continued readership is practically guaranteed, making it a minor classic of its kind. Most of the fun is satirical and depends on an almost complete identification of author and heroine, young Flora Poste. In the course of the novel Flora deals a great many objects a number of glancing blows, but she comes off unscathed herself and apparently preserves her own virtues intact. The greatest of these virtues is common sense.

There are three grades of satire: mild, as in the case of Mrs. Smiling and her rather odd band of "Pioneer-O" (English gentlemen who govern the Empire in Kenya and other out-of-the-way places); tasty, as in the country gentry; and sharp, as in the treatment reserved for the inhabitants of Cold Comfort. But behind these stand two literary types which the novel as a whole satirizes, the drama of the earth and the romance of young love. Stella Gibbons chooses the latter as her vehicle, so that the novel begins in murk and ends in romantic radiance.

The murk begins in Chapter Three, which opens with a description of dawn creeping over Cold Comfort Farm. While Adam Lambsbreath milks the cows (Aimless, Feckless, Pointless, and Graceless), Seth, Judith's son, lounges home from his philandering with Moll of the mill, Violet of the Vicarage, or Ivy of the ironmongery. The breakfast porridge snarls in its "snood" over the open fire. Seth quarrels with his mother and goes off to mock Big Business, the stud bull; the porridge boils over; the fire goes out. Sussex promises to be an adequate challenge to Flora's common sense when she accepts the invitation of her Aunt Ada Doom to visit Cold Comfort Farm.

Since there are some thirteen men on the farm and at least five women, together with a number more in the village below, Flora's tidy mind has much to work on. She is defeated only by Adam Lambsbreath, who remains nonsensical to the end.

Flora's first common-sense triumph is to have her bedroom curtains washed by Meriam, the hired girl who has just fallen in labor the night before; Seth is the suspected father. Flora finds that this is an annual visitation and combines directions for washing the curtains with some clear and simple advice about contraception, thus putting a stop to Meriam's annual tribute to the animal atmosphere of the Farm. After pumping Mrs. Beetle and Adam, and listening to each Starkadder accuse the others, she forms a comprehensive plan of campaign, chiefly directed at Aunt Ada Doom through Elphine, Amos, and Seth. Aunt Ada remains closeted in the upper regions of the farmhouse and controls the farm folk by insisting that she is mad and will get madder if any Starkadder leaves Cold Comfort; her chief weapon is to remind the Starkadders that her childhood was warped because she had seen some nasty sight in the woodshed.

The campaign of common sense has both strategy and tactics. The strategy depends on making the Starkadders line up to their literary prototype or stereotype. Although on the surface the farm appears to offer cold comfort to a sensible young manager, underneath it is a cauldron of primal appetites. Flora discovers the little weakness in Aunt Ada's hold on the Starkadders: the family are all in secret revolt. Seth is passionately interested in the movies; Reuben and the others falsify the farm accounts they show to Aunt Ada; Amos longs to become a peripatetic evangelist; and most of the Starkadders hide their wives in the village of Howling. Flora's many-sided plan is to bring these revolts into the open, thus providing a hectic and shifting pattern of events which is highly comic but sometimes confusing.

Flora's tactics, therefore, are to isolate the members of the family one by one from Aunt Ada. Flora begins with Amos; she attends his Bethel of "Quiverers" and encourages his ambitions to spread the Word by tempting him with the vision of a Ford van, complete with loudspeakers, in which he can visit all the sinful fairs and markets in the country. She is eventually so successful that Amos departs for the United States, his genius having been recognized by a visiting American evangelist, and he leaves Cold Comfort farm to Reuben. The latter is thus brought round to support Flora's schemes for the rest of the family.

The main plot is the rescue of Elphine from her pixie preferences and from the earthy clutches of Urk. The latter's claim to Elphine has been blood-linked with the "water voles" by having her feeding bottle marked with their blood. One might say that the initiation of the main plot is symbolized in Flora's release of Big Business as she and Elphine leave for a day in London's dress shops, hairdressing establishments, and society restaurants.

The transformation from pixie curls and nouveau art cape to shining bob and white satin gratifies Elphine; the new beauty is first shown to the county at a ball for the young local squire, with such romantic effect that the squire announces his engagement to Elphine.

This social success is achieved with the help of both Seth and Charles Fairford, Flora's cousin, and in spite of the persistent attentions of Mr. Mybug, a visiting writer who plagues Flora with his insistent recognition of phallic symbols in country life, a response to the yeasty atmosphere of Cold Comfort, Big Business, and Seth which is directly contrary to Flora's plans, which are grounded in common sense.

The most earthy scene in the book occurs when Flora's party returns to Cold Comfort after the County Ball. They find that yeasty atmosphere heaving because the "sukebinde" has burst into flower and its overpowering scent, heady but also smacking of the loins, affects everyone, notably Aunt Ada Doom, who has descended to the flagged kitchen to conduct an awesome ritual known as "The Counting." Amos defies Aunt Ada and departs, and the other Starkadders become distinctly restless; events follow thick and fast to make this the last "Counting" at Cold Comfort.

Urk is fobbed off with Meriam. Later Mr. Mybug is accommodated with a spare sex-starved Starkadder female. The next day an American film director calls on Flora and sweeps Seth off to Hollywood. (When Aunt Ada brings up the something nasty she had seen in the woodshed, the director asks whether it had been her.) Shortly after, Judith is handed over to an amiable psychiatrist who receives the full flood of her starved affections. Mrs. Agony Beetle, Adam Lambsbreath, and Big Business are all content in their various ways; only Aunt Ada remains to be dealt with.

The time of the novel is supposed to be "the near future" as conceived in the early 1930's, and much has happened since. This Utopian projection accounts for such things as TV phones and a restaurant over the Thames constructed wholly of glass. Both leaps of the imagination pale beside the approaching reality; today they serve to date the novel or at least emphasize the capriciousness of the author's fancy.

Similarly, a number of the witticisms, satire at the expense of London's literati of the 1930's, principally in the person of Mr. Mybug, sometimes escape the reader. This is most obvious in the author's mock "Foreword" to "Anthony Pookworthy," the private fun of which is likely to escape the reader today. On the other hand, the satire of academic idiocy in Mr. Mybug's (his name is really Meyerburg) defense of Branwell Brontë as the author of the novels believed to have been written by sisters Anne, Charlotte, and Emily is still enjoyable. Cold Comfort Farm, Howling, near Beershorn, Sussex, is now part of the literary geography of the English language.

THE COLLECTED LETTERS OF D. H. LAWRENCE

Author: D. H. Lawrence (1885-1930)

First published: The Letters of D. H. Lawrence, edited by Aldous Huxley, 1932; The Collected Letters of D. H. Lawrence, edited by Harry T. Moore, 1962

One's understanding of D. H. Lawrence cannot be considered complete without a careful perusal of The Collected Letters. For there is a side of Lawrence that, while it is found elsewhere, receives its fullest expression only in the letters—a side that, beneath all the tensions of his life, is cheerful, optimistic, affirmative. Lawrence's belief in the ultimate sanctity of physical being finds its embodiment not only in formal essays and narratives, but in these informal meditations that reflect his day-to-day existence.

This aspect had already been revealed in 1932, when Aldous Huxley published an impressive collection of Lawrence letters. Moore draws heavily on Huxley's edition in the expanded collection. Appearing less than two years after Lawrence's death, the Huxley book was a great achievement, and many Lawrence scholars have an almost sentimental attachment to the pioneer volume of letters. But the time has long been ripe for a more comprehensive collection, one that would include not only many unpublished letters, but items in the myriad volumes of memoirs and biographies. The Collected Letters, however, is scarcely complete; no collection could be. Many letters will still have to be consulted in the Huxley volume and from other sources; secondary items and duplicative letters were, as Moore ruefully points out, excised.

The earliest item is a postcard dated 1903, shortly after Lawrence had turned eighteen. At this point he was still very much the miner's son seeking a way out by attending a pupil-teacher center. The girl to whom the postcard is addressed is one of a group of friends known as the Pagans. The last letter, dated 1930, is from a sanatorium at Vence, France, a few days before his death. The intervening pages form the most complete epistolary record we have thus far of a major modern writer: his private life, his struggles with public and publishers, his friends—who often came and went in a rather kaleidoscopic way—his thought, the temper of his mind. They remind one most forcefully of the extent to which a writer is an intuitive register of his time, and therefore of time to come. Depressed and disgusted with the outbreak of World War I, Lawrence, from the beginning, is concerned with what is to follow, and in his musings he foreshadows the disillusionment of the 1920's. The society that could produce such a war is obviously sick, wrote Lawrence, but the society that is to follow, one that will contain the moral cripples blasted by the war, is almost too horrible to comprehend.

The Collected Letters creates a distinct persona. Rarely do his letters provide us with the sort of immediate, unfiltered reactions to experience that we find in other letters. His are more meditative and reasoned in tone. That fact might imply distortion. Nevertheless, the Lawrence we get is clearly a genuine Lawrence, one who persists below the surface of daily events. This Lawrence possesses the serene face of the man who has the capacity and the courage simply to be, who has discovered his own center of existence and refuses to be disturbed too much by the trivia and the peevishness of others, who is concerned that others learn, not certain rules and regulations, but how to live, and who is, therefore, fiercely against anything he considers a denial of life. Oddly, for the comparison would be shunned by the earlier author, he reminds one in these pages of an earlier idealist, Thoreau, who asserted: "I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life." Thus, in one letter, we find Lawrence asserting that one ought to fulfill as the deepest of all desires the wish to avoid the extraneous, to live only for pure relationships and living truth. The point is made over and over again in the letters: the need to put aside extraneous pressures, those of money and property, and to cultivate one's soul. This idea would not be foreign to the author of Walden, though, of course, Thoreau would scarcely have taken Lawrence's road to immortality.

Lawrence's desire is a general wish to distinguish between what is life and what is not-life, between being and not-being (Lawrence likes to quote Hamlet here). It is as part of this general desire that we get the specific ideas with which Lawrence has been identified and that we discover that those ideas are scarcely as specialized as they might seem to be in other contexts, as in his Fantasia of the Unconscious, for example. Here we find the very important letter of January 17, 1913, to Ernest Collins, a letter containing the first relatively systematic statement of Lawrence's belief in the emotions, in the body, in the sense of physical being, as against the abstract knowledge of life provided by the intellect, knowledge which, to Lawrence, is not knowledge at all. Here we find his attacks on Freud and Freudianism as being too abstract, too intellectual, in their approaches to man's hidden life. Here, in another important letter of July 16, 1916, to Catherine Carswell, we find Lawrence distinguishing his own views from those of Christianity, accepting the Christian ethic as the greatest historical force ever to sweep through mankind, but seeing it, as did George Bernard Shaw, as something to be surpassed. A new ethic is now needed, he claimed, one that will encourage the fulfillment of bodily as well as spiritual desires. Developed and modified in essays, fiction, and later letters, these concepts ultimately become the center of Lawrence's final statement on man and his time in Lady Chatterley's Lover.

In a very real sense these letters are better sources of Lawrence's attitudes than his more formal statements of them, for here those attitudes can be seen as aspects of his larger concerns—that man learn to love, not to hate, life, that he become capable of living joyously by developing his total self, not by denying any part of his being. Lawrence is, of course, fully aware of the fact that to a large extent he is reacting against his own problems. In September, 1913, after having run away with Frieda (then still married), he identifies himself as typically English in his repression of passions and emotions. After living some months with Frieda, he writes that he is learning to loosen up a little.

is the view it provides us of Lawrence's optimism, an optimism that could turn on occasion into an almost aggressive affirmation. It is scarcely a Pollyanna-like optimism. In one of the most haunting letters in the collection, written to Lady Cynthia Asquith, in January, 1915, Lawrence describes the depths of despair and hopelessness into which the news of the war had plunged him. He had been on a walking tour with some friends, and the sense of life was running high among them, when he learned that war had been declared. Since then, according to Lawrence, he has not seen anyone, spoken to anyone. Only now is he beginning to rise from his grave; he begins to hope that something may emerge from the war. As his spirits rise, so does his hope. Lawrence begins to hope, as did many of his generation, that the very destructiveness of the war may lead to the sort of smash-up that will require a social reconstruction, and the world may then be ready to listen to him. As it becomes evident that the smash-up is not going to take place, Lawrence falls back on his affirmation of the roots of life itself. Thus, in the darkest days of his career, toward the end of the war, we find him asserting the need for a carefree, spontaneous existence, the need to be. Shortly after the end of the war, while making plans to leave England, Lawrence writes cheerily that the important thing is not to be crushed; the capacity to live is the only thing that matters.

The clearest suggestion that there was something in Lawrence that could not be touched came during the war when Lawrence was looked upon suspiciously by his Cornish neighbors and apparently suspected of spying (Frieda was, after all, a Richthofen). Lawrence was ordered away from the coast on a few days' notice. We know from biographical sources how deeply hurt and outraged he was. In a less balanced man, the affair might well have become the center of his life. In the letters, however, we find Lawrence, after his initial shock, taking it all pretty much in stride. Ablaze with plans, he discovers that he is not really anxious to return to Cornwall. Infuriated again, after a visit from Scotland Yard, he manages to drop his fury with surprising speed; he has other matters on his mind—his new novel, literary essays, friends. Without rancor he can write of renting his cottage in Cornwall.

Even the suppression and censorship of his novels, embittering and demeaning as they were, failed to crush Lawrence. After The Rainbow was suppressed, we find him correcting proofs, collecting early poems for a book, trying out the idea of a subscription scheme for The Rainbow. He believed in his books as he believed in life and in himself. The reader who would know Lawrence can really know him only through his letters as well as his biography and his published works.

COLOR OF DARKNESS

Type of work: Short stories

Author: James Purdy (1923-)

First published: 1957

Color of Darkness is James Purdy's first book. It is a collection of eleven short stories and a novella, throughout which ordinary human experiences are purposely exaggerated so that a covert truth may find expression.

He has since written novels, more short stories, and plays. But it is a writer's first book which serves as a signpost to the road of his intention. It points the way to his personal arena; the piece of ground that he has cleared away and marked out as his own. It betokens the sort of problem with which he shall concern himself, and the types of people. In Purdy's case it indicates a penchant for unusual, often bizarre, situations which his characters seem hardly to notice. The outlandish is handled with nonchalance and the mundane contains the outlandish.

Each story, like a candle, would guide us through the darkness, but some burn more and others less intensely. In the more skillful stories, "Sound of Talking," "Cutting Edge," and the title story, "Color of Darkness," we as readers are inescapably confronted with one of our own hidden human secrets: our contact with each other makes us the helpless victims of ambivalence. And the life-long lesson that there is no hate, must be no hate, for our dear ones forces us to conceal the truth that we only sometimes acknowledge, and with which we even secretly sympathize. In Color of Darkness Purdy tries courageously to explore that hidden passageway and to shine his light on the unreasoning, frightening ambivalence which, in all its frustrating, infuriating shame permits a child to brutalize its pet and then to hug it lovingly and tearfully.

It is "Sound of Talking," probably the best of his stories, in which Purdy demonstrates how surely he can implicate his reader. A woman is talking to her husband in the kitchen. Paralyzed, the man is in a wheelchair; and he is in pain. We know about the man, Vergil, because we have access to Mrs. Farebrother's thoughts, and she knows him very well. She counters his steady flow of bilious expletives with a loquacity designed to distract him from his pain. By the time the reader realizes that the deceptively innocent kitchen is really Mrs. Farebrother's wheelchair and that she is irrevocably locked into her husband's ebbing life, he has already witnessed and sympathized with her impotent flutterings of chatter. By allowing ourselves to welcome her to our fire, we must recognize, when it reveals itself, that her ambivalence is a reflection of our own. We too need respite from the responsibility of caring for a helpless fellow being.

It is small wonder that her instincts bring her to admire a bird. And a bird which not only can fly, but talk as well! The raven which called her into the seed store keeps us focused upon that one point of concentration, Mrs. Farebrother's paralytic ambivalence, so that all seemingly independent strands of thought or conversation are ultimately seen as a careful release from this single spool.

The woman first speaks of desire: she would like a bird, a raven. As she describes to her paraplegic husband the events which led up to that desire, she remembers her former attraction to a boy who was called the raven, and that the bird talks of someone who is dead. Both thoughts are seen to be repetitions of her nighttime speculations. In the dark, in her need, she can safely wish Vergil dead, but during the daylight hours, when such thoughts have scurried to their hiding place, she must sheathe herself in solicitous redress. This has been her life's condition since Vergil's release from the hospital long before.

The raven, this raven, is a perfect solution. It would amuse her husband, she hopes, and signify the achievement of a mutual desire; both will have decided to have the bird. But there is more to be profited, which is known to us by implication. The bird's presence would give brazen, corporeal expression to her more timid, ambivalent thoughts. Vergil's refusal to accept any responsibility for the pet, however, eliminates all possibility of their ever sharing a desire again. The story ends with this realization, and both continue to manipulate their wheelchairs.

For the reader, having sympathized with Mrs. Farebrother, there is a recognition that her love-hate is an exaggeration of something familiar.

Also familiar is the situation in the title story, "Color of Darkness," which concludes uncomfortably, like a long unfulfilled desire nakedly exposed. The faintly dreamlike quality which suffuses this story may be attributed to the pensive nature of the father who is preoccupied with the exploration of his identity. He is out of touch with the people around him and is the victim of his inappropriate responses to them. Purdy designates him "the father" which is a most suitable epithet in its paradoxical implications. He is, indeed, the actual father of the boy, Baxter, for which he will be punished, but he has long ago delegated his parental responsibilities to his housekeeper—"mother," Mrs. Zilke. It is she who at the conclusion of the story has learned with the reader that the boy is already corrupted, that he knows the ways of the world and is a sinister member of the community. From its hiding place within the half truth of love and affection expressed in the boy's snuggling close and suddenly and surprisingly kissing his father, leaps forth the other half to complete the truth, his protestations of hate, culminating with a kick in the groin and an obscene word for that same bewildered father. Baxter allows himself to expose his ambivalence because his father is weak. In human beings, Purdy seems to recognize, there is an animal aversion to weakness and sickness which leads to brutality.

Most of us handle our ambivalence more gracefully, but we must recognize that an intensification of the circumstances which evoke such unwelcome feelings could weaken our check on their manifestations. So Purdy has intensified and exaggerated to denote a truth, and the reader must identify his own property.

But in the novella "63: Dream Palace" and in the story "Why Can't They Tell You Why?" the truth that Purdy overstates remains hidden in the exaggeration. It is hidden because the distortion allows us to deny its relevance to ourselves. What have we to do with a boy who murders the brother he loves in an abandoned house, or with a mother who drives her son into a hysterical state, apparently beyond recall? We may sense the horror of it, the disgust of it, but those "abnormalities" are the acts of distant relatives. There is for us here a saving aura of unreality; a third person; a dreamlike quality through which we may escape our responsibility of recognition.

The novella's exposition would have us believe that Fenton Riddleway, a boy who is possessed of what Freud calls brutal egotism, is extremely important to the interlocutors, Grainger and Parkheast. Their intimacy and boredom, conveyed to us by what feebly attempts to pass for provocative conversation, suggest that the boy is the subject of frequent discussion and considerable thought. The story's energy is dispersed among the lives of Parkheast, Grainger, and Fenton, settling finally on the Fenton fragment.

The boy has neither charm nor grace; he demonstrates no wit, nor is he particularly intelligent. His interests are personal, and his learning understandably little. In fact, the most interesting thing about him is the situation in which he finds himself. He is unfamiliar with the city in which he is stranded and is waiting for someone to guide him from the abandoned house to which he was directed. His ability to fascinate seems locked with him within the story, and the reader must accept Fenton, if he will, as the protagonist of a homosexual day-dream. But Fenton fails to make us dream. He is inordinately cruel to his brother Claire, and he abuses everyone whose interest in him indicates a weakness. Those who are willing to indulge his predatory nature resemble some flat-toothed creatures who happily embrace the beautiful tiger. Physical beauty is the quality which Fenton possesses, and those who meet him once may never recover from the encounter.

The novella insists that the handsome boy brings havoc to all who seek him out; and this we see him do. But why he is so sought, so valuable a possession, cannot be understood easily. The victims' willingness, therefore, to be oppressed, and to share oppression with their friends—Parkheast brings the tormentor to Grainger and Bruno brings him to Hayden—seems to be an indulgence in homosexual fantasy. This, however, is not the nightmare of a Kafka story which well might be the daylight experience of a nighttime adventure; it is more as though the reader were eavesdropping on someone else's fantasy. The novella fails to ensnare us, finally, because Fenton fails to charm without being seen. It is impossible to believe casual reports of a Medusa.

A collection of eleven short stories and a novella, however, is no mean first step for a writer, and if his foot comes down shakily sometimes, that fact does not blur some of the fine, clear prints.

THE COMPLAINT: OR, NIGHT THOUGHTS

Type of work: Philosophical poetry
Author: Edward Young (1683-1765)
First published: 1742-1745

Night Thoughts, as it is best known, belongs to the long and rich tradition of Graveyard Poetry which received some of its original impulses or boosts through Sir Richard Steele's Tatler Number 89 and Milton's Il Penseroso. Steele affirmed that the "proper Delight of Men of Knowledge and Virtue" is "that calm and elegant satisfaction which the vulgar call Melancholy." Milton had agreed, hailing

"divinest Melancholy," "whose saintly visage" is "O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue." Enough such mortuary poems and prose works existed in the eighteenth century to fill a coffin. The most notable was perhaps Thomas Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard, written during the years of completion of Young's masterpiece, with its organ-like roll of gloom and sadness.

All such poems begin in gloom and pity, feed the pose with assumed personal feeling, and subsequently delight in the feeling for its own sake, though ostensibly the purpose is the edification of the soul and spirit.

Edward Young's Night Thoughts was one of the most popular early examples of this school of poetry. His subject was "life, death, and immortality," as was that of most other such writers. This memento mori, with its near-static concentration on death and dissolution, Young felt to be his masterpiece, and though his reputation was slow in growing, once started as a result of the poem, it continued for a hundred years, mistakenly placing him as one of the great poets in the tradition.

The poem is somewhat autobiographical, such facts being embroidered as theology and purpose, and fecund imagination, suggested and demanded. Young's first wife, Lady Elizabeth Lee, had died in 1740. The daughter of Lady Elizabeth, the Narcissa of the poem, had died earlier, in 1736, and her husband, the Philander of the poem, had died in 1740. The obvious moral lesson to be drawn from the deaths of these people is strengthened by the introduction of a non-autobiographical character named Lorenzo, a "silken son of pleasure," whose "fond heart dances while the siren sings."

The nine "Nights" or Books vary little. The subject is the imminence of death, especially of the young, beautiful, and virtuous, and the triumph over it through Christianity. Young had a Puritanical dislike for wealth and debauchery, and a strong feeling about the dignity, nobility, and importance of man.

This poem is remarkably loose and rambling, even for this type of work. Young could not discipline his imagination, as his comments reveal: "My busy mind perpetually suggests new things; my heart knows not how to refrain from pursuing them. The volume grows upon my hands, till its bulk would defeat its end; new rays of thought dart in upon me, which, like cross lights, confound and perplex each other." He planned his poem as the opposite of most such works. Instead of using much narrative and tying his moralizings to the story, he uses only brief narrative and, as he said, "the morality arising from it makes the bulk of the poem." The author could not control his moral reflections.

The result is a poem in which the same thoughts are said over and over. There are, after all, only so many ways a poet can comment on "Life, Death, and Immortality" when there is little action. The consequence is a kind of infatuation with words for their own sake, with reflections which are unduly repetitious, with wordiness and dullness. He says, for example, that man is superb: "How wonderful, is man." Then repeats himself sixteen lines later: "O what a miracle to man is man." There are numerous other instances of repeated ideas.

Within the style, however, there are strengths. Young's fondness for words, for cello-like constructions which roll from the pen and tongue, create some striking sentences. He is especially noteworthy for his apothegms, for his philosophical truisms, which, though they might seem to state more than they actually say, were impressive in his time and are noteworthy even today. Such, for example, are the statements: "Procrastination is the thief of time," the unoriginal but sententious "Life is war," and "Today is yesterday returned."

The value or weakness of the poem must, however, rest on its message, its "philosophy" and theological musings and statements. Generated in hatred of pomp and circumstance, in human presumption, and driven by man's common lot on earth, the poem sweeps across man's common lot and common fate, concentrating on the miracle and the misery, the hope and the hopelessness of man. Man is "poor," "rich," "abject," "august," "complicated," and "wonderful." Yet God is infinitely more wonderful, who made man such. The author trembles at the fact that man is both wormlike and godlike. Yet nature insists that the worm shall rise beyond the grave, "night proclaims [the] soul immortal." Though "all on earth is shadow, all beyond / Is substance." Though the earth is shaky and trembling. Heaven is "solid" and unchanging.

Young dwells on and catalogues man's woes: "War, famine, pest, volcano, storm, and fire,/Intestine broils," and such cataloguing, in him as in other poets, reveals and contains much of his weakness. But it sets the stage for the full coverage of his subject. It is mankind, beset by these troubles, mankind in general, that the poet is concerned with. He mourns for the many millions and for their "common lot," the "throes on all of woman born."

The first book outlines the author's general approach, his reflections on life's vicissitudes and his hopes, including an effective prayer to the deity who "put to flight/Primeval silence." The next seven books are addressed to the "silken son of pleasure" Lorenzo, the infidel, whose thoughts and actions will reap him eternal damnation. Young reflects often on the reasons for the infidel's attitude. In the preface to Book VI he conjectures that probably such people are "supported in their deplorable error by some doubt of their immortality." He is encouraged in his hope for their eventual salvation by the feeling that "men once thoroughly convinced of their immortality are not far from being Christians."

Book IX, entitled "The Consolation," ends the poem in a vision of the last day, of eternity, and of the wonder of God's creation and plan. This book rises to a rhapsody of hope and affirmation of man's ultimate triumph that is effective. Night is banished; there is no more darkness. "Joy breaks; shines; triumphs; 'tis eternal day." Though the soul has experienced a few evils, can it, a worm, a nothing, complain? The soul blends "the two supports of human happiness": "True taste of life, and constant thought of death!" And "universal midnight! reigns."

For the modern reader this poem is undoubtedly too morbid, too macabre, too static. Its great popularity fed on the contemporary taste for such morbidity. The importance of the poem rests more on its historical interest as an example of the graveyard school of poetry than on its intrinsic value as a work of art.

CONCERNING ILLUSTRIOUS MEN

Author: Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus (c. 70-c. 140)

First transcribed: 106-113

Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus was a friend of Pliny the Younger, many of whose letters were addressed to him. He was an attorney of note, and he served for a time (117-138) as private secretary to the Emperor Hadrian. It was in this position that he found available to him much information denied to other Roman historians and biographers. Suetonius was considered one of the most learned men of his age, and he wrote a number of books. Among them were such volumes as Famous Courtesans, The Kings, Public Offices, Rome, Greek Games, Cicero's 'De Republica', Greek Abusive Terms. None of these works has survived. In fact, only two of his works have come down to us: the virtually complete Lives of the Twelve Caesars (De vita Caesarum) and the fragmentary and far less famous Concerning Illustrious Men (De viris illustribus), which was probably Suetonius' first published work.

original and complete form, was a biographical study of Romans who had been important in literature and literary and language studies down to the reign of the Emperor Domitian. It was made up of five sections devoted respectively to Poets, Orators, Historians, Philosophers, and Grammarians and Rhetoricians—by “grammarians” was meant teachers of literature; “rhetoricians” meant teachers of oratory. The parts of Concerning Illustrious Men that have survived did not come down to us in a group; this circumstance has contributed to the corrupt and fragmentary condition of the texts. What remains of the section on “Grammarians and Rhetoricians” (our most extensive fragment) was found in the mid-fifteenth century in a manuscript of some of the works of the historian Tacitus. The other parts of Concerning Illustrious Men that survived were abstracted from unrelated manuscripts and works in which Suetonius is quoted. The section on “Poets,” which we know from references in an ancient writer’s work, originally contained at least thirty-three lives. Parts of six of these remain. Suetonius’ Life of Terence was preserved in the Commentary of the fourth century grammarian, Aelius Donatus, as were the “Lives” of Horace, Lucan, Vergil, Tibullus, and Persius. Some of these “Lives” have obviously been drastically abridged, and we have no way of knowing how much of what we have was actually written by Suetonius, or, in fact, if all of them actually were written by him in the first place.

The section on “Orators” is represented in modern editions of Suetonius only by a brief abstract of the Life of Passienus Crispus (fl. A.D. 50). We know that at least fourteen other orators were treated in the original publication. From the section on “Historians,” only the life of Pliny the Elder remains; we know the names of five other men who were also Suetonius’ subjects. From the section on “Philosophers,” we have only a list of three of the men whom Suetonius wrote about: Marcus Terentius Varro, Publius Nigidius Figulus, and Lucius Annaeus Seneca.

Concerning Illustrious Men begins with the section on “Grammarians and Rhetoricians.” The section opens with a brief history of the study of grammar, that is, literary studies, in Rome up to the middle of the second century B.C. At first, grammar was not studied at all and was little esteemed. The earliest teachers, who were both poets and Italian Greeks, interpreted only Greek poetry or gave readings from their own Latin writings. The real beginning of grammatical studies in Rome is attributed, by Suetonius, to an accident that occurred to a Greek ambassador visiting Rome between the second and third Punic wars, about 168 B.C. This was close to the time of the death of Ennius, the first important Roman poet. Crates of Mallos, in Rome to confer with the Senate, broke his leg by falling into an open sewer. During his convalescence, as before his accident, the Greek organized many gatherings at which poetry was read and was considered critically. These sessions set a fashion and an example for the Roman literary set, and soon the works of Roman poets, who had circulated their poems privately, were made known in many public readings. Literary conversation and study grew in popularity and soon became established in Rome and the provinces.

It should be noticed, says Suetonius, that although “grammarian,” the Greek term for teacher of literature, was to become prevalent, the Latin term “literati” was at first the most widely used. Also, in the early days, grammarians taught both literature and rhetoric; but this practice soon faded out as scholars began to specialize, grammarians being concerned with language and literary culture and rhetoricians being concerned with the training of effective speakers and, thus, lawyers and politicians. Suetonius, after his general introduction, goes on to give brief and deft anecdotal biographical sketches of Rome's nineteen most distinguished teachers of literature.

On turning to his consideration of Roman rhetoricians, Suetonius again gives a brief historical survey of the field. Rhetorical studies were begun in Rome in about the same way and about the same time as grammatical studies. At first the Senate was actively opposed to this Greek innovation and passed laws forbidding philosophers and rhetoricians to live in Rome. Resolutions were passed condemning Latin rhetoricians and the young men who spend "whole days in idleness" at their schools. But little by little rhetoric became visibly useful and thus honorable. Then, after describing the several methods of instruction current among the rhetoricians, Suetonius gives biographical sketches of eight notable rhetoricians. The other "Lives" originally attached to this section are lost.

Of the six "Lives" remaining to us from the section on the "Poets," those of Terence and Vergil are relatively long and seem reasonably complete. The "Lives" of Horace and Persius are substantial enough, but are evidently somewhat abridged; the "Lives" of Tibullus and Lucan are mere fragments. The "Life" of Terence is interesting for its own sake and for the insight it gives into the early development of the Roman theater and the brilliant circle of Scipio Africanus and Gaius Laelius. Also, it is interesting to note that Terence's plays were thought too good to be written by a slave and that a controversy arose in which it was claimed by some that Terence's aristocratic friends actually wrote the comedies.

The "Life" of Vergil, however, is the premier selection in Concerning Illustrious Men. Suetonius, apparently, had a great deal of material to draw from (his access to the Imperial archives undoubtedly helped him a great deal), and he furnishes us with both a good psychological portrait of Vergil and much intimate detail concerning the poet's relationship with the Imperial court of Augustus. Vergil, it seems, was a gentle, virtuous, precise, and much venerated man. His long struggle to write the Aeneid and his literary life in general are commented upon at length.

The "Life" of Horace presents the man much as his poetry does: a modest, quietly epicurean personality who judiciously sought the pleasant life and a certain practical wisdom. The "Life" of Persius emphasizes that prematurely dead young poet's great purity and disinterested virtue, and the fragment on Lucan gives us a good insight into that not entirely wise young poet's personality. The paragraph on Tibullus is merely a short notice of the poet's birth, activity, and death. Concerning Illustrious Men concludes with long paragraphs on the historian Pliny the Elder and the orator Passienus Crispus.

THE CONFIDENTIAL CLERK

Author: T. S. Eliot (1888-1965)

Time: The present

Locale: London, England

First presented: 1953

Principal characters:

EGGERSON, the retiring confidential clerk

SIR CLAUDE MULHAMMER, a successful financier

ELIZABETH MULHAMMER, his wife

COLBY SIMPSON, the new confidential clerk

LUCASTA ANGEL, one of Sir Claude's illegitimate offspring

B. KAGHAN, Lucasta's fiancé and Lady Elizabeth's son

MRS. GUZZARD, Colby's mother

Readers who know something about T. S. Eliot's poems and not much about his plays may not have found in the poems that immediacy or simplicity of thought, imagery, and style which alone can please them. Some may have avoided the plays on that account. If so, they have been in error, for Eliot appeared aware of the importance of being intelligible to the listening audience in the theater. There is no time, and he knew it, for ingenious metaphysical images when the objective is to create dramatically and poetically a significant semblance of life. The plays, then, and this one in particular, have a clean poetic character which makes them swift-moving and understandable.

It does not follow from this that The Confidential Clerk is without depth or poetic value. The depth is where it ought to be, not on the surface and not in a complexity of language, but underneath, a matter of feeling and reflection, dramatically enforced. The play is poetic in the best sense: an abstract idea, not wholly communicable in descriptive language, is expressed by means of characters and situations which are partly illustrative and partly symbolic. Seven characters of various sorts, moving without complete self-understanding in their individual orbits, are presented as parts of a creatively controlled universe of conversation. The retiring confidential clerk, Eggerson, himself satisfied with the way of life he has chosen, unifies the action and brings the other characters, or sees them brought, to something of the same sort of adjustment to life.

The language is poetic, but not as in Eliot's nondramatic verse. Here the poetry is controlled by an interest in making everything clear and in making that clarity emotionally important, suggestive of ideas and feelings which even clear language cannot express. Perhaps the main poetic value of the dialogue is in its rhythmical force. There is nothing obvious about that rhythm; it is not metered, but free. Nevertheless, it is wholly satisfying, it fits the conditions of the stage, and it moves the reader swiftly and deeply.

Sir Claude Mulhammer is revealed at the outset discussing with his former confidential clerk, Eggerson, the probable response of Sir Claude's wife, Elizabeth, to Colby Simpson, the new confidential clerk. It is not simply a question of justifying a change to a woman who has respected Eggerson's ability and character; it is a question of determining how best to win her to Colby's side without letting her know that Colby is Sir Claude's illegitimate son. Sir Claude's idea is to maneuver Elizabeth into the position of wanting to adopt Colby. Thus, when Eggerson asks him whether he will let Elizabeth know that Colby is Claude's son, Claude answers that he does not know what his wife's reaction will be. There is always something we never know about people, he adds, so that often when we think we understand them well, we are completely mistaken about them.

The problem for the people in the play is not simply that of understanding the persons about them, although such understanding is as important as it is difficult; it is the problem of having the characters know themselves. Each is somewhat self-deluded, with the possible exception of Eggerson, and the discovery of that self-delusion is made difficult because each of these persons is intelligent, realistic, and willing to limit ambition if ambition has outstripped ability.

Sir Claude is a successful financier who has always wished to be a potter. Having recognized his inability to be a great potter—that is, to create works of art which will move others in the same profound and indescribable way that he is moved—he restricts his pottery-making to a solitary room beyond the observations of others. The possibility that it might be better for him to make his poor pots openly does not occur to him; he is too candid in his self-appraisal to believe that he might be mistaken in his humility. His fault is in wanting his son Colby to be like him; and it is understandable that he should have this fault, for Colby is—not a disappointed potter—but a disappointed organist. Colby has recognized his limitations, too, and he also confines his playing to a solitary room in order that he may imagine there the music that others would not hear even if they were listening.

These solitary pursuits of personal ambitions which cannot publicly be enjoyed are discussed as retreats to “secret gardens.” Lucasta Angel, another of Claude’s illegitimate offspring, but by a different mother, says to Colby that difficult as it may be for a man to give up a career on which he has set his heart, he loses only the outer world in so doing; he still has his inner world, his private, hidden “garden.”

Lucasta believes that she has no garden; she depresses herself with memories of a shabby mother and the grubby part of London where she lived. But Colby tells her that her garden exists somewhere, created by her own desire.

Eliot carries his audience along by means of a series of discoveries to the knowledge that Lucasta’s fiancé, B. Kaghan, is Lady Elizabeth’s son—thus destroying her hope that Colby is her son and not Claude’s—that Claude’s son, presumably in the care of a Mrs. Guzzard, died at birth, and that Mrs. Guzzard substituted her own son for Claude’s. Colby, then, is Mrs. Guzzard’s son, belonging to neither Claude nor Elizabeth. Since Colby finds that he is the son of a disappointed musician, now dead, he is freed from the compulsion to be like Claude, and he is able to build a new character to replace the ambitious one that could not be great. Colby settles for a minor goal, but for one closer to his heart, and he resolves to be an organist in a small parish church.

Each of the characters, except Egger-son, then realizes the extent to which the conception of Colby and of themselves had been falsely determined by their wishes. The resolution of the play, both in content and manner, reminds one of Oedipus Rex, and Eliot wisely takes advantage of the classic aura his play enjoys. Yet his play is not merely a modernized Greek tragedy; it is something more in thought and style; and, above all, it is not a tragedy. True, the characters come to the soul-changing point of discovery. Although Oedipus blinded and exiled himself as the result of self-knowledge, he did so for dynastic as well as moral reasons. The crime in The Confidential Clerk is not incest or intellectual pride, but self-delusion and self-limitation; and the discovery of these latter crimes, as modern as they are ancient, leads not to self-exile or suicide, but to self-reformation. Each goes to his own garden, although the garden need no longer be kept secret. (Incidentally, it is significant to realize that Egger-son’s garden is neither secret nor metaphorical; he wanted to be a confidential clerk, he was able to be a confidential clerk, and his garden yields real vegetables.)

It is a pleasure to read a play that is clear on the surface, poetically finished, and morally pertinent to any time. In the season of its presentation The Confidential Clerk provided evidence in support of the claim that Eliot’s Nobel Prize was richly deserved.

THE CONSCIENCE OF THE RICH

Author: C. P. Snow (1905-)

Time: 1927-1936

Locale: London and the nearby countryside

First published: 1958

Principal characters:

LEWIS ELIOT, a barrister, the narrator and protagonist of the Strangers and Brothers series

CHARLES MARCH, a member of a wealthy Anglo-Jewish banking family

LEONARD MARCH, his retired father, called "Mr. L."

SIR PHILIP MARCH, Leonard March's older brother and the head of the March family

KATHERINE MARCH GETLIFFE, Leonard March's daughter

FRANCIS GETLIFFE, her husband, a Cambridge physicist

ANN SIMON MARCH, Charles' wife, an active Communist

HERBERT GETLIFFE, Francis' much older half brother, a lawyer, involved in unethical transactions

RONALD PORSON, an embittered failure despite great gifts, in love with Ann Simon

HUMPHREY SEYMOUR, the editor of Note, a Communist scandal sheet

Lewis Eliot, the narrator of C. P. Snow's Strangers and Brothers series, struggles throughout his early years up the ladders of power and influence; in The Conscience of the Rich, he comes into contact with the Marches, a family long at or near the pinnacle of prestige, and in them he observes the way in which changing conditions have altered the meaning of being rich and powerful in the years between two world wars. Specifically, he observes the clash between two generations of Marches, an older generation to whom wealth and influence come naturally, and a younger generation for whom being wealthy and benevolent is not enough but is, at times, something to be ashamed of.

The Marches are one of the great Anglo-Jewish banking families; the history of their rise and partial decline is part of the history of wealth and wealthiness in England. During the years from 1880 to 1914, a great time for the making and accumulation of wealth, the Marches had grown steadily in importance after their ancestors migrated to England from Holland and opened a bank in London. Those were also years of nearly full freedom for English Jews: the Marches took seats in Parliament, owned strings of race horses, befriended the arts, voted Conservative, went to Oxford and Cambridge; they remained, however, members of a tightly knit circle of English Jews, among whom they married and socialized.

able in society and politics in terms of money. But international finance was, even then, becoming a vastly complicated business; the time had passed in which a private loan to a South American government was significant. The Marches, though richer than ever, were already becoming anachronistic in the 1890's when they had to choose between taking non-family members into the bank or selling it. They sold the bank.

Thus, the influence of the older generation of Marches, who were wealthy in the best years for men to be wealthy, is beginning to wane. A major source of conflict is the fact that they do not recognize the changes of the post-World War I years and the new kinds of responsibilities inherited by their children. The background of the novel is a drastic change in the world; the focus is on those most affected by the change, a rich family; and, somewhat ironically, the story is chronicled by someone gaining the kinds of influence congruent with the changing world, kinds that do not rest primarily on wealth.

At the center of the March family in the 1920's are Sir Philip, a Cabinet Minister, and his younger brother Leonard, familiarly called "Mr. L.," both about seventy, both vigorous. The hopes for the next generation of Marches rest solely on Charles, Mr. L.'s son, and a close friend of Lewis Eliot. Charles is headed toward an outstanding, perhaps brilliant career in law; much of the novel centers on the conflicts leading to and generated by Charles' decision to give up the law and become a physician.

The reason for his decision and the gravity of its consequences are identical: the bar, to him, represents the community of wealthy and influential Jews, and this is the community from which he is trying to escape.

Mr. March cannot accept Charles' refusal to be tagged as a bright, rich Jew; Charles cannot accept the tag. About the same time Katherine, Charles' younger sister, falls in love with and eventually marries Francis Getliffe, a young Cambridge physicist and a Gentile. Although Mr. March finally accepts Katherine's defection, he cannot accept Charles' more crucial one: Charles' decision is a blow to the heart of Mr. March's existence, to the strong family ties, the involvement in affairs, the strongly patriarchal tradition of the great house. It is clear enough that C. P. Snow sees the conflict as inevitable, the result of those same historical forces that first brought the March family into prominence and opened a place for the Jews in English social and political life. The Marches thrived under conditions produced by forces ultimately destructive to valuable traditions; a generation later, the same forces are destroying the traditions established by the March family. Wealth per se and the old family customs have both come to mean less. Charles must adapt to these new conditions. Mr. March must cling to the old ways, the more so for their being archaic.

When Charles persists in his plan of becoming a doctor, and further complicates matters by deciding to marry Ann Simon, who, though Jewish, is from a social class much lower than that of the Marches, Mr. March withdraws his commitment to make Charles independently wealthy.

Following the marriages of Charles and Katherine, in 1929, there is a break of some seven years in the narration. In 1936, Philip March has the same Parliamentary secretaryship he had held briefly before, and a scandal that had threatened to break then is once again in the air. The scandal concerns an investment Sir Philip made in a company doing business with his ministry. Mr. March asks Lewis Eliot for help, first because Eliot has worked for Herbert Getliffe, a half brother of Katherine's husband, who was doing legal work for Sir Philip's ministry at the time of the stock sale, and second because Lewis, unlike Mr. March, still maintains contact with Charles. This relationship is in turn important because Charles' wife Ann, an active Communist, knows of the stock transaction and is being urged to use it to discredit the Conservative government in power at the time. It is clear, and Ann knows the truth, that Sir Philip is guilty of nothing and that the only shady dealings were those made by Herbert Getliffe. She is, however, considering releasing damaging information simply in hopes of discrediting the government.

Lewis, sent to dissuade her, appears to succeed, at least to the point that, during an almost fatal illness, Ann gives him information which if Charles decides to release it, will not only stop the scandal but also put her paper, the Note, out of business. Charles, however, decides not to use the knowledge he has gained. Note publishes the information, and Sir Philip, as a scapegoat, is asked to resign. Mr. March completely disinherits Charles, who, though he could have stopped Ann, has refused to do so because he was incapable of using his love as a lever.

This, for all intents and purposes, is the end of the Marches as a great family. But Snow—and this fact explains much of his strategy in the novel—is interested in the Marches more as types than as individuals; he is more concerned with the ending of an era than in the personal downfall of his characters. Hence, much of the novel is devoted to sketching that family as an example of a class, one that is ceasing to exist. Much of the book is devoted to neither character delineation nor plot development but rather to evocation of the way of life of the March family: to the Friday night institution of a great dinner at their house on Bryanston Square, to the anecdotes of Leonard March, to Charles March's reflections on what it means to be rich and Jewish, and, more than anything else, to Mr. March himself, the exemplar of the spirit of family and tradition. Mr. March, in fact, is the liveliest character in the novel. Snow is at his best in this novel, as in several of his others, when presenting a character whose individual qualities or eccentricities are shown by means bordering on caricature. Given the aim of the novel, this method is artistically justifiable.

This aim is consonant with the plan of the whole Strangers and Brothers sequence. Lewis Eliot is on the way up. He is far from a simple man; his feelings often take him off ambition's path; his road to the top is not at all straight. But the centers of power are still his chief interest, and getting near them is his main goal. The Marches are the symbol of what was once the top. Their story, as related in the novel, brings home the fact that there have been a great many changes in the terrain Eliot wants to conquer. The Marches are still rich and still a great family, but they are no longer truly powerful. Sentiment and the aura of wealth and tradition draw Lewis to the family. But, he recognizes, his road to power will take him elsewhere.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE PRINCIPAL EVENTS OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

Type of work: History

ALBERT JEAN MICHEL ROCCA, Madame de Staël's second husband

Few people have had a better viewpoint during a period of violence than Anne Louise Germaine Necker during the French Revolution. The daughter of the financier and statesman, Jacques Necker, and the wife of the Swedish Ambassador Baron Eric Magnus Staël von Holstein, she observed her father's efforts to save France from the financial crisis he saw coming to overturn his country. She also watched the early phases of the Revolution, the storming of the Bastille, and the cruelty practiced against French nobility in the name of liberty. Only because of her ambassadorial status did she live through the Reign of Terror.

Later she clashed with Napoleon. Exiled by him from France, she barely escaped from his army marching on Moscow. She witnessed his triumphs and his abdications. Writing about it all, she put into her account of these historical events the wit and charm that made her one of the best conversationalists of her day.

Swarthy of complexion, with thick lips and a prominent nose, noteworthy for her bad taste in clothes, and—judged by her portrait by the artist François Gérard—dumpy and anything but pretty, Madame de Staël held a position at the center of the European stage, at the summit of the political and intellectual elite. She was visited by Schlegel, Schiller, Byron, and Wellington. She had children by four men, only one of them her husband, and affairs with another half dozen of the important men of her time.

Besides a few frothy novels, and essays on phases of French literature, Madame de Staël was the author of Germany, which introduced German Romanticism into French culture, and of the autobiographical Considerations on the Principal Events of the French Revolution, published posthumously. It was the Bible of French liberals during the Restoration.

Toward the end of her life, saddened by the death of her second son, Albert, the sickly Germaine Necker, Madame de Staël, began a patriotic essay to refute the idea that Louis XVI and the French regime overthrown by the Revolution were truly representative of French traditions. To her, the Revolution culminated a long struggle for liberty by the real France, the bourgeoisie or Third Estate, against the nobility and the clergy. Though held in check by centuries of oppression, the bourgeoisie had remained true to its traditional ideals. Madame de Staël takes pains to separate her defense of liberty from any apology for atrocities committed in liberty's name.

Though she admits at the beginning of her book that she has lived through what she considers one of the great eras of French history and has played her part in it, Madame de Staël announces her determination to regard it as some period of ancient history about which she can write with impartiality. Except for an occasional outburst of emotion, she does indeed display indignation without hatred, and wrath without resentment.

Germaine Necker was the daughter of a wealthy, famous man, and was reared by a mother who followed the precepts of Rousseau's Emile. Having learned life through literature, the daughter, though acclaimed as an intelligent woman and a witty conversationalist, possessed little solid learning. But she, who could declare that the pursuit of politics was religion, morality, and poetry, all in one, was a keen observer and had abundant opportunity to learn.

Embarked on her theme of liberty, she begins her book with the statement that Greece and Rome fell because, despite the blessings of a free society for some, they enslaved the many. She comments on the backward state of most of Asia, the result of despotic control. The serfs of more recent civilizations represent a condition nearly as degraded. She considers their emancipation a necessary step in the world's climb to civilization.

To the author, an absolutist government is the worst political form, while a system that maintains an aristocracy is almost as intolerable in the eyes of the lower classes. To make her point, she reviews France's history during the eight centuries prior to the Revolution. At least every quarter century, some sort of social clash occurred: peasants against nobles, nobles against sovereigns, Protestants against Catholics, or Parliament against the Court, each struggle arising from resentment against arbitrary assumption of power.

Those who praise the beautiful edifices of Louis XIV, she remarks, forget that the despots of Egypt could erect even more spectacular structures, like the pyramids of Memphis, because of their supply of slave labor. Of the great writers of the Age of Louis XIV, the king persecuted more than he encouraged, and the best did not appear until the end of his reign. His conquests and the expansion of French territory came at the expense of internal disorder. His subjects insulted his funeral procession, and the Parliament canceled his will.

However, this high-spirited woman does not confine her attention to a long-dead king. She continues her thesis by indicating how the weak character of Louis XV and the endless errors resulting from that character sparked a spirit of resentment that remained to trouble Louis XVI, despite his own scrupulous conscientiousness. Madame de Staël calls his wife, Marie Antoinette, "one of the most amiable and gracious persons who ever filled a throne."

This discussion brings her to the other purpose of her book, a filial vindication of the acts of the French Minister of Finance. Brought into the government in 1776 as head of the treasury by M. de Maurepas, Prime Minister of Louis XVI, Jacques Necker was in and out of power for the next fifteen years, resigning when his suggestions were disregarded, and being reappointed by demand of the populace. He advocated the establishment of provincial assemblies, taxation for everyone, and noninvolvement in the struggle between England and her rebellious American colonies.

Most people today do not even remember the name of Jacques Necker. To such, the chief interest of this book will be the sections concerning the French Revolution and the enmity between Madame de Staël and Napoleon Bonaparte. However, it should be remembered that a warning from her probably saved Napoleon from assassination in Elba.

In 1786, Germaine married a Swedish nobleman, Eric Magnus Staël von Holstein, an opportunist whose quick thinking and loud voice helped make Gustavus III absolute monarch of Sweden in 1772. Eric obtained an assignment to Paris. There he cleverly arranged a marriage to Germaine contingent upon his appointment as Ambassador to France, with the post likewise contingent upon the marriage. He achieved both at the age of thirty-seven, seventeen years older than his wife. The marriage brought him wealth and Germaine an established position and a complaisant husband. Their only child, a daughter, died at the age of two.

In those troubled times, Madame de Staël's status gave her a measure of security. It also permitted her to sit in the gallery on May 5, 1789, at the meeting of the States General to act on demands of the Third Estate for more power. Her influence enabled her to save some of the nobles. By flirting with one of the committee, she escaped with her own life, to describe from a distance the trial of Louis XVI and, eventually, the fall of Robespierre.

The second part of the book is largely devoted to Madame de Staël's relationship with Napoleon. She makes evident her opinion of him speaking bluntly of his egotism and his attempts to impose his will on Europe. A lover of literature herself, she sneers at his self-given title "Member of the National Institute." She portrays him as dextrous in the art of dazzling multitudes and of corrupting individuals. She cites the external pressures, like French fear of the Jacobins, that let him assume power. From personal observation she describes the Revolt of the 18th Brumaire on November 9, 1799, and the establishment of the Consular Constitution, as well as the steps by which Napoleon attained supreme power.

Madame de Staël does not hide the personal and political reasons that made them enemies. The first man of France could not abide one who would be the country's first woman. He tolerated no greatness but his own. She calls Napoleon's love of glory "ambition;" he called hers "meddling." Both of them hated being objects of mockery but both were masters at using it, frequently against each other. Their difference lay in the way she appealed to men's virtues, while Napoleon appealed to their vanity and greed. Another difference was that he had the power to exile his enemies.

The publication in 1802 of a political study by Germaine's father, then retired to his estate on Lake Geneva, angered Napoleon because of its statements about him and the prediction of his downfall. Falsely accusing Germaine of providing M. Necker with information, Napoleon banned her again in 1803 as she had been exiled eight years earlier.

Her reaction was to hope she deserved the exile more on account of what she had done than because of her father's book. For twelve years she was not allowed to return to Paris. Her father and her husband were both dead, but she consoled herself by traveling to Weimar with a French statesman, Benjamin Constant, author of one of the earliest psychological novels, Adolphe. She says very little about him or about the other men with whom she was constantly involved.

From a distance she maintained her feud with Napoleon, charging him with profoundly changing the character of her countrymen. He taught them a love of luxury, she claimed, and an ability to dissemble; he ended the traditional French spirit of courtesy. Above all he caused retrogression in their literature.

During her exile from France, Madame de Staël also traveled to England, and her admiration for the English fills the last of the six divisions of her book. She sums up her opinion of them in one sentence: "The history of the political existence of England furnishes us with the noblest monument of moral greatness ever achieved by mankind."

Napoleon's banishment permitted Madame de Staël to return to Paris in 1814, to find the city occupied by foreign armies. Now she could see and describe the agonies of the first year of Restoration. She had definite ideas about proper steps to take, but before much could be accomplished, on March 6, 1815, Napoleon once more landed on the French coast. However, before their feud could be resumed, his second abdication came, on June 22, 1815, and with it her book ends.

This fifth section, and the first draft of an essay on English history and character, complete the work. They were written in 1816. Madame de Staël's illness prevented revision, and the manuscript was left incomplete at her death. Two people worked to put it into publishable form: her oldest surviving son, Auguste Louis de Staël, and her son-in-law, Achille Charles Léonce Victor, Duc de Broglie, the husband of her only daughter Albertine. It was published in 1818. Probably these two men were also responsible for the anonymous English translation of that same year, published in both London and New York. Considerations on the Principal Events of the French Revolution never had the literary influence of Madame de Staël's Germany, but even today it is worth some study for the insight it gives to one of the most important women of that era.

CONVERSATIONS OF GOETHE WITH ECKERMANN AND SORET

Author: Johann Peter Eckermann (1792-1854)

Time: 1823-1832

Locale: Weimar, Germany

First published: 1836 and 1848

Principal characters:

JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE

JOHANN PETER ECKERMANN

FRÉDÉRIC SORET

There is no doubt that Goethe must be classified as the outstanding genius of German literature. The question remains which of his works is the most important one. For some readers it is Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (William Meister's Apprenticeship), the prototype of the educational novel or Bildungsroman. For others it is Faust, the perennial favorite of German theater audiences. But many Goethe scholars usually place the Conversations with Eckermann close to the top of the list. It seems that the absence of any requirement for literary form permits a greater appreciation of the universal knowledge which Goethe possessed. It is said also that Goethe was the only man of his time who was able to absorb the major part of knowledge which was then known to mankind. The power of a truly informed man, one gifted with unusual creative abilities, is demonstrated in these conversations. Thus the literary world is grateful to the efforts of Eckermann, who recorded these talks which cover the last ten years of Goethe's long life. Eckermann critics claim that he is attempting to dramatize everything, and that a few entries are fictitious. These objections may be true, since Eckermann worshiped his idol, and some of the entries were made fifteen years after the death of Goethe.

Still, Eckermann's conversations constitute the most complete record of the kind available. The shortcomings, obvious in any attempt to arrive at the true Goethe, were expressed by Goethe himself a few days before his death: "The best of our conviction cannot be put into words. Language is not adjusted to express everything." In 1836, Eckermann published the first two volumes of the work. A third volume appeared in 1848, in which he also used a manuscript by Frédéric Soret, another close friend of Goethe.

Goethe born in 1792, grew up in poverty. Until he was fourteen years old, he did not even know that the fine arts existed. An urge to draw resulted in some fine sketches, which opened the door to a series of patrons. He also started to write poetry and sent some verses to Goethe, who responded with encouraging words. In 1823 he completed "Contributions to Poetry," and looked for a publisher who would be willing to pay him a reasonable price. He sent his work to Goethe with the intention of obtaining Goethe's recommendation to Herr von Cotta, a well-known publisher. To meet Goethe personally he started out on a strenuous journey by foot to Weimar. Here he became Goethe's private secretary, a post which gave him the unique chance of witnessing all of Goethe's social functions and provided many opportunities to talk with Goethe alone. Eckermann's love of poetry and his quest to gain a deeper insight into ". . . what holds the world together" (Goethe, Faust) qualified him as a worthy conversational partner. Eckermann himself, scholar enough to realize that it would be impossible to give a true perspective of Goethe, called his work simply "My Goethe." However, he never acted as a selector or censor in the course of his work. Even when he was of the opinion that Goethe sometimes contradicted himself, he did not attempt to establish an artificial "Goethe viewpoint." The result is a diary-styled compilation of notes which leave it to the reader to draw conclusions about the real meaning of Goethe's opinions and statements. The English translation by John Oxenford has the merit of having arranged the entries of the three volumes in chronological order, not the case in the original edition. The very first entry points to the large range of interest of Goethe, and gives us some idea about his appearance:

The conversation turned principally upon mineralogy, chemistry, and natural science. The phenomena of the polarization of light appeared to interest him particularly. He showed me various preparations, chiefly after his own designs, and expressed a wish to make some experiments with me. . . . His figure is still to be called handsome; his forehead and eyes are extremely majestic. He is tall and well built, and so vigorous in appearance that one can scarcely comprehend how he has been able for some years to declare himself too old to enter into society, and to go to court.

It is not unusual to find Goethe discussing a Beethoven sonata, student songs, poetry, opera, or the translation of a Greek drama in one single conversation. Very early the reader also encounters Goethe as a man who has difficulty in adjusting to sickness. His abhorrence of sickness was to stay with him until the end.

The first entry by Eckermann himself on June 10, 1823, tells of Eckermann's meeting with Goethe:

He received me with great cordiality; and the impression he made on me was such, that I consider this day as one of the happiest in my life. . . . The interior of the house made a very pleasant impression upon me; without being showy, everything was extremely simple and noble.

Goethe gave Eckermann several small assignments, which Eckermann performed to his satisfaction, and this accomplishment led to an invitation to stay on as Goethe's secretary.

Goethe implored his young admirer to learn from the past:

Our errors were endured because we found no beaten path; but from him who comes later into the world more is required; he must not be seeking and blundering, but should use the instructions of the old ones to proceed at once on the right path. It is not enough to take steps which may some day lead to a goal; each step must be itself a goal and a step likewise.

Because Goethe considered Eckermann a true poet, he talked a great deal on the subject:

The world is so great and rich, and life so full of variety, that you can never want occasion for poems. But they must all be occasional poems; that is to say, reality must give both impulse and material for their production. A particular case becomes universal and poetic by the very circumstance that it is treated by a poet. All my poems are occasional poems, suggested by real life, and having therein a firm foundation. I attach no value to poems snatched out of the air.

And again:

What can be more important than the subject, and what is all the science of art without it? All talent is wasted if the subject is unsuitable. It is because modern artists have no worthy subjects, that people are so hampered in all the art of modern times. From this cause we all suffer.

Needless to say, there are thousands of lines which could be classified as the quotable Goethe, as when he advised Eckermann to hold fast by the present. Every situation—nay, every moment—is of infinite worth; for it is the representative of a whole eternity.

Goethe, a great admirer of English literature, was impressed by Shakespeare's dramatic creativity:

Shakespeare has already exhausted the whole of human nature in all its tendencies, in all its heights and depths, and that, in fact, there remains for him, the aftercomer, nothing more to do. And how could one get courage only to put pen to paper, if one were conscious in an earnest appreciating spirit, that such unfathomable and unattainable excellences were already in existence!

However, he gave his greatest praise to Lord Byron, with some reservations for Englishmen in general:

"Lord Byron . . . is to be regarded as a man, as an Englishman, and as a great genius. His good qualities belong chiefly to the man, his bad to the Englishman and the peer, his talent is incommensurable. . . . That which I call invention, said he, I never saw in anyone in the world to a greater degree than in him. His manner of loosing a dramatic knot is always better than one would anticipate."

Frequently it is asserted that Goethe's judgment in later years was influenced by his ministerial position in Weimar. When he heard about the arrest of Béranger, he commented:

He is rightly served. . . . His late poems are really contrary to all order; and he has fully deserved punishment by his offenses against king, state, and peaceful citizenship.

Also, his evaluation of Napoleon may be the result of his aristocratic environment:

Napoleon was the man! Always enlightened, always clear and decided, and endowed at every hour with sufficient energy to carry into effect whatever he considered advantageous and necessary. His life was the stride of a demi-god, from battle to battle, and from victory to victory. It might well be said of him, that he was found in a state of continual enlightenment. On this account, his destiny was more brilliant than any the world had seen before him, or perhaps will ever see after him.

Revolutions were to him justifiable in some cases:

It is true that I could be no friend to the French Revolution; for its horrors were too near me, and shocked me daily and hourly, whilst its beneficial results were not then to be discovered. . . . But I was as little a friend to arbitrary rule. Indeed, I was perfectly convinced that a great revolution is never a fault of the people, but of the government. Revolutions are utterly impossible as long as governments are constantly just and constantly vigilant, so that they may anticipate them by improvements at the right time, and not hold out until they are forced to yield by the pressure from beneath.

It is not surprising that Goethe who had explored the natural sciences and the complexities of life expressed a reserved attitude toward freedom:

If we grant freedom to man, there is an end to the omniscience of God; for if the Divinity knows how I shall act, I must act so perforce . . . it is not good to meddle with divine mysteries.

His religious beliefs were free from any dogmatic conclusions. Naturally, for a man who wrote in Faust one of the greatest dramas depicting the struggle between good and evil, religion was a much-discussed subject:

I believed in God and in Nature, and in the triumph of good over evil; but this was not enough for pious souls: I was also required to believe other points, which were opposed to the feeling of my soul for truth; besides, I did not see that these would be of the slightest service to me.

Sometimes he was impatient in discussing the ease with which people often treat matters of religion:

People treat it, as if that incomprehensible and most high Being, who is even beyond the reach of thought, were only their equal. Otherwise, they would not say the Lord God, the dear God, the good God. This expression becomes to them, especially to the clergy, who have it daily in their mouths, a mere phrase, a barren name, to which no thought is attached whatever. If they were impressed by His greatness they would be dumb, and through veneration unwilling to name Him.

He was equally impatient with immortality at one point:

This occupation with the ideas of immortality is for people of rank, and especially ladies, who have nothing to do. But an able man, who has something regular to do here, and must toil and struggle and produce day by day, leaves the future world to itself, and is active and useful in this. Thoughts about immortality are also good for those who have not been very successful here.

When he reflected on his own age, however, he was ready to talk about the subject in different terms:

At the age of 75 one must, of course, think sometimes of death. But this thought never gives me the least uneasiness, for I am fully convinced that our spirit is a being of a nature quite indestructible, and that its activity continues from eternity to eternity. It is like the sun, which seems to set only to our earthly eyes, but which in reality, never sets, but shines on unceasingly.

Goethe lived to the age of eighty-three. Until his death he tried to explore "what holds this world together." His last audible remark was: "More light." Eckermann remained his faithful secretary and eyewitness reporter until the end. He did not reach the age of Goethe but lived long enough to prepare his conversations" before his death in 1854.

THE CORNERSTONE

Type of work: Novel
Author: Zoé Oldenbourg (1916-)
Time: Early thirteenth century
Locale: France and the Holy Land
First published: 1953

Principal characters:

ANSIAU, the old lord of Linnières, a pilgrim to the Holy Land
LADY ALIS, his wife HERBERT LE GROS, Ansiau's son and heir DAME AELIS, his wife
HAGUENIER OF LINNIÈRES, Herbert's oldest son EGLANTINE, Herbert's half sister and leman
ERNAUT, Herbert's bastard son
LADY MARIE DE MONGENAST, the object of Haguenier's chivalric love
AUBERI, Ansiau's young squire
RIQUET, a renegade monk, Ansiau's traveling companion
GAUCELM OF CASTANS, called Bertrand, another traveling companion

In the opening chapter of his great scholarly work, The Waning of the Middle Ages, Johan Huizinga suggested that life in the Middle Ages was characterized by striking contrasts between such things as suffering and joy, adversity and happiness, cruelty and pious tenderness—that in those times a childlike directness and absoluteness gave to everyday experience an innocence no longer extant in our day. This idea as expressed could easily stand as an epigraph to Zoé Oldenbourg's The Cornerstone, for few writers have introduced in better fashion than Huizinga the spirit of an innocent yet brutal age and no one, except the late Sigrid Undset, perhaps, has dramatized it more effectively than Mme. Oldenbourg does in this novel.

The Cornerstone is not so much a historical novel as a work of fiction in which medieval men and women live. This distinction is important. Nowadays what passes for the historical novel pretends to little more than a windy adventure story filled with bombast and derring-do or a record of bedroom escapades in fancy dress. Mme. Oldenbourg's book is the exception that justifies a literary form debased by most of her contemporaries. Her novel has all the qualities we expect of a story enclosing long perspectives of time and change and the mysteries of life and death.

Herself a brilliant medievalist, she has the ability to make the past of her thirteenth century world as real as any picture of the present. Although her people live in an age of violence, superstition, and harsh asceticism, their experiences hold true to the passions and suffering of men in all ages. Her books do not fall into sections, one for story and another for richness of detail. Time passes over three generations of the Linnieres family. They grow up, fall in and out of love, and marry. They are forced into situations they have not foreseen; they are caught between lusts of the flesh and agonies of the spirit; they sin and do penance. They grow old; they die. The whole is realistically conveyed, not by dramatic scenes staged against a picturesque landscape, as in the old-fashioned historical novel, but out of thousands of small details that build up to an impression of the complex experience life really is. Time passes and men change. Without trying to show anything more than this, Mme. Oldenbourg re-creates her pictures of life in castle and cloister, in villages where peasants huddle in squalor and the darkness of their own minds, along the crusaders' route of march.

No small part of Mme. Oldenbourg's effectiveness is due to her insight into the mind and heart of medieval man. Her people come together, talk, or go about their intimate affairs, and in so doing they reveal themselves and their private concerns, loyalties, superstitions, hopes of heaven, and fears of hell. Nothing seems contrived or forced; situations arise as casually as they do in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales or Boccaccio's stories. But everything adds up to the stir and spirit of an age. Life is harsh, disappointing, sad. Men seize at gaiety or happiness in the pageantry of a tournament, the rituals of a court of love, an illicit passion, the panoply and violence of war. But always, above everything else, Christian faith gives meaning and purpose to experience and guides man's quest for spiritual salvation. Through these matters Mme. Oldenbourg brings to life and motion the gentry and whole raggle-taggle of medieval society—knights and their ladies, crusaders, troubadours, wandering scholars, holy pilgrims, serfs, priests, merchants, clerks, and beggars—in the days when Philip Augustus reigned in Paris and Pope Innocent III had summoned the chivalry of France to a new crusade against the Albigensian heretics of Provence and Toulouse.

In a novel so solid in construction, so varied in detail, certain comparisons are inevitable. There is something massive here, like the soaring bulk of a Gothic cathedral built in an age when man lived in daily intimacy with his God and his church became a powerful upsurge in buttressed masonry. In this connection, the title of Mme. Oldenbourg's book is of course symbolic, for Christian faith was the cornerstone on which rested the whole structure of the feudal period. Again, reading this novel is like inspecting at close hand a medieval tapestry in which every figure, leafy tree, and symbolic beast has been worked lovingly and with care, or like turning the pages of a beautifully limned Book of Hours, the figures of its decorative groupings a little stiff and archaic in their poses but believable and very human, with every face and gesture clear-cut and revealing.

Father, son, and grandson stand in the foreground of this landscape with figures. In his old age Ansiau de Linnieres, part of whose story was told in an earlier novel, The World Is Not Enough, turns over his fiefs in Champagne to his heir and sets out on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in order to win forgiveness for the sins of his rough life. A veteran of the Third Crusade, he hopes to see Jerusalem once more before he dies and to visit the grave of his oldest son, buried at Acre. His sight failing, he goes blind on the way and wanders through a countryside ravaged by the Albigensian wars in the company of a young squire, a blinded heretic, and a renegade monk. In Palestine he is captured and forced into slave labor by the infidel. But his capacity for faith allows him to overcome all agonies of the body and spirit, and in his last hour, dying alone on a hillside near Jerusalem, he trustingly calls on God to be his priest.

His son Herbert, aptly nicknamed the Gross, is a man of brutal nature and prodigious physical appetites. Greedy, lecherous, cruel, disliked by his neighbors and alienated from his children, he has murdered, whored, and blasphemed his way into middle age. When the deed of incest he commits with his half-sister Eg-lantine causes him to be cursed by his mother, the Lady Alis, the pilgrimage he makes in expiation of his sins is little more than an impious fraud. On his return he is fatally injured by his son Haguenier while he is trying to beat his wife to death.

Haguenier, the young knight of Linnières, represents the tenderer, more idealistic side of the medieval temperament. He might have become an even worthier son of an unworthy father if he had not been afflicted by physical weakness or come under the spell of Lady Marie de Mongenast, whom he served faithfully but hopelessly according to the rules of chivalric love. In repentance, after his sin of parricide, he left the older woman to whom he was married and his baby daughter, and entered a religious order.

It is plain that the three Linnières of the novel illustrate three different facets of medieval life and belief. Bluff old An-siau and Herbert le Gros stand at opposite poles of that age of contradictions and extremes; Haguenier, too sensitive for the rough life to which he has been trained, confusing his adoration of the virgin with his love for an earthly woman, dreamy, but manly in his capacity for fidelity and suffering, points to the more humanistic age which was soon to follow.

Mme. Oldenbourg has expressed a belief that in the contemporary novel there is too little concern with what is great and eternal in man. In this somber, richly imagined, and starkly imaged story of thirteenth century France she has held up a mirror of human conduct and faith which illumines the past to reflect the hopes and fears of our own confused and bloody time.

Francis Parkman is one of the trio of great nineteenth century American historians, the other two being William Hickling Prescott and John Lothrop Motley. Of the three Parkman has stood best the test of time. His superiority lies in his approach. He is less rhetorical and florid in style, less likely to draw sweeping philosophical conclusions from his evidence, and more successful than his contemporaries in evoking history and making it live.

Born a sensitive, sickly son of a Boston Brahmin family, he nurtured extreme hatred for physical weakness. While still a student at Harvard he got "Injuns on the brain," as he said and was never able to cure himself of the affliction. After graduating he went on a trip, along the Oregon Trail, which covered seventeen hundred miles. From this trip came material for his first work, The California and Oregon Trail published in 1849, and he contracted the beginnings of the diseases that plagued him for the rest of his life, arthritis, near-blindness, and painful headaches, all complicated by neuroticism. Though unable to write more than a handful of pages a day, Parkman subsequently turned out volume after volume chronicling the great drama of the colonization and development of the North American Continent.

Count Frontenac and New France Under Louis XIV is the fifth in the historical series known collectively as France and England in North America, published in eleven volumes from 1851 to 1892. This volume, like the others, reveals Parkman's biases and prejudices. He disdained commerce, was not enthusiastic about democracy but hated tyranny, loved the past because he believed himself "a little medieval," and was a political reactionary. As he said in The Old Regime in Canada, "My political faith lies between two vicious extremes, democracy and absolute authority." He did not "object to a good constitutional monarchy, but prefers a conservative republic." Further, he obviously had greater respect for Englishmen than for Frenchmen, for Protestantism than for Catholicism.

Count Frontenac and New France Under Louis XIV, which covers the years 1620 to 1701, focuses on the actions of its central title figure, who according to Parkman was "the most remarkable man who ever represented the crown of France in the New World. From strangely unpromising beginnings, he grew with every emergency, and rose equal to every crisis." The volume dramatically attempts to show "how valiantly, and for a time how successfully, New France battled against a fate which her own organic fault made inevitable. Her history is a great and significant drama, enacted among untamed forests, with a distant gleam of courtly splendors and the regal pomp of Versailles." He tries to tell the story "not in the interest of any race or nationality, but simply in that of historical truth."

Count Frontenac, descended from Basque parentage, came to America twice. The first time, in 1672, he came as Governor and Lieutenant-General for the King, partly it was said so that he could escape the terrible temper of his wife and so that he could have some means of livelihood. He was then fifty-two years old, and, as Parkman says, "keen, fiery, and perversely headstrong," age not having in any way weakened the "springs of his unconquerable vitality."

The "springs of his unconquerable vitality" immediately precipitated him into trouble. He loved pomp and circumstance and cherished the tradition of older liberties than those that prevailed at the French court. He longed for reinstitution of the three estates, clergy, nobles and commons, and their influence in national affairs. Therefore on October 23, 1672, these three estates of Canada were convoked. Immediately the reaction from the French court was firm and negative. Count Frontenac was cautioned always to observe the order of government prevailing at Versailles, and since the States-General had not been convoked there, the governor was not to be so presumptuous again.

The troubles of Count Frontenac were just beginning. As soon as Bishop Laval returned from France, the inevitable clash occurred between them. The governor was jealous of his power, while the ecclesiastics desired to exercise, along with their spiritual authority, absolute control over temporal affairs in Canada. The clash grew more intense and wider. In 1682 Count Frontenac received his recall from the King. He left behind him the memory of an able and energetic man who would return again should danger threaten.

Count Frontenac's return to Canada came in 1689 when the warrior-politician was seventy years old but scarcely diminished in vigor and determination. Canada was in deep trouble with the Indians and with the English to the south. King Louis was beset by his Continental troubles and was tired of the fractious colony.

The history of the days of Count Frontenac's second stay in Canada must be written in blood, chronicles of intrigue, hatred, stupidity, clumsiness, and eternal fighting. Louis directed him to capture New York and New England, and to slaughter all non-Catholics. The scheme failed and the English in turn attacked Canada. In 1690 the English, under the command of Sir William Phips, directed several skirmishes against the French and finally lay siege to Quebec. This attack would have succeeded had Phips not been so stupidly headstrong as to ignore the only possible path into the cliff-top fortress that could insure his success, a path that was to be used later by General Wolfe with resounding success. Finally the English were forced to lift their siege.

Count Frontenac was hailed generally as the savior of Quebec by the grateful citizens. But his clash with the Church was renewed as soon as external threats were for the moment stilled. These waxed and waned, depending upon how events developed with the English, and the conflicts between these two nations remained always at the boil, precipitating constant battles and threats of battles, uncivilized massacres and bloodshed, keeping always before the Canadians the black specter of war. Through it all, however, he managed to stave off defeat.

Count Frontenac died in 1698, when he was seventy-eight years old. Up to his last breath he maintained full composure and his mental faculties. He was a hero to most Canadians, especially to the humbler classes. To one of the higher classes, who also valued him, he was "the love and delight of New France."

Appropriately, Parkman's history comes to a close just after the death of this man. Determined to be objective and to let the facts speak for themselves, the historian withholds greatness from Frontenac. An energetic and imaginative man, though vain and too much given to pomp, Frontenac, in Parkman's eyes, can be least forgiven for the "barbarity of the warfare that he waged, and the cruelties that he permitted." But he was not nearly as barbarous as many people urged him to be.

Greatness must not be given him, Parkman says, "but a more remarkable figure, in its bold and salient individuality and sharply marked light and shadow, is nowhere seen in American history."

THE CRITICAL ESSAYS OF WILLIAM HAZLITT

Author: William Hazlitt (1778-1830)

First published: Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, 1817; Lectures on the English Poets, 1818; Views of the English Stage, 1818; Lectures on the English Comic Writers, 1819; Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth, 1821

There were two pre-eminent literary critics in the second decade of the nineteenth century, Samuel Taylor Coleridge and William Hazlitt. While the former developed his critical principles in his early philosophical studies and in a decade of splendid poetic creation, the latter had no such period of creativity to look back on when he began his career as journalist-critic in 1813, at the age of thirty-six. His early life was a series of failures. Neither his earnest attempts to become a portraitist nor equally earnest attempts to make a reputation as a political and philosophical writer had borne fruit. In 1812, he and his family lived in London almost without funds until a series of lectures helped set the family on its feet. He then served an important apprenticeship as a journalist in Parliament and, in 1813, found the work which exactly suited him: writing dramatic criticism and essays on many topics for various periodicals.

Within a decade Hazlitt ranked with Coleridge as literary critic as a result of both spoken and written essays. His lecture series was very popular. The series Lectures on the English Poets was given early in 1818; English Comic Writers was delivered late that year. The following year he delivered the series The Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth. These lecture series were duly issued in book form. His most important written criticism includes View of the English Stage, which covers the years 1813-1818, and the Characters of Shakespeare's Plays.

Hazlitt was one of the first professional critics to have a significant identity as a critic. In the previous century, when the monthly reviews were established, most criticism was anonymous and probably no critic was half so well known for his criticism as Hazlitt became. One reason is that earlier writers on literature, such as Tobias Smollett and Samuel Johnson, relied largely on original compositions for their livelihood and reputations, while Hazlitt, through his essays and lectures, built his reputation as an essayist-critic.

He made his critical reputation largely by reviewing contemporary drama and by lecturing, often on Elizabethan poetry and drama. Thus, like most literary critics, he had his feet planted in both past and present. He often tried to explain the difference between the contemporary and the Elizabethan, the antipodes of literary creation in Hazlitt's mind. He admired the work of several Renaissance writers basically for their objectivity. As he wrote of Shakespeare in "On Shakespeare and Milton," "He was the least of an egotist that it was possible to be." Or, as the Hazlitt-inspired John Keats was to write later the same year: "the poetical Character . . . is not itself—it has no self—it is every thing and nothing." Hazlitt admired Shakespeare for keeping his self out of his poetry and for his genius in leaving his own consciousness behind in order to enter the consciousness of his characters. It is understandable, therefore, that Hazlitt would find serious flaws in the poetry of his own age. It was for him, generally, unbearably narcissistic. In a review of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, he lashes out at the ennui and world-weariness of Byron's self-contemplative hero. From such a position it is a small step to this assessment of Byron's famous contemporary: "Mr. Wordsworth, to salve his own self-love, makes the merest toy of his own mind,—the most insignificant object he can meet with,—of as much importance as the universe." It was the subjectivity or the egotism of the moderns that revolted Hazlitt, as he clearly revealed in his review of The Excursion. Despite his high praise for the poem "in power of intellect, in lofty conception, in the depth of feeling, at once simple and sublime" he finds fault with both the descriptions of nature and the handling of human nature since "an intense intellectual egotism swallows up every thing." Nevertheless, it would be wrong to conclude that Hazlitt was unfairly prejudiced against the poets of his day; he was neither blind to the originality and power of his contemporaries nor unwilling to praise their works.

The reasons behind Hazlitt's mixed feelings regarding the poets of his day and his preference for the writings of Shakespeare and Milton are suggested by an essay in The Examiner for October 2, 1814, in which he alludes to an important distinction between different kinds of poets and the poetry they write. Poetry is of two classes, "the poetry of imagination and the poetry of sentiment." The former "consists in the power of calling up images of the most pleasing or striking kind; the other depends on the strength of the interest which it excites in given objects." Naturally, the greatest writers possess both powers, but in his opinion such poets as Young and Cowley instance "the separation of feeling from fancy" and Wordsworth "is certainly deficient in fanciful invention."

Hazlitt's thoughts on criticism and the critic were never systematically formulated at any length, but certain essays give us some insights on how he regarded his calling, as, for example, "On Criticism," which is primarily an attack on modern criticism. In it, he reveals his admiration for certain aspects of eighteenth century criticism and his awareness of the critical drift since then. Critics of the preceding century were "gentle almost to a fault" and there was "no scalping of authors, no hacking and hewing of their Lives and Opinions," except in the case of Laurence Sterne and Tristram Shandy. But in Hazlitt's day critics were somewhat less gentle, and somewhat more anxious to utter dogmatic, sometimes violent, evaluations of works. Hazlitt had still other objections to certain modern critical methods. The scholarly investigator aroused Hazlitt's ire when he was guilty of employing "the dry and meagre mode of dissecting the skeletons of works, instead of transfusing their living principles." Other critics to be despised are the "mere word-catchers" who object to tiny flaws in usage, those who let their personal biases establish the criteria for literary excellence, and the men of peevish genius who are delighted by nothing.

In considering Hazlitt's own criticism, one should remember how he wrote much of it. Most of it, especially that on the drama, was produced for instant publication. He wrote rapidly, quoting freely from his amazing memory and gave little thought to structure or revision. As a result, many of the critical essays have great spontaneity and verve, but they often lack structure. Of his many critical essays which might be chosen to show how well he measured up to the standards which he suggested in "On Criticism," "On Milton's Sonnets" is a fair representation of his method. He frankly admits his deep admiration for the sonnets. After comparing Milton's achievement in this genre with that of Shakespeare, Sir Philip Sidney, and Wordsworth, in all cases to Milton's advantage, he launches into the essay by a long paragraph that loads statement on statement concerning Milton's "ideal faculty in his composition" and then quotes the Cyriac Skinner sonnet in its entirety. After the barest commentary about its beauties he turns to the sonnet to Cromwell, quotes it, and then quotes the entire Piedmont Massacre sonnet. In all, he quotes six sonnets of Milton (and one of Shakespeare) in a seven page essay. Naturally a critic may use extensive quotation to support his assertions, but Hazlitt has little to assert except rather commonplace generalizations. Of the sonnet "On his Blindness" Hazlitt says that "we see the jealous watchfulness of his mind over the use of his high gifts, and the beautiful manner in which he satisfies himself that virtuous thoughts and intentions are not the least acceptable offer to the Almighty." In this kind of "appreciation criticism" the use of large quantities of quotations to illustrate obvious comments is quite common in British criticism. But there is a fault in the essay often met in Hazlitt's writing, and one that cannot so easily be blamed on tradition: there is no logic whatever in its order. Hazlitt simply moves from favorite sonnet to favorite sonnet with no progression, no development. In many of his critical essays the same qualities appear: the piling of statement on statement, the lack of logical structure, the use of extensive, one might say excessive, quotations.

But not all that one says of his critical essays is on the debit side of the ledger. Sudden insights illuminate nearly all of his essays as, for instance, this striking explanation of one of Milton's paradoxes: "Milton has borrowed more than any other writer, and exhausted every source of imitation, sacred or profane; yet he is perfectly distinct from every other writer." "In reading his works, we feel ourselves under the influence of a mighty intellect, that the nearer it approaches to others becomes more distinct from them." Part of the worth of Hazlitt's critical essays, moreover, is due to his style. He may have overloaded occasional paragraphs with allusions and quotations, but his own words were thoughtfully chosen. He is sincere, candid, and vigorous. He is a voice of experience that has not lost all the warmth and passion of youth. Even in the essay "On Reading Old Books," in which he laments the loss of his youth and with it much of the pleasure of reading, he is still capable of this kind of writing, at once warm, and sincere. Old books, Hazlitt notes, "bind together the different scattered divisions of our personal identity." "They are pegs and loops on which we can hang up, or from which we can take down, at pleasure, the wardrobe of a moral imagination, the relics of our best affections, the tokens and records of our happiest hours." "They are like Fortunatus's Wishing Cap—they give us the best riches—those of Fancy; and transport us, not over half the globe, but (which is better) over half our lives, at a word's notice!"

CULTURE AND ANARCHY

Type of work: Social criticism
Author: Matthew Arnold (1822-1888)
First published: 1869

In Culture and Anarchy, Matthew Arnold sought a center of authority by which the anarchy caused by the troubled passage of the Reform Bill of 1867 might be regulated. At its best his style is clear, flexible, and convincing, but Arnold wrote in such a complicated mood of indignation, impatience, and fear that his style and his argumentative method are frequently repetitious and unsystematic. Still, the book is a masterpiece of polished prose in which urbane irony and shafts of ridicule are used to persuade the Victorian middle class that it must reform itself before it can reform the entire nation.

Writing as a so-called Christian Humanist, Arnold primarily directed his criticism against the utilitarianism of the followers of Jeremy Bentham and John

Stuart Mill and against the various movements of liberal reform. Disturbed by the social and political confusion, by Fenianism and the Hyde Park Riots of 1866, and by the inability of either the Church or the government to cope with the growing unrest both in England and on the Continent, Arnold attempted to describe an objective center of authority that all men, regardless of religious or social bias, could follow.

This center of authority is culture, which he defined on the level of the individual as "a pursuit of our total perfection by means of getting to know, on all matters which most concern us, the best which has been thought and said in the world." Because this authority is internal, it is a study of perfection within the individual, a study which should elevate the "best self" through a fresh and free search for beauty and intelligence. By following "right reason," the disinterested intellectual pursuits of the "best self," Arnold foresaw a way to overcome the social and political confusion of the 1860's and to prepare for a future in which all men could be happy and free. With this basically romantic view of man as a means and human perfectibility as the end, Arnold turned to social criticism, carefully showing that no other center of authority was tenable. The ideal of non-conformity, the disestablishment of the Church, led to confusion or anarchy because it represented the sacrifice of all other sides of human personality to the religious. The ideal of the liberal reformers also led to anarchy because it regarded the reforms as ends rather than means toward a harmonious totality of human existence.

Arnold clarifies his definition of culture by tracing its origin to curiosity or "scientific passion" (the desire to see things as they really are) and to morality or "social passion" (the desire to do good). Christianity, as he saw it, was like culture in that it also sought to learn the will of God (human perfection) and make it prevail; but culture went beyond religion as interpreted by the Nonconformists in that it was a harmonious expansion of all human powers. In even sharper terms, culture was opposed to utilitarianism which Arnold considered "mechanical" because it worshiped means rather than ends. In fact, anything—materialism, economic greatness, individual wealth, bodily health, Puritanism—that was treated as an end except that of human perfectibility was to Arnold mere "machinery" that led to anarchy. Only culture, the harmonious union of poetry (the ideal of beauty) and religion (the ideal of morality), saw itself as a means that preserved the totality of the individual. Culture looked beyond machinery; it had only one passion—the passion for "sweetness" (beauty) and "light" (intelligence) and the passion to make them prevail. With such a passion it sought to do away with social classes and religious bias to make the best that has been thought and known in the world ("right reason") the core of human endeavor and institutions.

After establishing his definition of culture in terms of the individual, Arnold turned toward the problem of society. He saw the characteristic view of Englishmen toward happiness as the individual's desire "to do what he liked," or freedom, but he also saw that each class had its own opinion as to what it liked to do. In other words, there was a strong belief in freedom but a weak belief in "right reason" which should view freedom disinterestedly. This misplacing of belief was to Arnold one of the chief causes of anarchy; it was the mistake of acting before thinking. Ideally, "right reason" should precede action, and the State should be the disinterested union of all classes, a collective "best self." In reality, the State was being led toward anarchy by class interests because the aristocracy, or "Barbarians," were inaccessible to new, fresh ideas; the middle class, or "Philistines," had zeal but not knowledge; and the working class, or "Populace," was raw and untrained. Because culture alone could join the two sides of the individual, culture alone could overcome the narrow views of the three classes since it was disinterested and sought only the perfection of all men. Members of the different classes possessed the same human nature and saw happiness as freedom; also, the "best self" was common to all classes. Therefore, since authority could be found neither in religion nor in politics, it could be found only in individuals who, by following "right reason" rather than class bias, could assert their "best selves" in a harmonious union that sought the best for everyone. The major impediments to such a state were what Arnold called "Atheism," the outright denial of such a thing as "right reason," and "Quietism," the utilitarian belief that reason was the result of habit. These impediments Arnold rejected on the basis of intuition and faith. Ethics can be known intuitively, and by building faith on the individual's intuition the spirit of culture could overcome the present anarchy.

The enlargement of his terms from the individual to the State naturally led Arnold to consider the historical development of the social and political confusion that he confronted. In the famous chapter titled "Hebraism and Hellenism," Arnold accounted for the very ground and cause out of which actual behavior arises, by distinguishing between (1) the energy in human affairs that drives at practice, the obligation of duty, self-control, and work (Hebraism) and (2) the energy that drives at those ideas which are the basis of right practice (Hellenism). Like the "scientific passion," Hellenism's chief function is to see things as they really are, and like the "social passion," Hebraism seeks proper conduct and obedience. In other words, what Arnold earlier analyzed as the opposing drives in the individual, he now enlarges to a historical context, all human endeavor in the Western World being associated with either the one or the other drive. Both drives aim at human perfection or salvation, but their means and ideals are sharply different. Hebraism, or "strictness of conscience," inculcates a sense of sin, but Hellenism, the "spontaneity of consciousness," teaches what Arnold has called culture.

The rise of Christianity marked the great triumph of Hebraism over Hellenism, but the Renaissance marked the resurgence of Hellenism. The anarchy of the 1860's Arnold saw as the result of Puritanism's reaffirmation of Hebraism in the seventeenth century, a reaffirmation that was against the currents of history. The problem was intensified by the Puritan belief that duty was an end in itself, whereas in reality both great drives are no more than contributions to human development. Thus, in England there was too much Hebraism, so much, in fact, that religion and politics had become mechanical. As a solution, Arnold suggested that Hellenism be imported. In Hellenism, which ultimately is a synonym for culture, the ideals of internal harmony, or the unity of the total man, and of harmony with things overcome the one-sidedness of Hebraism. The other drive, however, should not be excluded, for Hellenism alone leads to moral relaxation. There should be a harmony of both sides, a union from which would come the awakening of a healthier and less mechanical activity.

After analyzing culture in terms of the individual, the State, and history, Arnold turned to the particular issues before Parliament at the time he wrote. He directed his wit and some of his most vivacious ridicule against the four political reforms that were at the heart of liberalism—the disestablishment of the Irish Church, the Real Estate Intestacy Bill, the Deceased Sister's Wife Bill, and Free Trade—and showed that the liberal reformers lacked disinterestedness, displayed a remarkable absence of reason, and unconsciously led to anarchy. By leaving the issues that were uppermost in his mind to the last, he dramatically illustrated that culture alone could lead to perfection. For him the four bills were examples of the disbelief in "right reason" and the Philistine endeavor to act without thought. Thus, he warned that without "right reason" there could be no society and without society there could be no perfection. Only "right reason," the disinterested search for the best that has been thought or done regardless of class interests, could defeat anarchy by establishing the way to happiness through harmony.

THE CYPRESSES BELIEVE IN GOD

Author: José María Gironella (1917-)

Time: 1931-1936

Locale: Spain

First published: 1953

Principal characters:

MATÍAS ALVEAR, a telegraph operator in Gerona

CARMEN ELGAZU DE ALVEAR, his wife

CÉSAR, and

PILAR, the Alvear children

JOSÉ ANTONIO PRIMO DE RIVERA, founder of the Falange Española

GENERAL FRANCISCO FRANCO BAHAMONDE, later head of the Spanish State

The Cypresses Believe in God possesses qualities, both historical and social, that command a measure of critical respect in keeping with the compassion and high seriousness of its theme. Part of the book's importance lies in its subject, the drift of the Spanish people into bloody and disastrous civil war. Señor Gironella's plan is ambitious and impressive. This novel tells the story of Spanish life and history from the founding of the Republic in 1931 to the outbreak of the Civil War in July, 1936. The second part, One Million Dead, deals with the actual fighting of the war.

The Spanish Civil War has already received extensive treatment in Hemingway's For Whom the Bell Tolls and Malraux's Man's Hope, but these were tourist books and not conceived on so vast a scale. Gironella, on the other hand, tells the story as it shaped itself in one man's lifetime and experience. This complex and crowded novel, published in Spain in 1953, makes the reader understand why the Spanish Civil War holds its own unique place among the wars of our troubled century: it was a conflict whose issues were both peninsular and universal, and like the American Civil War it was a tragic drama creating against a seething background of history its own spiritual climate of turbulence and anguish.

That agony is peculiarly Spanish, the national mystique of a proud and melancholy people. In a brief preface written for the American edition of The Cypresses Believe in God, Gironella declared that it is difficult to consider Spain with detachment. Legends grow: Spain of legend and folklore, of tragic history, of folklore, of the fiesta and the bullfight. Yet he was prepared to defend the complexity of his ancient and unhappy land: to him it represented the possibility of a thousand ways of life.

In Spain, when the novel first appeared, it was called implacable. The term very well describes the nature of Señor Gironella's performance. At the same time it must be admitted that the novel's acceptance by the present regime in Spain leaves it open to political questioning. Gironella himself was a young Falangist, nineteen years old at the beginning of the Civil War, but the book gives the impression that he himself went through a period of indecision and confusion similar to that of his own Ignacio before choosing sides in the conflict. He is therefore able to preserve a point of view which is on the whole admirably objective when dealing with events and personalities for whom there was in actual history no middle ground. Also, the novel is saved from becoming a completely partisan work by the fact that Gironella, as a Roman Catholic, is also a writer in that great Christian tradition. In spite of his tendency to overplay the role of the Communists in the events leading up to the military uprising against the Republic, his generous and full understanding of men and their motives saves him from a too doctrinaire point of view. His allegiance to the traditional order of Church and State is no more extreme than that of Ernest Hemingway, for example, in support of the Loyalist cause.

In the opening pages of the novel the writer presents his people against their background with the beautiful precision and rather flattish realism characteristic of the Spanish novel. The focusing center of the story is a typical middle-class family, the Alvears, who live in the provincial capital of Gerona in Catalonia, a prosperous region of northeastern Spain which during the Civil War became a Loyalist stronghold. Matías Alvear is a telegraph operator who has moved to Gerona from Madrid. A man of even disposition, he likes to fish in the river beneath his apartment windows and play dominoes in his favorite café of an evening. He has Socialist and Anarchist relatives in Burgos and Madrid, but he himself believes that with some brains and a little honesty the Republicans will survive. His wife, Carmen Elgazu de Alvear, has inherited the stanch Basque Catholic reverence for authority and tradition. They have three children. Ignacio, the oldest, had been intended for the priesthood, but he discovers that he has no real religious vocation and becomes a teller in a bank. César, the second son, is a seminarian; completely without political interests, he is his devout mother's pride. Pilar is the daughter, convent-educated and attracted to the young leader of the Gerona Falangists.

Gironella begins with a family, but like the expanding waves of a stone dropped into a deep pool his novel gradually widens to enclose a picture of a city, a whole society, a nation. Yet in the coming conflict of Socialist-Republican-Anarchist forces on the one hand and Catholic-Monarchist-Nationalists on the other it is still the individual who counts for most. Ignacio is the person through whom the ambiguities and agonies of the Civil War are most clearly revealed. He has absorbed his father's liberal views as well as his mother's religious beliefs. He begins as a believer in the Republican formulas, strengthened by his knowledge of ancient abuses man has suffered under the authority of Church and State, but his growing skepticism of other abuses sanctioned in the name of progress keeps him from wholeheartedly accepting the new political and social creeds. He assures himself that he will fight when he is able to see clearly. At the end of the novel he is still torn between his distrust of the old prejudices and injustices and his dislike for the new fanaticism and violence, but he is slowly turning toward the Falangist party because, in spite of its chauvinism, it stands for Catholic tradition and a program of order.

For César, the sixteen-year-old priest, there is no such conflict. His end is martyrdom before a firing squad in one of the flaring episodes of violence that were dividing Spain into two passionate halves. He is killed for his efforts to save the Blessed Sacrament from destruction while wild Republican mobs are burning the churches. By that time the failure of a military uprising in Gerona and the reprisals that follow point to the inevitable outbreak of civil war and the hatreds and cruelties it will soon engender. But Señor Gironella never loses sight of the human predicament and the single man who finds himself a party to mass movements.

Out of small details Señor Gironella traces out the complexities and uncovers the deeper reality of The Cypresses Believe in God. His novel makes one thing clear. The Spanish Civil War was not a conflict, with issues plainly drawn, between liberals and reactionaries, between laborers and bourgeoisie. It was a struggle in which men of innocence and virtue on both sides were corrupted by forces of modern ideologies and made to serve ignoble and vicious ends. In this powerful novel the author shows us the schizophrenia of modern history itself.

CAMBYSES, his father and king of the Persians

MANDANE, his mother, the daughter of Astyages

CAMBYSES and

TANAOXARES, the sons of Cyrus

Among the surviving authors of ancient Greek literature, Xenophon has the distinction of being the first who wrote in a variety of prose genres, forms which deal with an even greater variety of subject matter. Most of the early prose writers of Greece devoted themselves with notable single-mindedness to either history, the philosophic or scientific treatise of a given sort, dialogue, or rhetoric. But Xenophon wrote in nearly all of these forms. What is more, one of his latest works is a composition which even now is essentially sui generis. The Cyropaedia, or Education of Cyrus, has been called a historical romance. The name may be convenient, but there is in fact no adequate classification for the work. "Didactic-romantic-political-fictional-biography" might come closer.

Xenophon has incorporated in the Cyropaedia some treatment of nearly all the topics which he developed separately in his more restricted works. Of his historical interests, despite the title and ostensible subject, there is only a slight trace: the historical and geographical reliability of Xenophon's tale is minimal. The Hel-lenica, covering Greek history from the point where Thucydides left off, in 411 B.C., to the death of Epaminondas in 362 B.C., and the Anabasis remain his only strictly historical creations. The latter, a famous account of the author's participation as a young man in a Greek mercenary army expedition deep into the Persian Empire, is probably his best work. The Cyropaedia "resumes" some of the romance of expert generalship in exotic terrain. The extensive discussions of Cyrus' wise arrangements in military, political, social, and economic order recall the concerns reflected in Xenophon's Constitution of Sparta, Agésilas (on the Spartan king, here treated as a model leader), Hiero, and Oeconomicus. The account of Cyrus' education and the portrait of his personal virtues and world-wisdom which culminates in his death-bed discourse to his sons on the soul—these continue in their way the philosophical writings of Xenophon which are centered on Socrates, chiefly in the Memorabilia. The attention devoted to horsemanship, hunting, and conviviality ("Cyrus at Banquet," as it were) are vestiges of still other works of his. As a final seasoning for the whole, Xenophon includes the first love romance in Western literature, the story of Pantheia and Abradatas.

This topical cross section presents a complex of matters from which a writer of genius might well have woven an absorbing tapestry comprising an intellectual and cultural summary of the age, an encyclopedic Bildungsroman like Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship or The Magic Mountain. Xenophon failed to do so. The quality of the product can be assessed after the following summary:

Book I: Cyrus the Great is born of Cambyses, King of Persia, and Mandane, the daughter of Astyages, King of Media. Reared until his twelfth year in Persian simplicity and discipline, he then visits Media for five years. There he learns to ride a horse and hunt, and he wins the friendship and admiration of the Medes by his virtues. He returns home and completes his training under his father's guidance. When Media is threatened by an Assyrian invasion, Cyaxares, the son of the now deceased Astyages, asks aid of the Persians. Cyrus is sent in command of the Persian forces. Book II: In Media, Cyrus reorganizes his army and prepares it physically and psychologically for combat. The King of Armenia, a vassal to Cyaxares, revolts. Book III: Cyrus reconquers him by brilliant strategy and recovers his allegiance to Cyaxares by equally brilliant diplomacy. He executes a similar feat with the Chaldeans, the neighbors of the Armenians. Cyaxares and Cyrus then advance together to meet the Assyrians, and, thanks largely to Cyrus' generalship, the Assyrians are defeated in a first engagement at the border. Book IV: Cyaxares becomes jealous of Cyrus' reputation and decides to stay behind with his own army, allowing Cyrus to move ahead as he pleases. Cyrus, however, persuades most of the Median army to accompany him as well. He wins over to his side the Hyrcanians, a subject people of the Assyrians. After a second defeat of the Assyrians he provides the Persians with a cavalry force of their own. Cyaxares in growing vexation orders that the Median "volunteers" with Cyrus be sent home. Cyrus sends a message in justification of his non-compliance. Gobryas, a vassal of the Assyrian king, defects to Cyrus. Book V: Cyrus advances to the walls of Babylon but postpones an assault on the city. Three more subject peoples accede to the Persians. Cyrus returns to the border of Media and there confronts the spleen and chagrin of Cyaxares with such dexterity that his uncle is publicly reconciled to him. Book VI: Further military preparations are carried on in winter quarters. Pantheia, the wife of a noble subject of the Assyrian king, had been earlier captured and given into the keeping of Araspas, a Median officer in Cyrus' entourage. Araspas now attempts to seduce her. She appeals to Cyrus and is protected. In consequence, her husband Abradatas is won over to Cyrus. Book VII: A massive army of Assyrians and allies under the command of Croesus, King of Lydia, is defeated. Before the battle Pantheia takes pathetic leave of Abradatas, who dies a hero's death in the fighting. Pantheia kills herself over his body. Croesus, captured after the siege of Sardis, is generously treated by Cyrus. After several other campaigns, Babylon is taken by stratagem and victory is complete. Book VIII: Cyrus organizes his empire, marries the daughter of Cyaxares, and after a long reign holds a final edifying discourse on his deathbed. A surprising postscript sarcastically details the degeneration of the Persians since the time of Cyrus.

On the very face of it the arrangement is unpromising. The action advances without complication except for such essentially irrelevant episodes as those involving Pantheia. And in no other fashion is there sufficient human richness to sustain the objective material. Xenophon's political and moral concerns, to be sure, are worked in by a superabundant series of dialogues and speeches, devices which Thucydides had employed with brilliant effect. (The Magic Mountain again provides some parallels.) But for Thucydides the issues and personalities of the Peloponnesian War were problematic and many-sided to an overwhelming degree. Xenophon's Cyrus, by contrast, is so mercilessly idealized that no counterforce can be set up to provide enough tension to launch issues or personalities. The nearest thing to such a confrontation lies in the theme of the growing jealousy of Cyaxares. Thucydides would have been capable of presenting in Cyaxares a potent distillate of everything vital in Spartan and Athenian culture which opposed that particular composite of Athenian-Spartan ideals read by Xenophon into the figure of Cyrus. But Xenophon's Cyaxares is a pathetic also-ran who is graciously manipulated by his herogentleman nephew.

The didactic material is not simply embedded in the inorganic framework of successive events without human complication; a lapidary could still have made the segments memorable. But for the most part, when Xenophon settles into a discourse or dialogue, he produces a run of facile, repetitious, platitudinous elegance. (Skill in specious conversation was clearly part of the Greek ideal of the gentleman, as it has been of the later European permutations.) In this fashion he managed to stuff out his stick-figure design to some four hundred pages.

One obvious moral to be drawn, then, is that the Cyropaedia should never be read straight through except in Greek, since it is only the grace of its style which gives some salt to many a dull page. But it should in justice be admitted that a wisely condensed English version would be worth its reading time. Anecdotes possessed of point and humor, moments with some vividness of situation and character, do occur. (For example, some country-bumpkin rookies in training are told that they must march behind their lieutenant. When the lieutenant is by chance sent on a postal errand, the entire platoon obediently runs off behind him.) And at times the practical wisdom has its interest. Cambyes to Cyrus on how to manage his men: When encouraging them by hopes which are not certain to be fulfilled, one should not personally suggest these doubtful hopes; get someone else to act as mouthpiece.

More important, however, some rapid acquaintance with the text of the Cyropaedia will always be worthwhile because of the position this book occupies in the development of the ancient political imagination. Both Xenophon and another Socratic enthusiast gave their minds much to the problem of the inadequacy of existing Greek political systems. Plato's Republic in its artistry and profundity transcends Xenophon beyond all compare. But Plato never conceived of a satisfactory political order larger than the city-state, and the times were leaving him behind: until our own days of uncertain world government, empire was henceforth to be the chief ideal for international political order, and from Alexander the Great to Stalin that empire was to be predominantly monarchical. Xenophon, a half-century before Alexander, is the first literary exponent of monarchical empire.

DAMAGED SOULS

Author: Gamaliel Bradford (1863-1932)

Time: 1737-1893

Locale: America, England, Europe

First published: 1923

Principal personages:

BENEDICT ARNOLD

THOMAS PAINE

AARON BURR

JOHN RANDOLPH

PHINEAS TAYLOR BARNUM

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTLER

Though the reviews of the time were not unmixed, Damaged Souls remains as the best book by Gamaliel Bradford and unique in the history of letters: a contribution to American history, biography, and literature. Although Taine is supposed to have originated the term, Bradford was the most active "psychographer." His biographical studies are not so much life stories as spiritual silhouettes.

The introductory essay, applauded as a new departure, the model for interviews in depth, suggests that the souls of Bradford's subjects are not damned, that each has a unique quality offset by a flaw. While H. L. Mencken suggested that only the first five are worthy of the sympathetic treatment, Barnum and Butler having insufficiently developed or callously overthrown souls, most critics accepted Bradford's carefully documented verdicts on the minds and hearts he explores.

Bradford, admitting to prejudice, likens Arnold's manly though misguided vigor and Burr's personal though selfish charm to Paine's and Barnum's blatant and zealous natures. But in all those selected some kind of spiritual flaw appears to explain, even though it does not justify, the stigma that has determined the public reputations of these personages. Bradford's main purpose, however, was not to stress the stigma but to show his people in their rounded and more human characters. Thus of Benedict Arnold, who abandoned the unfortunate Major André, who blackened his reputation for valorous, unselfish deeds, the reader gains an insight into his quixotic nature, his anger and feeling of slight, his physical needs, and his despair. The most telling irony concerns a meeting with Talleyrand in which Arnold dared not reveal himself.

Thomas Paine's character was formed in rebellion, Bradford believes, and his restless nature and brilliant verbal insights formed a platform for vigorous action. His work was inspired by love of humanity rather than by the egoism so marked in his exterior. There is no reason why he did not advance in the cause of the poor and the downtrodden, though rebellion was his method and violence often the result. His exterior appearance, his slovenly habits and lack of cleanliness, his addiction to drink in a drinking age, only illumine his lack of selfish concern and his higher loyalties.

Aaron Burr, by contrast, had no ideals, but exhibited a most joyful, forthright nature. He indulged himself in the pleasures of companionship, especially that of women whom he found irresistible, and he lived off those who were drawn into his confidence and bewitched by his charm. His strange projects are to this day inexplicable, perhaps not even realized in the planning, though his "villainies" seem to be the result of lack of consideration. Burr's love for his daughter and her tender but open-eyed concern for him form a kind of redemption. He carried no grudges, he gave generously if indiscriminately, and he looked to eternity and a god whom he believed kinder than most people give him credit for.

God's angry man, John Brown, seems to Bradford the most complex of all since right is on both sides where Brown's motives and actions are concerned. His intense and fanatical enthusiasm formed the glory and caused the damage. Barnum was the product of his age who honestly believed that humbug was a commodity, though he himself preferred the high things and practiced a warm-hearted cordiality. John Randolph, on the other hand, was the noblest of these flawed personages; his noble qualities of mind and spirit were undone by bad temper and exacerbated nerves, so that he had little influence for good. Benjamin Franklin Butler, the least engaging of the group as well as the most self-righteous, felt, in summation, that he had performed only good acts and those continually.

Gamaliel Bradford remains a persuasive advocate of restrained judgment, leaving to God the final decisions, as he whimsically suggests we must. To read deeply pro et contra was his technique, his formula to seek and display motive and drive; and his rhythm was that of his subject's pulse. The result is Bergson's élan vital brilliantly projected. Bradford's gallery of portraits, finally, included whole and mended as well as damaged souls, and his books will remain in our relativist age as models.

Anthony Powell's great series of novels is a unique project today, with twelve books planned. The style and subject matter are traditional and each volume can be appreciated in isolation. As is consistent with the major theme, Powell moves forward and back in time unfolding his plot. There are no innovations of form in the books. Nevertheless, these novels are regarded as probably the most original and stimulating fiction appearing in England at the present time.

The first three books, which cover the period from the early 1920's to the early 1930's, form a complete social history of the period expressed through the experience of Nick Jenkins, his friends, colleagues, and their families. A Question of

Upbringing and A Buyer's Market are in four parts; The Acceptance World is in five.

The evocative power and subtle, arresting brilliance of Powell's style are immediately apparent in the descriptive opening sections. All the elements are there: high-seriousness, near-bathos controlled with wit, metaphors from the arts, and an astringent nostalgia. This talent for meaningful juxtaposition of phrase is also important in Powell's delineation of character. In the first section of A Question of Upbringing, Kenneth Widmerpool with his aggrieved expression takes concrete form in Nick's mind: his appearance is plain, stiff, and Widmerpool moves in a like manner out of the fog-like air. Nick's vision of Widmerpool as an individual remains with him, and their lives are to be linked erratically for the next thirty years.

Widmerpool feels moral disapproval of Nick's closest friends, Charles Stringham and Peter Templer. Stringham, who reminds Nick of Veronese's Alexander, belongs to the class also castigated by Nick's Uncle Giles, who is a wealthy man. Templer, Widmerpool feels, is a poor influence on the members of the house, and he becomes almost physically distressed at young Templer's experiments with pipe-smoking, alcohol, and women. Widmerpool leaves school a year before Nick, although in a typically economical illustration of his farcical intrusion on Nick's life and of his latent power his name remains on the house-list through an oversight of the housemaster, Le Bas.

Nick and Widmerpool next meet in France—this episode forms the third section of the book—whence Nick has gone trying to solve the problem of being more mature than a boy, but not yet an adult male.

Powell uses hyperbole so accurately and incisively that one or two sentences reverberate throughout a chapter and control the reader's emotional response. Witty and unlabored, this account and another on Widmerpool place the two boys at a precise point in their adolescence. The economy with which such analyses are effected enables Powell to write largely on actual happenings: here, the social environment of a Tourraine house party for paying guests.

The second section of A Question of Upbringing is more closely concerned with society in its limited sense and deals also with the family and early love relationships of Nick, Stringham, and Templer. This chapter opens with a consideration of one's judgment of other people which is a commentary also on Powell's own blend of comic and tragic incident. Powell has an exact eye for significant detail and a virtually absolute selectiveness of words and metaphor. Each phrase in his extremely descriptive books interprets the mood, place, or character described. This stylistic ability gives to the novels an absorbing, almost gripping power.

At a family lunch Nick discovers Stringham's reservations about Templer, whom Nick had always regarded as Stringham's closest friend. Stringham feels that Templer does fit in with the idea of home life. Stringham's "home life" includes a stepfather, Buster Foxe, whose personality is cold and chilling; his mother, a thrice-married beauty, rich and overpowering; and Tuffy Weedon, Mrs. Foxe's secretary, whose face on greeting Charles is so cheerful that it seems to be intense and anxious. These people create an atmosphere unknown and oppressive to Nick.

Peter and Nick are together at school the following term. Peter remarks that he enjoys the more common things and that Charles' home life must be filled with too many good things. This is almost Charles' view of his stepfather. Peter adds that even lunch must have been rather stuffy. The judgment surprises Nick, but is one subsequently made of Charles himself.

Nick stays with Templer's family before he goes to France. The household is quite different from Stringham's fashionable London home. Templer's father, a graceless widower, made his money in cement; he talks exclusively about the stock market. Here Nick meets Jean Templer and falls in love with her. The Templer home is described with fantasy in hyperbolic terms. This device creates an atmospheric heightening which is often employed before an emotional encounter between characters. The expansive villa is built on a cliff where clouds drift in the sky and the waves against the stones create a sense of being cryptic, a place of adventure. Immediately, Nick sees Jean and feels a conflict swell in him, a desire and a fear of being close to her.

After this visit Nick travels to France, where he meets Widmerpool again and falls fleetingly in love with a girl whom he regards as the French counterpart to Jean. From France, Nick goes up to Oxford. Section four of A Question of Upbringing covers his first term there. At Oxford Nick is again with Stringham, who detests university life and is increasingly afflicted with melancholy and drunkenness.

Powell treats Oxford in terms of personality, introducing Nick's life there through Sillery, an elderly don and éminence grise figure. Characters who play a large part in subsequent novels are gathered at Sillery's tea parties: Truscott, a graduate of promise; Quiggin, uncouth, belligerent, and provincial; and Mark Members, bohemian, precious, a poet, rumored to come from the same Northern town as Quiggin.

By the end of A Question of Upbringing the main themes are stated and the world of A Dance to the Music of Time has been created. The next novels enlarge variously on the arts and politics of the period and on social mores, aspects of life of which the narrator, Nick, has as yet so little intimation.

The first part of A Buyer's Market is a good example of the conjunction of disparate elements from which Powell's social comedy is structured. Nick sees four paintings by Edgar Deacon for auction with a conglomeration of other objects that reminds him of Deacon's own shop and home at the time when he knew him well. Deacon is an old acquaintance of Nick's parents. Nick meets him at the Louvre on the day he has tea with the Walpole-Wilsons. Sir Gavin Walpole-Wilson is working at the Peace Conference with Nick's father. Years later Nick sees his first Deacon painting in the Walpole-Wilson house. The importance to Nick of the Walpole-Wilson's "Deacon" is not the quality of the painting but that seeing it always implies the proximity of their niece, Barbara Goring. The auction recalls those years to Nick and also the debutantes' dinner and ball at which he and the socially determined Widmerpool both renounced Barbara.

At the ball, Widmerpool, in an accident of the kind that has dogged him throughout life, is covered in sugar by Barbara. Under the stress of this incident he tells Nick as they walk through London streets that he too was in love with her.

While walking, Nick and Widmerpool meet Deacon at Hyde Park. Deacon, now an old man, is with an attractive but scruffy girl, Gypsy Jones. Gypsy is aggressive, egotistical, and politically extremely left wing. These ill-assorted four go to a coffee stall. There they encounter Stringham, whom neither Widmerpool nor Nick has seen for several years.

The cumulative impact of Powell's work is strengthened by this technique of scattering and reuniting his characters. Their circumstances change, their spheres of influence enlarging or declining as they bring with them on remeeting a new friend or associate who shifts the focus of the narrative.

Stringham takes the other four to Milly Andriadis' party. The party is held in a house rented from Jean Templer's husband, and the guests include Sillery, Prince Theoderic of the Balkans, Sir Magnus Donners, and Bill Truscott, who works for him. Milly herself, once the mistress of a person of the court, is now Stringham's mistress.

After this strangely fascinating party there is an elegiac description of Nick's walk home which culminates in another unexpected meeting when he runs into Uncle Giles. Before Nick goes to sleep he wonders if he should take his uncle seriously. If he could solve this problem, then possibly other answers in life might be made clear.

Section three of A Buyer's Market starts with an assessment of Nick's maturer philosophy of life. He realizes that life is not divided into compartments, but that individual worlds eventually find that they have something common to all. Feeling himself socially isolated for the moment, Nick tries to look up Deacon. Instead, he meets the painter Barnby, whose studio is in Deacon's house. Barnby informs Nick of Widmerpool's involvement with Gypsy Jones and asks if Nick is also an admirer. Barnby himself is engaged on a mural for the Donners-Brebner building and painting a portrait of Baby Wentworth. Thus he finds himself in the delicate situation of courting his patron's mistress.

Subsequently Nick stays at Hinton, the country house of the Walpole-Wilsons. The house party guests visit Stourwater, Sir Magnus Donners' country home, a too perfectly reconstructed medieval castle. Jean Duport is there as a friend of Baby Wentworth and Nick finds himself attracted to her once more. Stringham is engaged. He, Truscott, and Widmerpool are all working for Sir Magnus.

Widmerpool, power-oriented and egotistical, is evidently successful in business but seems doomed to failure with women. He confesses to Nick that Gypsy had been pregnant when he met her and that he had illegally procured her abortion. Attempting to leave Stourwater after a conference with Sir Magnus, Widmerpool has another of his ludicrous accidents, reversing his car into an ornamental urn and toppling it onto the lawn. Nick concludes that Widmerpool habitually rises, like the phoenix, from the ashes of humiliation.

At the opening of the last section of A Buyer's Market, Nick remains an on-looker, an autumn walk impressing on him only a sense of experience endured. Depressed by Stringham's wedding, where the strife it had caused was unsuccessfully concealed, Nick learned the same day of Deacon's death, caused by a fall after a party he had given the week before.

Although Deacon's party was a complete outward contrast to Milly's, inelegant, bohemian, and literary, the same elements of social and sexual strife, ambition, and the reunion of acquaintanceships distinguish it. Mark Members, now an established writer, is brought by an artist's model, Mona. Quiggin had become a friend of Deacon and is much admired by Gypsy for his journalism and left-wing politics. These two are seen to be bound, through their careers, by the bonds of a love-hate relationship.

On the day of Deacon's funeral, Nick finds Gypsy alone. Feeling that they have been projected out of their unrelated selves, he makes love to her. Only then does he realize how like to Barbara Goring Gypsy is. That same evening Nick dines with Widmerpool and his mother, when they both learn of Barbara's totally unexpected engagement.

When he leaves Widmerpool and his mother, Nick suddenly connects in his mind Mrs. Foxe, her secretary, and Milly Andriadis. Such insights into the similarity of people variously connected validates Powell's constant use of chance coincidence. Given Stringham's relationship to these three women, their similarities are psychologically sound.

After this traumatic day Nick's life appears to have meaning. Hardly conscious of what has happened, he begins the trip down the road of life.

Volume Three, The Acceptance World, is set in the 1930's, by which time the narrator is deeply involved in work and aware of politics. The change in mood from the 1920's is reflected in supper parties at the Ritz and a rather scruffy weekend at Maidenhead which contrast with pre-ball dinners and country house visits. Nick's friends have altered and hardened in their molds. New anxieties harass them, some predictable, some surprising. The older characters naturally change less.

Nick has tea with his Uncle Giles at his private hotel. His uncle's life was aimless, embattled, and shifty. He constantly enlists Nick in a fruitless attempt to extract more money from the family trust. The country's abandonment of the gold standard and the formation of the National Government annoys Uncle Giles considerably.

This oblique reference to events vital to England not only illustrates Uncle Giles's character but also gives the exact flavor of a historical period without disrupting the atmosphere of a comedy of manners.

After the hotel tea with Uncle Giles, Nick waits for Mark Members at the Ritz. This hotel is described in a passage of soaring fantasy and imagination, the glory of which is subtly modified by Peter Templer's entry.

Templer had married the model Mona, and Nick senses it is not a good marriage. They discuss Stringham's early divorce and his schoolboy imitations of Widmerpool, who, Templer says, is joining the Acceptance World of credit finance. Nick is fascinated by Templer's acceptance of Widmerpool as a normal city acquaintance no longer regarded as a dislikable oddity.

Before Mona and Jean Duport, now separated from her husband, join Peter, Quiggin arrives to see Nick instead of Mark Members. Nick is professionally an art publisher's editor who is trying to obtain an introduction to the painter Isbister's work from St. John Clarke, the novelist for whom Members and Quiggin successively act as secretary. Nick, however, refuses to discuss the introduction with Quiggin that evening.

He dines with the Templers and Jean and spends the weekend with them, at last beginning the inevitable love affair with Jean. Mona is so bored with her life with Peter that she invites Quiggin to Sunday lunch. He accepts, despite worries about leaving St. John Clarke, and is patently irritated by the other guests, Peter's ex-brother-in-law and Mrs. Erdleigh, who appears in some way to be looking after Stripling.

In Chapter Three of The Acceptance World Nick's love affair with Jean continues. After the Isbister Memorial exhibition he has a long talk with Members, whose feelings are lacerated by the loss of his post with St. John Clarke. They walk in Hyde Park, where there is a rally for the Hunger Marchers, the unemployed of the 1930's from the North. The march has, for Nick and Members, some preposterous elements. Quiggin is pushing the ailing St. John Clarke in a wheel chair and helping him is Mona.

Powell's treatment of the interest in left-wing politics by intellectuals of the 1930's and of the depressed economy is expanded in a meeting between Nick and Jean with Umfraville, a friend of Stringham's father in Kenya. Umfraville bewails the lack of social life in London; everyone he knows seems to have grown serious. Nick says that the economic slump is the cause. Umfraville takes Nick and his friends to visit Milly Andriadis. Now living in a flat, Milly's changed circumstances—she is keeping a young man who is a German Trotskyite—completes the picture of social decline and political reversals. Nick's second meeting with Milly has the added Powell nuance that it was in Jean's house that he first met her and learned that Jean was married.

In the last section of the book, Nick re-examines Widmerpool's Acceptance World in the light of his own experience. The main part of this section describes an old boys' reunion dinner. Templer is distressed by his loss of Mona to Quiggin. Stringham is distressingly drunk. Widmerpool is self-important and absorbed in his business success. Nick meets Tolland, who as a member of the large Warminster family plays a part in the subsequent novels.

Powell's stated theme at the beginning of A Question of Upbringing is this: people traveling closely together take meaning or lose their meaning, sometimes separating and getting together again to return to the picture of life.

Outlining the variations on this theme can give only a slight impression of the vitality and variety of the original. Powell's satirical approach to the period gives his novels objectivity, and his appreciation of social nuances and informed vision of human personality give his numerous characters and complex plots richness and clarity. This social and human perceptiveness, combined with a sensitive ear for dialogue and talent for descriptive prose, makes Powell's comic survey of England since World War I the most trenchant and accomplished yet attempted.

At Lady Molly's, Casanova's Chinese Restaurant, and The Kindly Ones, the three novels that form the second movement of Powell's novel series, treat mainly the years from 1934 to 1939. The first long section of The Kindly Ones is set in 1914 at the outbreak of World War I. The first volume, At Lady Molly's, is a novel of personalities based on the complex, interrelated, and exceptionally large Sleaford and Tolland families. Nick Jenkins' school and university friends of the first trilogy are mainly minor characters here. Casanova's Chinese Restaurant subordinates the Tolland-Sleford theme and enlarges on love and marriage and the careers of Nick's friends. The new characters here, notably Moreland and his musical associates, were initially introduced to Nick by Barnby, the painter who was a major character in A Buyer's Market. The Kindly Ones enlarges the themes of the first two volumes, reconsiders some of Nick's early experiences, and details more specifically the sexual aspects of various relationships. This volume is, however, dominated by the start of the two world wars. This vital political theme is prepared for, in At Lady Molly's, by Widmerpool's direct reference to Hitler and in Casanova's Chinese Restaurant by the involvement sympathetically and actively of several characters in the Spanish Civil War.

The first chapter of At Lady Molly's can be read as a self-parody of the structure of Powell's novels where the same characters meet again and again at different times, often after an interval of several years and, outwardly at least, in much changed circumstances. If it is parody it is also a superb justification of Powell's method. The key lines in this reading occur when Lady Molly asks Alfred Tolland if he and Nick are related. She continues by saying that she believes he has more relatives than she, and she has a grandfather who had ninety-seven first cousins and a grandmother with ninety-four.

Thus, the vast network of blood relationships caused by the intermarrying of the Tolland and Sleford families, although their actual contacts are infrequent, is demonstrably more complex even than the ties of love, work, and friendship among the other characters and is no more involved than the relationship of many old families in England today.

The second important function of Lady Molly Jeavons' party at the start of the second trilogy is that it establishes the decline of society and illustrates exactly how it has declined. The guests are poorer, less smart, less at ease together, even less courteous. They are, in fact, a mixed bunch in which Lady Molly herself symbolizes the whole process of disintegration. Her first marriage was to Lord Sleford, whereby she was mistress of a fabled country house, Dogdene. Her second marriage was to the ex-soldier Jeavons, a fascinating and important character who, nevertheless, has been incapable of earning a living after the Armistice.

Nick's introduction into Lady Molly's world comes through Chips Lovell, her nephew. Nick, by 1934, had left art publishing and is a film script writer. He has also published two novels. Nick meets Mrs. Conyers at Molly's party; she and General Conyers are old friends of Nick's parents. In between the long talks on family by Molly and Tolland, Mrs. Conyers tells Nick that her raffish, twice-married sister, Mrs. Blaides, is to marry again. Her fiancé is the ubiquitous, power-dominated Widmerpool with whom Nick was at school.

Widmerpool lunches Nick at his club and worriedly asks Nick's advice on sleeping with Mildred Blaides before their marriage. That afternoon Nick has tea with General Conyers and his wife. Conyers is equally worried about his own performance on the cello and Widmerpool's ability to "handle" Mildred Blaides. Mrs. Conyer's friend, the widowed Frederica Budd, takes Nick to visit one of her sisters, Norah Tolland, who lives in a reputedly lesbian ménage with Eleanor Walpole-Wilson, the cousin of Nick's, and Widmerpool's, first love. The same evening Nick meets Quiggin, who has eloped with Peter Templer's wife Mona.

He is invited for a weekend at their house in the country.

At Quiggin's house Nick meets the head of the Tolland family, Alfred Warminster, known as Erridge, a young left-wing peer regarded as hopelessly eccentric and irresponsible. He is currently Quiggin's landlord and patron. At dinner with Quiggin and Mona at Thrubworth, the Warminster family home, Nick meets two of Erridge's sisters, Isobel, whom he knows instantly he will marry, and Susan, whose engagement they came to announce.

At Lady Molly's house Nick again meets Miss Tuffy Weedon and learns that his school friend Stringham is practically an alcoholic and being looked after by Tuffy. He meets Jeavons in a pub and joins him in one of Jeavons' periodic wild nights. At a night club run by a Kenya acquaintance of Stringham, Dicky Umfraville, Nick and Jeavons join Widmerpool and Milfred and their host Peter Templer with his new girl friend Betty. Nick learns that Erridge has gone to China, taking Mona with him. Widmerpool's engagement to Mildred is broken after a weekend with her sister, Lady Sleaford, at Dogdene. Lady Molly holds an engagement party for Nick and Isobel. There Nick meets Members, Quiggin's rival in the literary world. He also has a discussion with General Conyers, who is studying psychology, concerning Widmerpool's sexual incompetence; the general accurately classifies Widmerpool as an intuitive extrovert.

In Casanova's Chinese Restaurant, the dowager Lady Warminster, stepmother to the nine Tollands, replaces her sister Molly Jeavons as a dominant character from an earlier era. The main character in this novel is the musician Moreland. Standing outside a blitzed pub, the Mortimer, Nick remembers meeting Moreland and his friends there with Deacon, the antique dealer of A Buyer's Market. Moreland asks Nick which three wives he would choose from their girl friends. Nick, still in love with Templer's sister, Jean Duport, answers at random. Moreland refuses names but says he intends to marry. Nick, Barnby, Moreland, two music critics, Gossage and Macklintick, and the violinist Carolo, dine at Casanova's and discuss women. Moreland invites Nick to a performance of The Duchess of Malfi. In this play Matilda Wilson plays the Cardinal's mistress. She had herself been the mistress of Sir Magnus Donners, who at one time employed Stringham and Widmerpool. Backstage, Nick meets Matilda and Norman Chandler, a homosexual dancer and actor for whom Mrs. Foxe, Stringham's mother, has developed an intense affection. Matilda marries Moreland. A year later Nick marries Isobel.

At Lady Warminster's the elderly novelist, St. John Clarke, is the only non-family lunch guest. Isobel is in a hospital following a miscarriage. Erridge has gone to Spain, leaving St. John Clarke to deal with his political affairs in England. Tuffy and Stringham are living in a flat in Lady Molly's house. Norman continues to influence Mrs. Foxe. When Nick visits Isobel in the hospital, he meets Moreland, whose wife is having a baby, Widmerpool, who is having treatment for boils, and Brandreth, the physician who is treating them all. Moreland takes Nick to visit the Macklinticks. Their relationship is bitter and abusive, the atmosphere exacerbated by the presence of Carolo as lodger. Nick takes Widmerpool to lunch at his club. Widmerpool, who favors appeasement with Germany, is excited by his new acquaintance with preabdication royal society.

Because Isobel and Matilda have become close friends, the Morelands and the Jenkinse are together a great deal. Matilda's baby died at birth. Moreland finishes a new symphony. Mrs. Foxe arranges a party to celebrate the first performance of the symphony. At the party the Macklinticks have an appalling quarrel and Nick is embarrassed when Matilda intimates that Moreland is in love with Priscilla, Isobel's sister. Stringham, escaped from Miss Weedon's care, arrives at his mother's house in the middle of the party. He is fairly sober, evidently because he is kept without money. Tuffy arrives and gently maneuvers him home. Chips Lovell reports to Nick Widmerpool's distress at the abdication.

St. John Clarke dies and both Quiggin and Members write obituaries. Nick and Isobel see less of the Morelands because of Priscilla. Erridge returns from Spain. Nick and Moreland visit Macklintick, who is deeply depressed; he has lost his job and his wife has left him with Carolo. Two days after their visit he commits suicide. This shock leads Moreland to give up Priscilla. Erridge inherits St. John Clarke's estate. Priscilla and Chips Lovell become engaged.

Casanova's Chinese Restaurant contains hints of the approaching holocaust. The Kindly Ones begins just before World War I bursts on an almost wholly unaware Britain.

Nick's family lives at Stonehurst near his father's army post. He is about seven years old and fascinated when he learns that Stonehurst is supposed to be haunted. He gossips with Albert, the handyman-cook, Bracey, his father's army servant, and the neurotic parlor maid Billson. One Sunday there he remembers forever. General and Mrs. Conyers are expected to lunch. Before church, Albert gives notice. Nick's father receives a telegram notifying him of Uncle Giles' arrival in the afternoon, news which infuriates him. After lunch Billson, distracted by the ghosts and the fact that Albert is leaving to marry, arrives in the drawing room, naked, to give notice. General Conyers leads her away wrapped in a shawl snatched from the grand piano. As they start to drive home, the Conyers are stopped by Dr. Trelawney and his followers. Trelawney, who has a sinister reputation, is the leader of a strange religious group; General Conyers has known him for years. While they talk, Giles arrives and announces that Archduke Franz Ferdinand has been assassinated.

Only General Conyers realizes war is now imminent.

In the late 1930's everyone is obsessed by the probability of war while continuing, until 1939, to lead their usual lives. Matilda has returned to acting, but, believing she is inadequate, retires again. The Morelands move to a country cottage near Stourwater. Just after "Munich," Isobel and Matilda meet. The Jenkinsons go to the Morelands' cottage for the weekend. While there, they are invited to Stourwater for dinner. Peter Templer collects them in his car. Peter is now married to Betty, who is in a state of mental collapse. Anne Umfraville is Sir Magnus' new mistress. After dinner the guests act the Seven Deadly Sins, which Sir Magnus photographs. Widmerpool, in uniform, arrives to discuss a job for Bob Duport with Sir Magnus. Templer accepts the fact that he is now Widmerpool's inferior in the city. Stringham is said to be acting as the agent at Glimber, his mother's country home, with Tuffy Weedon.

A few weeks later Uncle Giles dies in a seaside hotel run by Albert. Nick goes to attend to his funeral. Bob Duport and Dr. Trelawney are staying in the same hotel. During an evening of drinking Duport discusses his ex-wife Jean's infidelities with Nick, who discovers that while she was in love with him she was also having an affair with Jimmy Brent. Duport says he loathes Widmerpool, who had ruined the job he was doing in Turkey for Sir Magnus. Dr. Trelawney is attended by Mrs. Erdleigh, the spiritualist friend of Uncle Giles, whose money she inherits.

When Nick returns from Uncle Giles' funeral, he arranges for Isobel, who is pregnant, to live with Frederica in the country during the early months of the war. Anxious to get into the army as an officer, he applies to General Conyers for help. He can do nothing for Nick but announces his own engagement, his wife having died a short time before, to Tuffy Weedon. She tells Nick that Stringham is now cured of his dipsomania. Nick asks Widmerpool to help him get into the war. Widmerpool says that this is impossible, but he requests Nick to visit Lady Molly's with him and his mother. At Lady Molly's, Nick encounters Jeavons' brother Stanley, an army officer who promises to find Nick's paper and obtain his commission. Moreland is staying at Lady Molly's. Moreland is in a state of collapse because Matilda has left him. At dinner they meet Quiggin, Members, and Anne Umfraville. Nick reflects that another stage of life has now passed as on the memorable day at Stonehurst.

In The Kindly Ones, Nick observes that understatement and overstatement sometimes hit upon truth better than a flat declaration of fact. This, of course, is exactly Powell's method of creating truth by understatement or overstatement, both in description of events and in characterization. Powell's many paired characters contrast so vividly that taken as a whole they form a succinct cross section of humanity. General Conyers and Mr. Jeavons provide an excellent example. Both spent the early years of their maturity in the army. Both married women younger than themselves. The general, however, is specifically a man of action. Seemingly born to command, he has a superb knack of handling people and situations. His knowledge and awareness grow with the years. He studies psychoanalysis intelligently, reads modern fiction, and plays the cello with fervor; one of the oldest characters in the novels, he is thoroughly modern. Jeavons, on the other hand, has never advanced since 1918. Unemployable, he appears to live in a vague mist, permanently missing the point of whatever is happening. Subject to the occasional binge, he plays a more usual role by being prodded into pouring drinks at his wife's parties.

Nick Jenkins and Widmerpool are another pair who meet constantly and unexpectedly. Each is suspicious of everything the other most values. Widmerpool, gauche and unattractive, is determined to live by the will, snobbish, ambitious, impervious to any aesthetic pleasure or values. His pursuit of power is so single-minded that he soon outstrips his seemingly more talented and charming contemporaries. To Nick, the arts and personal relationships are the most important aspects of life, yet he recognizes Widmerpool's drive toward success and even ceases to be surprised by it. Widmerpool, however, remains amazed at Nick's drifting and lack of seriousness. General Conyers describes Widmerpool's objective orientation as a need to be always on the move after some definite thing. But it could be doing harm to a person in ordinary life when it affects what his personal objectives may be. The general, of course, is right; Widmerpool's relationships with women, except with his adored mother, are always disastrous. The subjective, emotionally analytic Nick, on the other hand, makes a successful marriage before he is thirty.

Love and marriage in Powell's novels are also treated with either exaggeration or understatement. There is an extraordinarily high incidence of marital and sexual failure among Nick's friends. Temple, Stringham, Moreland, Macklintick, and Quiggin have all been divorced or separated by the end of The Kindly Ones. The successful relationships are only obliquely treated. Nick's courtship and marriage to Isobel are implied to be worthwhile. The Jeavonses and General Conyers and his wife are said to be happily married. But Nick's relationship with Jean, felt at the time to be wonderful and treated in depth, is later shown to have been a travesty of love. Although this development follows Tolstoy's dictum that happy marriages are all alike and only the unhappy ones are interesting, the overall effect of this treatment is to make love and marriage appear insubstantial and precarious.

This attitude toward love is in accord with Powell's whole philosophy of the total uncertainty of existence, its kaleidoscopic quality, and the necessity of constant revaluation if any meaning is to be extracted from the patterns in life. For if life and its significance are uncertain they are for Powell certainly patterned, and only by studying the pattern can any meaning be extracted. "Time" is of course the key word of the series, and Powell often uses a work of art as a touchstone for reflections of time. The same work of art, Bernini's Truth Unveiled by Time, is mentioned twice in Casanova's Chinese Restaurant when the same people are together, once in a seedy pub, and once at Mrs. Foxe's party for Moreland. On the first occasion Deacon refers to the figure; on the second he examines a cast of the work with Nick at a party. These contrasting scenes, separated by several years, built around the same object, characterize the whole of Powell's work. The same characters in contrasting environments, the one object eliciting totally different responses, the preoccupation with time and with values: these are constant aspects of every novel. The two methods, direct speech and the narrator's observations, mingling sadness and satire, illustrate Powell's style at its resonant best.

The importance of A Dance to the Music of Time increases with every new volume because of the superb balance Anthony Powell maintains in his complex literary structure. Each volume adds significance to the preceding ones and propels the reader eagerly forward to the novels which will follow. Still incomplete, the series has already established a place in the English tradition of great comic novels.

DANTE

Type of work: Critical essay
Author: T. S. Eliot (1888-1965)
First published: 1929

In his poetry T. S. Eliot experimented with a number of techniques, one of the best known of these being the persistent use of direct and indirect allusions to other poets and poetry. These allusions are from an impressively wide range of sources, but one of the most important sources is the poetry of Dante.

The epigraph of Eliot's first volume of poetry, Prufrock and Other Observations, is from the Purgatorio, while the epigraph to the poem, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," is from the Inferno. There are a number of allusions to these sections of The Divine Comedy in The Waste Land, and Eliot himself identifies them in his "Notes on 'The Waste Land.'" One of the central images of "The Hollow Men" is the "Multifoliate rose," which had been for Dante a symbol of Paradise, and which for Eliot represents the only hope of the hollow man. There are allusions to Dante's poetry scattered throughout Eliot's work. In "Little Gidding," the final section of Eliot's last great work of poetry, Four Quartets, the long concluding passage of Section II is, as Eliot himself said, intended to be as close an equivalent as possible to a canto of the Inferno or the Purgatorio.

The point need hardly be stressed: there is value in this study of Dante, not only for the student of Dante, but for the student of Eliot as well. In the preface to Dante, Eliot writes that this work is an account of his own acquaintance with the Italian poet's writings. Eliot himself acknowledges that the acquaintance has been, for him, a fruitful one because he had found no other poet to whom he could refer so frequently and for so many purposes in his own work. His essay is in no way, he emphasizes, to be considered as a definitive statement on Dante; he did not regard himself as a scholar. Instead, his intention is to deal with Dante's importance as a master poet and as a figure of interest to anyone concerned with modern poetry.

The first point Eliot makes about Dante is that he is, even for non-Italians, surprisingly easy to read because of his universality, even in the modern languages. But that is not to say that he is the greatest poet, or the poet who has dealt with more that is common to all men. Dante's universality, in the sense that Eliot is using the term, is a result of his particular time and place, and of the language and poetic traditions afforded him by that time and place.

The Italian language of Dante's day was the product of the universal language, Latin. Medieval Latin was universal in that in it men of various lands and languages found a common means of communication. And in the Italian vernacular that Dante used such universality is also evident. Other languages are more localized: the associations of words belong more to a particular culture or race. But Dante's culture is not so much Italian as it is European, and his language is equally universal (meaning European). The language of Shakespeare was more localized; he had no way to express himself other than in a local fashion.

Europe, in Dante's time, was intellectually more closely joined than we realize, and its unity was not simply a matter of a universal language. Dante's method and thought were commonly known and generally understood throughout Europe because of the common culture of medieval times. That method, that poetic tradition, was allegory, and allegory makes for simplicity and lucidity of style.

Because allegory, as Dante used it in The Divine Comedy, is in itself one great metaphor, Dante employed few metaphorical images within the work itself: his effort was chiefly to make us see. What few metaphors he employs, therefore, enable us to visualize a given scene; they are explanatory and intensive. Shakespeare's metaphors, by way of contrast, are expansive and even decorative;

they add to what we see rather than making us see more clearly.

So far Eliot bases his statements on his understanding of the Inferno, and the point he draws from his reading of that work is that great poetry may be written with strict economy of words, figures of speech, and elegance of style. The point he wishes to make about the Purgatorio is that great poetry can also be made from direct philosophical statement.

The Purgatorio is, says Eliot, the most difficult of the three parts of The Divine Comedy, and there are several reasons for this. Not only is it true that damnation is more dramatic than purgation; it is also true that the allegory in the Inferno is more visual, more rooted in the concrete, than is that of the Purgatorio. The Inferno can be enjoyed by itself; the Purgatorio cannot. It can only be fully understood and appreciated as a part of the whole work.

The greatest difficulty with the Purgatorio, for the modern mind, is accepting the terms of Dante's philosophical and theological beliefs. But we must accept them if we are to understand and accept the whole of Dante's vision. We can no more ignore the philosophy and theology than we can the allegory. But Eliot distinguishes between philosophical belief and poetic assent, and it is the latter that we need. He says that what is needed in appreciation of the Purgatorio is not belief, but willing suspension of belief. One must enter, in effect, the world of thirteenth century religious faith, and we cannot enter that world, we cannot appreciate the poem, unless we accept as given the philosophy and theology which are essential to it—literally, of its essence.

The point Eliot wishes to make about the Paradiso is that the state of beatitude, though rarefied, can also be the substance for great poetry. Our age finds it difficult to appreciate the Paradiso because of the prevailing prejudice against beatitude as material for poetry. For Dante, the difficulty in treating this sort of subject matter was the necessity of allowing us to apprehend it sensuously. That, from Eliot's point of view, Dante succeeded in overcoming this difficulty is obvious. The secret of Dante's power and success lies in his ability to express the almost inapprehensible in concrete, visual images.

In this study Eliot continually measures Dante's stature as poet against the usual standard, Shakespeare. His comparison of the two poets results in the conclusion that Shakespeare shows breadth in the variety of human life and passion he presents, but that Dante achieves greater depths and heights of degradation and exaltation. The Divine Comedy gives us the complete range of human emotion.

The last section of Dante is on the Vita Nuova, which Eliot describes as a series of poems connected by a "vision-literature" prose. This youthful work is important to Eliot chiefly because it aids in an understanding of The Divine Comedy." Paradoxically, however, it is The Divine Comedy that we should read first because it introduces us to the world of medieval imagery, thought, and dogma. The Vita Nuova, on the other hand, introduces us to the medieval sensibility. It is constructed of materials which are generally acknowledged to be based, in some degree, on Dante's own experience, but these materials are transformed by being placed in a larger perspective than the merely personal one. On reflection, the attraction of the poet toward Beatrice is seen as a manifestation of something greater; the attraction toward God. From an understanding of Dante's method in the Vita Nuova we can come to a clearer understanding of Dante's method, on a far greater scale, in The Divine Comedy.

DE PROFUNDIS

Type of work: An apologia in the form of a letter

Author: Oscar Wilde (1856-1900)

First published: 1905, 1908

The eighty-page manuscript of this letter rests in the British Museum. It was written in Reading Gaol on prison paper during the last months, from January to March, of Wilde's two-year sentence for "unnatural practices." It was addressed to Lord Alfred Douglas, but when Wilde was not allowed to send it from prison he handed it to his friend Robert Ross the day after he was released on May 19, 1897, with instructions to type a copy and send the original to Lord Alfred, who always claimed he never received it. Part of the work was first published under Ross's title, De Profundis, in 1905, and again in 1908. A typescript was given by Ross to Vyvyn Holland, Wilde's younger son, who published it in 1949. Rupert Hart-Davis has shown in The Letters of Oscar Wilde that this first complete edition contained hundreds of errors, and he has now published the manuscript after it was released by the British Museum from the fifty-year restriction Ross placed on it when he deposited the manuscript in 1909. As a letter it becomes the center of the definitive edition of Wilde's letters; in the shorter form edited by Ross it is both an apologia pro vita sua and a literary essay. Nevertheless, in its entirety it has a unity and a unique value as Wilde's testament to his life as an artist which should encourage its publication for the first time as an independent work of art under the title which is customarily given it.

Since it is cast in the form of an epistle, the work needs for full understanding some contextual reference to Wilde's life and works before and after his imprisonment and the composition of the letter. The prison sentence marked the end of his marriage, his income, and his life in England; thereafter he lived in exile as Sebastian Melmoth. One link with the past, however, was not broken, the association with Lord Alfred Douglas. Wilde's return to the young man, the cause of his imprisonment, divorce, and bankruptcy, and to the kind of associates whose evidence had convicted him, seems to invalidate the promise to lead a new life with which De Profundis closes. Wilde claimed, however, that on the one hand the conditions of exile, disgrace, and penury drove him to those acquaintances, and on the other they were the creations of his art and not the conditions of his life. Wilde's one conviction was that he was an artist and he doggedly transposed the terms of life and art. His term for the new life was the Vita Nuova of Dante; similarly The Portrait of Dorian Gray was to be the parable of his life and more true to life (because more artistic) than his biography. The strain of maintaining this paradox ended his life three years after his release and finished his writing career shortly after the composition of De Profundis. The resolution of the paradox is the intention of the long letter.

This epistle is therefore connected both with Wilde's biography (in which sense it is autobiography) and with his literary canon. In the letter he suggests that his sentence and fate are "prefigured" in works like The Portrait of Dorian Gray; the immediate artistic fruits of the "new life" are the two letters to the Morning Chronicle and The Ballad of Reading Gaol, his only writing after De Profundis; parts of the last amount to a prose poem somewhere between the prose of the two letters and poetry of the ballad, Wilde's longest and most effective poem. The two letters are included in Ross's 1908 edition and show plainly the real conditions under which De Profundis was written; Wilde sums them up as constant hunger, diarrhea from the rotten food, and insomnia from the diarrhea and the plank bed in his cell.) His description of prison life is vivid and awful; out of his experience, immediately after his release, he showed courage in writing letters to defend a discharged warder and to plead for decent treatment of child prisoners. Perhaps he could have played a prominent role in prison reform had not exile intervened; yet it is difficult to see Wilde in that role unless he really meant what he said in De Profundis. As it was, events showed that this epistle belonged to the realm of art and not to life.

Wilde's request to have the letter copied by Ross showed that he thought of it as art, his "letter to the world"; the covering letter to Ross described his three intentions: he would explain, not defend, his past; describe his spiritual and mental crisis in prison; and outline his future plans. The aptness of Ross's title from Psalm 130 is obvious, but the work is not so much the salvation of a lost soul as Wilde's artistic equivalent, the groping toward an artistic resolution of a paradox: the pursuit of beauty leads to the ugliness of Reading Gaol. The past is disposed of mostly in the longer first half of the letter, in reproaches to Lord Alfred Douglas which were at least half merited but relevant only if Wilde recognized Lord Alfred as the alter ego of that past and not of the future. This failure to interpret his past life as a work of art indicates the failure of the remaining portion of the letter, printed in Ross's edition of 1908.

This general section of De Profundis is in two related parts. The first states Wilde's reliance on the paradox that art is life, life art; his problem is to see the art in his present situation, which he sums up in the word "sorrow." If he really feels sorrow, then sorrow must be artistic or of artistic value; he decides that his art (that is, life) lacked the dimension of shadow (that is, sorrow), and his present sorrow must have been intended for the purpose of improving his art. If Wilde can transpose his prison sentence into an aspect of art, then his paradox holds good. We have evidence in the letters of his friends that he did just this soon after his release, when he wittily described Reading Gaol as an enchanted castle, complete with ogres, dungeons, and devices of torture.

The second part of this section then plays with an artistic creation or symbol of sorrow: The Man of Sorrows, by which Wilde intended himself, Christ, and all men to the limited extent that he could be interested in anyone but himself. He pursues the Christian analogy daringly (even blasphemously) to argue not that he is Christ but that Christ (like Wilde) was the supreme artist of life: He had the imagination to feel the sufferings of a leper without being that leper, while at the same time He preserved His individuality. Similarly, His sympathetic imagination and artistry compelled Him to turn Himself into an artistic symbol of the truth about life: The Man of Sorrows. Wilde is thus not serving a prison sentence; as an artist he is creating an artistic (that is, symbolic) statement about life. In this way he is able to absorb the most "sorrowful" experience of his life, the half-hour he stood on the center platform at Clapham Junction on his way to Reading Gaol and endured the mockery of the populace.

Having accomplished this artistic stroke (and advised Lord Alfred as a fellow poet to do likewise), Wilde proposes the two subjects on which he would like now to write. The first, the presentation of Christ as the forerunner of the Romantic movement in life, was largely covered in his outrageous analogy above; its extension here leads him to the proposition that the sinner is as near perfect Man as we can know because in repenting he can actually alter his past; thus he is the artist of the present and the past.

The second subject, the life of art considered in relation to conduct of life, is much more the nub of Wilde's attitude to his past and his future. As he admits, everybody will simply point to Reading Gaol as the logical conclusion of the artistic life as Wilde practiced it. He dodges the logic by three lofty assertions. He is now so much the repentant sinner that he can even pity those who mocked him at Clapham Junction; that it was reliance on the Philistines (that is, the original legal action he instituted against Queensbury) that brought him to Reading Gaol; that the supreme concern of the artist is what he says of himself, not what others say. His own statements, Wilde asserted, must be the truth because what he says will be an artistic creation.

Thus Wilde's perverse reading of the obvious analogies in the Christian story made him miss its whole point of sacrifice (though he considers he was sacrificed for Lord Alfred) and confirms his original paradox, absolves him from all blame, and nullifies the whole meaning of Reading Gaol. The artist had triumphed over his real situation but only at the cost of life itself. Wilde's enormous egotism prevented him from seeing the pain he had caused others. All he could appreciate was an artistically crucified Wilde.

A DEATH IN THE FAMILY

Author: James Agee (1909-1955)

Time: 1915

Locale: Knoxville, Tennessee

First published: 1957

Principal characters:

RUFUS FOLLET, a six-year-old boy

MARY FOLLET, his mother

JAY FOLLET, his father

CATHERINE, his small sister

JOEL LYNCH, Mary Follet's father

CATHERINE LYNCH, his wife

AMELIA and

ANDREW LYNCH, Mary's sister and brother

Perhaps the most significant aspect of A Death in the Family is the fact that it restored a world of feeling and moral value to American fiction. A Pulitzer Prize winner for 1957, it is a novel about love that is neither adult lust nor adolescent groping, about death as an inescapable part of the human condition, universal and therefore to be borne. In a very real but almost old-fashioned sense the book is a celebration of these two great mysteries of experience. At a time when most writers choose to treat of love as a process of glandular secretions and death as a meaningless commonplace of violence, nothing in this novel reveals the originality and power of James Agee more than this ability to suggest the atmosphere of wonder and awe which once surrounded man's awareness of his being and his mortality.

The essential difference found between James Agee and our leading specialists in primitivism and violence goes even deeper. A Death in the Family is a novel of compassion almost overwhelming in its sensitivity, a circumstance not entirely accounted for by its autobiographical theme and the writer's obvious attempt to get at the meaning of the central experience in his own life, the death of his father forty-odd years before. He is not dealing with that form of compassion which has left its mark on much recent fiction, the subverted sentimentality of a growing concern for the alcoholic, the inarticulate brute, the lonely spinster, the inadequate male, the lost child, the homosexual, the bum—all the misfits and outcasts of our society. His compassion is for simple, decent people of ordinary lives—the very “ordinariness” of his material is one of the notable features of the novel—in a time of loss and grief. These are matters that he presents with a feeling of shared sorrow and sympathy for what is most personal and yet most general in the human situation.

Agee's sense of experience shared presupposes a universe of social continuity and moral order, not a world in which the values of the moment must be salvaged from the spectacle of fragmented, isolated lives within a disordered society, but one in which the human effort, in spite of its accumulation of grief, hunger, and waste, becomes meaningful and worthwhile when judged by community values and the idea of man's moral responsibility as man. As a serious writer Agee was interested in the nature of good and evil; in his novel death, the complement of life, is the chink in the armor that gives a small boy his first awareness of evil and threatens with the shock of loss a family in which the ties of kinship have been fulfilled by love. That he was able to shape on a purely domestic level a fable of compelling tenderness and compassionate insight, or to achieve within this framework his effects of lyricism, meditative speculation, and drama, is proof that James Agee's death lost to American letters one of the resourceful and authentic talents of his generation.

Behind this novel, however, lay years of preparation and apprentice work in a variety of media within the fairly short span of his writing career. He was born in Knoxville, the setting of A Death in the Family, in 1909, and he died of a heart attack in a New York taxicab in 1955. After schooling at Exeter and Harvard he had joined the staff of Fortune in 1932. His first book was Permit Me Voyage, a collection of poems published in the Yale Younger Poets Series in 1934. This verse was rather conventional in form, romantic in its display of strong personal feeling. As poetry written in a period of technical experiment and at a time when writers were expected to carry banners in the picket lines of the class war, the book, like A Death in the Family, seemed strangely old-fashioned. (Archibald MacLeish's somewhat ambiguous comment was that Agee had not assumed ■ "Position.") Later, out of an assignment to write a documentary report on the sharecropping system in the South, he produced one of the most original but least read books of its decade, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, a curious blend of narrative, social history, satire, and philosophy. It is in many ways a youthful book but an impressive one in its praise of the American earth and its rage against the exploiters of the land and its workers. As a social document the book is still eloquent and moving, even though the first impression is likely to be one of tremendous power of language under poor control. Still later he wrote about motion pictures for The Nation, critiques which have become the classics of their kind, and reviewed books for Time. In 1948 he gave up journalism to devote himself to A Death in the Family, but he was constantly being diverted to other tasks: articles for Life, scenarios for The Quiet One, The African Queen, Face to Face, The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky, The Night of the Hunter, a documentary on the life of Lincoln for television, and the novella, The Morning Watch, published in 1950.

Although Agee came late to fiction, his admirers saw in The Morning Watch, a moving study of adolescent confusion against the background of a boys' school, promise of the major work of which he was capable. A Death in the Family almost fulfills that promise. When Agee died in 1955 his novel was virtually complete except for the tying in of loose ends and the final polishing. In preparing the manuscript for publication the editors have inserted as thematic interludes several episodes not directly related to the time-scheme of the novel and have added as a prologue the sketch titled "Knoxville: Summer 1915," which had been written some years before. It is safe to say that if Agee had lived he would have given his book greater structural unity and might have recast in more dramatic form several sections which remain static in effect. It is doubtful, however, if he could have improved upon the rich contrasts of texture conveyed in characterization, mood, and scene, or refined to greater precision the beautiful clarity of his style.

As an introductory piece, "Knoxville: Summer 1915" creates the mood of affectionate reminiscence within which the novel is embodied. It is a twilight study of a summer evening when children play around the corner lampposts and men in shirt sleeves sprinkle their lawns after supper. Later crickets chirp in the early dark that seems filled with stars as a small boy lies with his father, mother, uncle, and aunt on quilts that have been spread on the grass in the back yard. This is the enchanted world of childhood as it appeared to young Rufus Follet: safe, warm, secure, a world of protection and understanding and love.

Rufus and his younger sister Catherine are asleep when the telephone rings summoning his father to the country, where his Grandfather Follet has been taken suddenly ill. The ties of family relationships, intimate, trivial, amusing, tender, are evoked as Jay Follet prepares to start out before daybreak and his wife Mary gets up to cook his breakfast. Because he expects to be back in time for supper he leaves without waking the children. They are asleep the next night when the telephone rings again and a stranger's voice tells Mary that her husband has been in an accident; on the way back from the country the steering mechanism of his car had broken and Jay, thrown clear when the car left the road, had been killed instantly. This, in outline, is the story of A Death in the Family, but not its whole substance. More important is the effect of death on the people involved. To Mary it brings the realization that death happens to many people and is very common. In her distress she turns to her faith for consolation. To Rufus his father's death is not the maturing experience it will eventually become, but only another baffling circumstance among the mysteries of his young life, like his nightmares, his mother's command that he must never mention the color of a Negro nursemaid's skin, the memory of a visit made a short time before to see his withered old great-great-grandmother in the country, or the reason why older boys ask him his name and then break into laughter and run away. Yet he knows that the event gives him some importance that he had never known before: slowly, to himself, he repeats the fact that his father is dead. Catherine is too young to understand her loss or her mother's sorrow. And beyond these is the widening circle of family: Grandfather Lynch, the agnostic; deaf Grandmother Lynch; Great-aunt Hannah, a tower of strength; Andrew, the sharp-tongued artist uncle, and his sister Amelia; weak, drunken Uncle Ralph Follet, the undertaker, who asks to prepare his own brother's body for burial. These people give the novel its texture, establishing the world in which adults and children confront the fact of death while trying to understand its meaning in terms of grief and love.

The novel contains memorable passages in which deep feeling is combined with power and precision of language, as in the account of the relationship between father and son unfolded as Jay and

Rufus walk slowly home after seeing a Charlie Chaplin movie, in the scene in which Great-aunt Hannah and Rufus go shopping and he wears down an adult's reasonable firmness with his small boy's persistence over the purchase of a loud-checked cap, in the moment when the mourning family seems to sense the dead man's presence in the house, and in the scene in which young Rufus, eager to display his new cap, runs to his parents' bedroom and sees that his father is not there. Instead, he finds his mother propped up on two pillows, looking as if she were sick or tired.

James Agee began as a poet and he never lost a poet's eye for the telling detail or the poet's ear. A Death in the Family contains passages which, even out of context, show the true quality of a writer to whom literature was a total job of action and feeling, of sights and sounds, of image and meaning, of language and mood. The book is not a perfect novel, perhaps not even a major work, but in the universality of its theme and the compassion which it invokes it uncovers a world of feeling in which all may share. This is more than the truth-telling for which the realist strives; it is truth itself.

To the thinking Mexican, the Revolution of 1910 is the great and inescapable fact in his country's destiny and his own personal identity. A second conquest of the land and the past, it was the climax of four centuries of turbulent history and the adumbration of all that has happened since. For the revolution did more than topple the paternal dictatorship of Porfirio Díaz; it tore a nation apart by fratricidal strife and then put it together again in a strange new way that continues to disturb and puzzle its citizens. It swept away lingering remnants of colonialism, brought into being a revolutionary oligarchy still in power, created a new middle class, moved Mexico ahead into the twentieth century, helped to shape a literature both ancestral and prophetic in its pictures of a sad and violent land. And its force is still unspent.

In some ways this situation is comparable to the aftermath of the Civil War in the United States, where Americans are still trying to see their own fraternal conflict in perspectives of cause and consequence. Among Southerners, especially, we find a sense of the uniqueness of the regional experience, a response to events viewed imaginatively as a national tragedy. A somewhat similar spirit prevails in certain areas of Mexican life, but on a greater scale, complicated by a growing belief that the revolution has failed and that the real revolution is still to come. In fact, the Mexican intellectual today is often self-conscious in much the same manner that Faulkner and writers of his generation were self-conscious: obsessed by feeling for place, burdened by the past, uneasy in the new society, seeking to reclaim in their stories and poems old values lost in the processes of change. Feeling that history has isolated him in his own particular moment in time, the parochialism of the revolution, the Mexican writer often turns inward to create a literature that veers between moods of fury and outrage and the poetry of nocturnal silence. He lives, to borrow a phrase from the poet Octavio Paz, in a "labyrinth of solitude." It was José Luis Cuevas, the avant-garde painter, who first used the term "Cactus Curtain" in protest against the isolation of the Mexican artist. In an earlier novel, Where the Air Is Clear, Carlos Fuentes said that it is impossible to explain Mexico. Instead, the artist believes in it with anger and a feeling of outrage, with passion, and with a sense of alienation.

This statement carries the reader a long way toward an understanding of Carlos Fuentes' fiction. It is clear that he has rejected Mexican life as it is constituted today, but at the same time he uses it in his novels to test his sensuous powers and dramatic vigor. The country he writes about is not the land that tourists see or a land of tradition; it is the country of art, a place and people transformed by compelling imagination into something rich and strange and meaningful. This is one reason for his restless experiments with technique, the broken narrative structures, the shifting points of view, his lovely, solemn hymns to landscapes and time, the interior monologues by which he tries to probe the national conscience as well as the consciousness of his people. If he has not yet assimilated in his own writing the influences he has absorbed from such varied figures as Proust, Joyce, Faulkner, Dos Passos, and Wolfe, he has nevertheless put his borrowings to brilliant use in catching the tempo of Mexican life in its present stage of uncertainty and indirection.

Although his methods may vary in his discontinuity of form and the labyrinthine turnings of his style, his theme remains constant, for his novels are studies in the responsibility which power, knowingly or unknowingly, brings and the corruption which almost necessarily accompanies power. He began with Where the Air Is Clear, a novel set against the background of Mexico City. There the extremes of poverty and wealth allowed a study in breadth of what has happened on all levels of society after the revolution failed to fulfill its promises. Central to Señor Fuentes' theme is Federico Robles, once an ardent revolutionary but now a driving power in the country's political and financial life. His rise in the world, through treachery, bribery, ruthless exploitation, and the corruption of better men, has made him many enemies. The novel tells the story of his fall. But more than one man's ruin is involved in the panoramic picture presented. Behind the events of the story the failed revolution throws long shadows into the present, the realization of wasted effort, of lives lost to no purpose, of high aims given over to meaningless deeds of sensuality, folly, and outrage. Robles is what he is, as we see at the end, because others in their selfishness and pride have assisted in his rise. Now they hate him because they see in him an enlarged image of themselves. Where the Air Is Clear is saved from becoming an ideological polemic by its roots that reach downward toward much that is flawed and gross in the human condition.

Fuentes tells much the same story in The Good Conscience, although here his concern is with a family, grandfather, father, and son, rather than a single individual. The setting is Guanajuato, where the oldest of the Ceballos, a dry-goods merchant, laid the foundation of a family fortune. Representative of the new middle class, the materialistic, ambitious Ceballos men marry for position, play a cynical political game for security, carry on their shady business deals for gain. Society accepts them; the State protects them; the Church sustains them. The writer's picture of chicanery and corruption is magnificent up to a point. But the book breaks abruptly in the middle to present in Jaime Ceballo, the youngest of the family, a study of adolescent confusion and rebellion. Torn between the self-seeking practices of his family and the teachings of the Church, he attempts to follow the example of Christ, fails, and falls back on radicalism as the only alternative to the greed, lust for power, and hypocrisy of his class. The ending is unconvincing after the ironical, somber overtones orchestrated through the earlier sections of the novel. The reader feels that the writer's own Marxist beliefs rather than the logic of character and experience dictated an ending that seems more contrived than real.

The Death of Artemio Cruz is the most limited presentation of this theme that Fuentes has attempted to date. True, the book is flawed by his bewildering cross-chronology, the points of view constantly shifting and intermingling, and his varied stylistic effects. In the end, however, the novel rises above its faults in its compelling picture of one man's life and the relation of that life to all the years of disorder and change that have conditioned the course of Mexican history from the beginning of the century to the present day. Again this central figure is a force in the land, a millionaire who has climbed to his position of wealth and power by violence, blackmail, bribery, brutal exploitation of the workers. Like Federico Robles, he is a former revolutionist who stands for the Mexican past as well as its present. (The robber bands who represented the extreme of the revolutionary effort, Fuentes seems to say, have now been replaced by the robber barons of modern finance and politics.) On the wall of his office a map shows the extent of his holdings: a newspaper, mines, timber, hotels, foreign stocks and bonds, and, not shown, money on deposit in English, Swiss, and United States banks.

Artemio Cruz is on his deathbed when the novel opens. Stricken by a gastric attack after his return from a business trip to Hermosillo on April 9, 1959, he lies in his mansion in a fashionable section of Mexico City, the moral corruption of his life as much a stench in his nostrils as the processes of decay already at work in his body. An officious priest tries to administer the last sacrament in spite of his protests; Cruz had abandoned the Church years before. Doctors subject him to the indignity of their instruments as they examine his body. In the background are his estranged wife and the daughter who despises him. Although they pretend concern for the dying man, their greatest anxiety is the whereabouts of his will, and he refuses to tell them. His only hold on reality is a tape recording, an account of business deals and proposed transactions, played by his secretary, Padilla. While these people jostle about his bed, Artemio Cruz drifts between past and present, not in any coherent order but in a series of flashbacks tracing the course that has brought him to his present state.

Thus we see him in 1919, an ambitious young veteran of the revolution arriving at the home of the Bernal family in Perales, ostensibly to bring to a bereaved father and sister an account of Gonzalo Bernal's death before a Villista firing squad, in reality to insinuate himself into the confidence of the old hacendado, marry his daughter, and get possession of the Bernal estates. But his wife Catalina never fully realizes that Artemio had really fallen in love with her; influenced by Father Páez, the family priest, she believes that her marriage bought her father's security and her own at the cost of her soul, and she hates herself for the passion to which Artemio moves her at night. In the end the two despise each other, and she blames him when their son, whom he has removed from her control, is killed while fighting in the Spanish Civil War. Before Catalina there was Regina, the camp follower he also loved, taken hostage by Villa's troops and hanged. After her death there were other women: Lilia, the young mistress he took on a holiday in Acapulco and who betrayed him there, and Laura, who later married someone else. But Artemio's adventures are not all with women. We see him ruining his neighbors at Perales and getting possession of their lands, using bribery and blackmail to buy his first election as a deputy, giving his lavish parties where the guests who mocked him behind his back were not supposed to bore him with their conversation, negotiating big deals, ruining competitors, and all the while preparing himself for the loneliness and desolation he feels when his time comes to die. Close to the end of the novel Fuentes presents two episodes that throw light on the later years of Artemio's career. One is the story of his capture by a Villista troop. Sentenced to death, he decides to give information to the enemy. Although he later kills the officer to whom he had promised betrayal, he had at least been guilty by intent. Some justification for his deed is given in the words of Gonzalo Bernal, the disillusioned idealist who nevertheless goes bravely to his death. Bernal declares that once a revolution has been corrupted by those who act only to live well, to rise in the world, the battles may still be fought and won, but the revolution without compromise has been lost to the ambitious and the mediocre. The last episode tells how it all began. Artemio Cruz was born on the petate, the mat symbolic of the peon's condition, the son of a decayed landowner and a half-caste girl. His only friend during his early years is Lunero, a mulatto who serves the needs of Artemio's half-crazed old grandmother and his lazy, drunken uncle. After the boy accidentally shoots his uncle he runs away to Veracruz. There, as we learn indirectly, a schoolmaster tutors Artemio and prepares him for the part he is to play in the revolution before he loses his ideals and makes the choice of betrayal and rejection that leads him to the corrupting use of power in other men's lives and his own.

Fuentes' meaning in this final episode seems clear. The revolution, in the end, was betrayed by the common people who had made it.

The character of Artemio Cruz is handled with a considerable degree of subtlety and skill. Fuentes does not gloss over his cynicism, opportunism, or brutal ruthlessness. But he is saved from becoming a monster of pure abstraction and calculation by his relationships with the three people who mean most in his life: Lunero, the devoted mulatto for whose sake he committed a murder; Regina, the girl killed by Villistas, and his son Lorenzo. Through the novel, like a refrain, runs a reference to the time just before Lorenzo went off to fight in the Spanish war when father and son took a morning ride toward the sea. By the end of the novel Artemio's story fulfills all that it promised to a young boy, one man's journey with no real beginning or end in time, promises of love, solitude, violence, power, friendship, disillusionment, corruption, forgetfulness, innocence, and delight. There is also the realization of how at the end a man's death is joined to his beginning.

To get his story told, Fuentes employs three voices. The first is the obvious third person, used to present in dramatic form the events of Artemio's life as they are pieced together in past time. The second is the "I" of the present as the old man lies dying, shrinks from the decay of his body, and takes fitful account of what is going on around him. The third is a vatic presence never identified—conscience? consciousness?—addressing Artemio as "you." This, we judge, is the unrealized Artemio, the man he might have been. He is a lover of the land that the real Artemio Cruz robbed and raped, the product of history, perhaps the re-created moral conscience of the revolution. He speaks in metaphors, poetry, and prophecy about history and time, places and people, because they belong to the beautiful but sad and tragic land of his birth.

The Death of Artemio Cruz is a divided book, terse yet chaotic, passionate, ironic. Too much has been made, undoubtedly, of Carlos Fuentes as one of Mexico's angry young men. In spite of his Marxist beliefs, he is essentially a romantic. He is also the possessor of an exuberant, powerful, very contemporary talent which has not yet found itself but which, aside from his surface effects of undisciplined but compelling style, comes through in clear, unhackneyed fashion, even in translation.

THE DEATH SHIP

Author: B. Traven (1900-?)

Time: The 1920's

Locale: Belgium, Holland, France, Spain, the Mediterranean Sea

First published: 1926

Principal characters:

GERARD "PIPPIP" GALES, a young American sailor

STANISLAV, a Polish sailor, Gerard's friend

Based on the author's own experiences, written when he was about twenty-four, The Death Ship is unique, apparently free of direct influences, just as B. Traven is in some ways unlike any other writer. The book may be classified as a proletarian novel, written in the style of tough-guy fiction. But its thesis is not as doctrinaire, as deliberately worked out as that of a proletarian novel, nor is its style as conscious as that of a tough-guy novel.

For Gerard Gales, the young American narrator, stranded in Antwerp when his ship returns to New Orleans without him, the passport has displaced the sun as the center of the universe. Unable to prove his citizenship, he is a man without a country, and his physical presence is no official proof of his birth. Like Kafka's K. in The Trial, he moves through a labyrinth of bureaucracy; officials empowered to dispense passports, certificates, sailors-books, receipts, affidavits, seals, and licenses conduct the inquisition of the modern age. The war for liberty and democracy has produced a Europe in which to be hungry is human, to lack a passport is inhuman—unless you are rich.

A victim of nationalism, moving among fading echoes of speeches on international brotherhood, Gerard is an individualist. Immigration officials conspire to smuggle him from Belgium into Holland, then back into Belgium, then into France, where he is jailed for riding a train without a ticket and later sentenced to be shot as a suspected spy. Ironically, when he senses the universal animosity toward Americans and pretends to be a German, he is treated royally. In Spain he is left entirely alone. A people politically oppressed, the Spanish seem freer than other men and Gerard loves them. But the peasants are so good to him that he feels useless and hates himself; he senses the error in a Communist state where the individual is denied the privilege of taking his own risks. Because he is a sailor without a ship, and because he wants to return to his girl, Gerard signs aboard The Yorikke.

If he once thought that the world consisted of deckhands and men who made paint, he descends now into a sailor's hell as drag man in a stokehold. Its name obscured on the bow, The Yorikke, too, appears to lack a proper birth certificate; but though she seems ashamed of her name, Gerard exhibits a kind of nationalism himself when he withholds his true name and country and signs on as an Egyptian; no American would sail on such a ship, and he realizes that, despite its many faults, he loves his country and is wretchedly homesick. The Yorikke resembles no ship he has ever seen; she appears to be insane. A model death ship, she has no life jackets. A death ship is so called because her owners have decided to scuttle her for the insurance. The crew, desperate men called "deads," at the end of their tether when they come aboard, do not know when the ship will go down. The sea, Gerard imagines, will probably eructate the diseased ship for fear of infection. No supplies—spoons, coffee cups, blankets—are provided; the men repeatedly steal a single bar of soap from one another until it has been through every filthy hand; conditions are worse than in a concentration camp. The only thing in ample supply is work, and if a man tries to collect overtime on a ship pathologically committed to profits he may find himself in a black hold with rats that would terrify a cat. Traven conveys a vivid sense of what "she" means as pronoun for a ship; Gerard constantly describes The Yorikke in very intimate and telling female terms.

Gerard admires his mysterious captain whose intelligence sets him apart from the old style pirate. He takes care of his men, and they would rather sink with the ship than inform the authorities that she is carrying contraband for the Riffs. The Yorikke crew is the filthiest Gerard has ever seen; the men wear bizarre rigs and rags. Some appear to have been shanghaied off the gallows. In the towns, other sailors shun them; men, women, and children fear them; and the police, afraid they may leave the town in ashes, follow them.

The filthiest member of the black gang is the drag man, who must perform extra and loathsome chores. Work is at the center of this novel—the struggle to get it, and, under extreme conditions, the horror and ultimate beauty of it. Delight in conveying an inside view is a characteristic of tough-guy literature. Gerard gives all the details of various work routines. One of the most horrific passages in literature is Traven's description of putting back fallen grate bars while the boiler is white hot. After his first bout at what becomes a daily task, Gerard declares that he is free, unbound, above the gods; he can do what he wishes and curse the gods, because no hell could be greater torture.

Gerard resurrects the freshness of the cliché that men become like machines. He feels like a gladiator for Caesar's fight-to-the-death spectacles. Bravery on the battlefield is nothing when compared to the bravery of men who do certain work to keep civilization afloat. No flag drapes the bodies of casualties; they go like garbage over the fantail. On a death ship no laws keep a man in line; each worker is crucially necessary and work is a common bond. With no sense of heroics, Gerard helps save two men and is himself saved. His true countrymen, he discovers, are those workers who are scalded and scorched at the same furnace with him; he does not desert because his friend Stanislav would then have to work alone. Though Traven appears to show how men grow accustomed to misery and filth, he insists that nobody really gets used to them; one simply loses the capacity to feel and becomes hard-boiled. Few fictive descriptions of the life, the hopes, the illusions and attitudes of the doomed sailor, his qualities of ingenuity, improvisation, and audacity are as complete as Traven's.

Ironically, just as Gerard, despite his misery, learns to live and laugh on the ship, he senses The Yorikke's imminent doom. A further irony comes when Gerard and Stanislav are shanghaied from The Yorikke to serve on the new but disastrously slow Empress of Madagascar, which is to be scuttled in a few days. But the Empress kills her plotting captain and stands like a tower between the rocks before she sinks. Stanislav eats like a ship-owner before he drowns. He and Gerard are safely tied to a piece of wreckage, but Stanislav has a hallucination in which he sees The Yorikke leaving the dock. Wanting to go with her, he detaches himself and slips into the sea. Not yet rescued, Gerard pays his respects to his comrade in the last lines of the novel.

The style of the story—rough, garrulous, full of completely justified profanity—sounds translated, but it is consistent with Gerard's semi-literate immigrant background. Though these qualities become wearisome in three hundred pages, the sheer energy of the telling achieves a special eloquence. Traven is overly fascinated by the way words come about; Gerard indulges in figurative rhetoric; many of his wisecracks seem lame, probably because his slang is dated. Humor, wit, and comedy are interwoven quite naturally among the darks of Traven's narrative. The style provides an amplification of theme through the play of language. Although Traven does not set up satirical situations, his diction and metaphorical pretenses create a satirical distortion in the telling of such episodes as those involving bureaucracy.

No plot, no story line as such holds the novel together; narratively, it seems split in half, but the handling of theme, the picaresque looseness, and the personality of the narrator create an appropriate effect to the material. The static quality is relieved by sudden transitions and by the frequent interjection of tales and anecdotes, as in The Treasure of the Sierra Madre. Gerard is a storyteller who never tires of retelling a tale. The consulate scenes are repetitious; we get variations on the same routine, though speeded up and foreshortened sometimes; and toward the end, Stanislav tells Gerard a story about himself that closely resembles Gerard's earlier experiences. Gerard is especially fond of ridiculing popular fiction and movie versions of the seafaring life; the difference between living and listening to an experience is discussed in the beginning and at the end. Gerard tells his general story the way a sailor would, commenting with joking metaphors and reflecting constantly on the meaning of events. The reader is visualized as a captive audience for a man who has at last found a way to speak without interruption on various social, political, and economic conditions. The novel has some poignant moments, too, but, as is typical of the tough-guy novel, sentimentality occasionally intrudes.

Gerard and Stanislav are not to be associated with the victims of recent literature. They are more victims of the nature of things than of conditions that can be reformed. Gerard may gripe with every breath he takes, but he does not whine. He proudly insists that he can do work any man can do, anywhere. He contemptuously refuses to bow to circumstance. He refuses to blame the shipowners; having failed to take his fate in his own hands by jumping ship, he has no right to refuse to be a slave. But he can hope that he will be resurrected from the "deads" by his own will and fortitude. He knows that for the courageous man who survives the ordeal of The Yorikke anything is possible. By going to the bottom of agony in his daily task of replacing grate bars, Gerard comes out with a kind of peace, aware of his place in a universe that now has meaning in the slightest thing. This earned romanticism enables him to see beauty in the conventionally ugly.

Although Gerard covers, directly to the reader and in dialogue, almost every grievance of the laborer of the first twenty-five years of this century, he is not interested in easy working conditions and fringe benefits. Repeatedly, he preaches the gospel of hard work, not because work is good for the soul, which seems less involved than muscle, but because it is good for man the animal. Unlike proletarian writers, Traven achieves a kind of mystique about work. One thinks of Albert Camus' Sisyphus: for his disobedience of the officials, Sisyphus was condemned to the futile task of rolling a huge rock to the top of a mountain, after which it rolled back down to the plain. Camus likened this labor to that of the proletariat. Unintentionally, perhaps, Traven has translated Sisyphus' mythic task into existential reality. The intentions of the novel are uncertain; but at moments it appears to be an allegory about the laboring class. Working unseen at sea, deep in the black hole of an ash pit, these men, who were never born, in a sense, who are without a country, go to their deaths on a ship that does not exist officially. Gerard constantly speaks of the ship metaphorically as being over five thousand years old. The flag is so dirty it could represent any country, and thus represents all. Many nationalities are represented among the crew; each nameless person is called, ironically, by the name of the country he claims, but which has denied his existence.

DEATH'S DUELL

Author: John Donne (1572-1631)

First published: 1632

About a year prior to his death John Donne preached his last sermon before the king at Whitehall on February 12, 1630. His publisher, Richard Redmer, who printed the first edition in 1632 of "Death's Duell, or, A Consolation to the Soule, Against the Dying Life, and Living Death of the Body," said that it was called "The Doctors Owne Funerall Sermon." The text is from Psalm 68, the twentieth verse: And unto God the Lord belong the issues from death.

The language of the sermon is as imaginative, musical, and perverse as that of Donne's poetry in which he suggests, "Go and catch a falling star," or observes with interest that in the body of a flea his blood mingles with that of his beloved. Like the poetry, the sermon stretches the mind that would follow its eloquent, shocking, and neatly ordered expression. The Trinity probably inspires the division into three parts. Donne begins with the image of a building with a firm foundation, buttresses, and an unarchitectural "knitting" of the materials. These three particulars he compares to the actions of the Persons of the Trinity. God the Father lays the foundation for man's life: he leads us from death into life. The Holy Ghost, like the buttresses which hold up the building, supports us at the hour of death when we shall enter eternal life. The God of Mercy, the Son, like the knitting together of the building, took upon himself flesh, knitting the divine and the human natures into one and delivering us by his death. The images are startling: the winding sheet which we bring with us into the world, the dust with which our mouths are filled after death, the worm that incestuously unites son, mother, and sister in its body. The figure of Christ on the cross "rebaptized in his owne teares and sweat, and embalmed in his own blood alive" is almost as uncomfortably vivid as the last sentence of the sermon. In the concluding portion of "Death's Duell," Donne, with revival preacher fervor, calls his hearers to repentance, prayer, and dependence upon Christ.

The significance of the title seems to lie in the double aspect in the subtitle, the dying life and the living death. For Donne, the phrase "the issues of death" has three interpretations: deliverance from death by God; the manner and disposition of death by the Holy Ghost; and the deliverance from this life by death which Jesus Christ experienced because he had taken on human flesh and could have no other exit. The sermon is built around these three points.

In the first section, Donne says that throughout life we pass from one death to another. These transitions are deliverances from death. In the womb, we are in a kind of death from which we are delivered into life, the manifold deaths of the world. We come in a winding sheet to seek a grave. Birth dies in infancy, infancy in youth, youth and the rest in age. Age also dies and "determines all." We progress in evil. Youth is worse than infancy; age laments that it cannot pursue the sins of youth. So many calamities accompany each age that death itself would be "an ease" in comparison. After death, the body progresses to corruption, putrefaction, and dispersion. Christ, however, did not suffer the corruption of the grave; and those who are alive at His second coming shall not see it. All else shall suffer dispersion; but at the resurrection God will recompact bodies and souls.

In the second section of the sermon, Donne says that "it belongs to God, and not to man to passe a judgement upon us at our death." Man is incapable of judging the state of the soul at its passing. When men think that a man dies peacefully like a lamb, God only knows if he is really stupified and unaware of dying or actually dying without reluctance. Even Christ suffered agony at the prospect of death; so reluctance to accept death is not to be condemned. The mercies of God are instantaneous and imperceptible to bystanders. Men should not judge in the violent deaths of criminals, for Christ died a shameful death and many honestly felt that he was a malefactor. God governs not by examples but by rules. Therefore, no man can judge another by his attitude at death. God judges his whole life; so if a man dies without faith apparently, none should make evil conclusions about him. God does not promise a quiet death, but "live well here and thou shalt live well for ever."

The third section of the sermon deals with Christ's incarnation and resultant death. In this "issue of death" men are delivered by the death of another, by the death of Christ. "That God, this Lord, the Lord of life could die, is a strange contemplation." That God would die is "an exaltation" of this. That God "shold die, must die," and had no issue but by death is a "superexaltation" of this aspect of God and death. Since God is the God of revenges, he would not pass over the sin of man unpunished. Christ, therefore, was bound to suffer. God would not spare himself. "There was nothing more free, more voluntary, more spontaneous than the death of Christ." The decree that Christ was to suffer was eternal; so is Infinite love, eternal love. His Father calls this death only a bruising of his heel. Christ calls it a baptism. He accepts the cup without detestation. The cup is now salvation, a health to all the world. "As God breathed a soule into the first Adam, so this second Adam breathed his soule into God, in the hands of God. There wee leave you in that blessed dependancy, to hang upon him that hangs on the Crosse, there bath[e] in his teares, there suck at his woundes, and lie downe in peace in his grave, till hee vouchsafe you a resurrection, and an ascension into that Kingdome, which hee hath purchas'd for you with the inestimable price of his incorruptible blood."

Commonly in Donne's time sermons were first delivered and then written from notes and memory. The words as Donne records them may not be exactly the ones which he spoke.

THE DEFENCE OF GUENEVERE AND OTHER POEMS

Author: William Morris (1834-1896)

First published: 1858

The Defence of Guenevere and Other Poems, the first collection of poems published by William Morris, is one of the three or four principal expressions of Pre-Raphaelitism in poetry. Although Morris had just turned twenty-four when the volume appeared, it epitomizes his qualities and foreshadows his artistic attainment. Swinburne, his contemporary, wrote concerning it: "Such things as are in this book are taught and learned in no school but that of instinct." It was Swinburne's opinion that no other literary work had ever shown more distinctly the mark of native character and that the poetry was entirely original. He saw Morris as "not yet a master," but "assuredly no longer a pupil." Not unmindful of certain technical faults and an occasional hint of confusion, Swinburne nevertheless went on to say that Morris' volume was incomparable in its time for "perception and experience of tragic truth" and that no other contemporary poet had a "touch of passion at once so broad and so sure."

Swinburne may have overstated the case for the originality of the poems; Morris shows strong influences of Malory and Froissart, though more in regard to selection of subject matter than in its interpretation. His Arthurian poems reveal a genuine passion and exceptional beauty, especially in passages such as the vibrant, breath-taking narrative description which opens the title poem. Yet, despite their freshness and strong feeling, these poems are in what may be designated the tapestry tradition, whereas those poems derived more clearly from Froissart than from Malory—among them "Sir Peter Harpdon's End," "Concerning Geoffrey Teste Noir," and the grim "Haystack in the Floods"—attest to Morris' realization that, even in the Middle Ages, the tourney was not the only aspect of war.

Although Morris had a lifelong passion for beauty, a passion kept by his vigorous nature from any Victorian effeminacy, he had a need for certain harsh or stark elements which are already present in these poems but which he did not fully employ until, after discovering the Icelandic sagas, he wrote some of his greatest poetry in Sigurd the Volsung. The touches of this later power evident in this first volume of his poems are the stark descriptions such as these lines from "Concerning Geoffrey Teste Noire":

I think 'twas Geoffrey smote him on the brow
With some spiked axe; and while he totter'd, dim

About the eyes, the spear of Alleyne Roux

Slipped through his camaille and his throat; well, well!

And when Sir Peter Harpdon's wife Alice, upon hearing of her husband's death, cries:

I am much too young to live,
Fair God, so let me die,

we recognize in the cry a kind of Shakespearean poignancy. Among the many other qualities of this first book of poems is the apparent simplicity of a lyric like "Golden Wings," which attains deep sincerity as it smoothly reflects early memories in a manner distinctly Morris' own. There is also the plain perfection of the little poem, "Summer Dawn," in which, departing momentarily from the dreams and histories of long-past lives and battles, Morris speaks simply in his own voice of his desire for communion in nature.

Morris, while studying medieval romances and admiring them for their curious intrinsic beauty, became convinced that if we could move backward through time to the age of the sea kings, we should find the essential characteristics of the race to be exactly like those of today. Admittedly, he found the Middle Ages much more ignorant, cruel, and savage than the ages preceding or following; nevertheless, he concluded that people of those times must have thought about particular things and issues just as modern men and women do. Why then, he asked, should we not study all possible facets of this terrible society?

Morris gives us some brief, sudden, and flashing pictures of that far-off time. The title poem presents a queen about to be burned at the stake; then, at the sound of a horse's hoofs, she knows that her lover is coming to her rescue. One of the most powerful of these pictures is presented in "The Haystack in the Floods." Not revealing either how the tragedy began or how it ended, the poem opens with the haunting questions:

Had she come all the way for this
To part at last without a kiss?
Yea, had she borne the dirt and rain
That her own eyes might see him slain
Beside the haystack in the floods?

We are at first told just enough about the woman Jehane to make us wonder about her character and to know that as she rides along she is miserable. Her lover Robert, who rides some distance ahead of her with a few armed men, is confronted by his adversary Godmar and numerous armed men. At first she fears for her own safety rather than Robert's:

My God! my God! I have to tread
The long way back without you; then
The court at Paris; those six men;
The gratings of the Chatelet;
The swift Seine on some rainy day
Like this, and people standing by,
And laughing, while my weak hands try
To recollect how strong men swim.

In her despair she contemplates accepting Godmar, the man whom she hates. Robert, whose men refuse to fight against the heavy odds, charges the enemy and is captured, disarmed, and bound. When after long hesitation Jehane refuses to come willingly to his castle, Godmar and his men brutally murder Robert before her eyes. The poem ends with an uncertainty about her fate. Does she go mad? Will she be taken back and burned at the castle from which she has escaped? The reader may even suspect that she is feigning madness and that before the castle is reached she will selfishly yield to Godmar, who may then retain her until he tires of her. Having given us this glimpse of medieval passion, selfishness, suffering, and cruelty, Morris ends the poem, after Godmar's men had beaten Robert's brains out, on this note:

Then Godmar turned again and said:
So, Jehane, the first fitte is read!
Take note, my lady, that your way
Lies backward to the Chatelet!
She shook her head and gazed awhile
At her cold hands with a rueful smile,

As though this thing had made her mad.

This was the parting that they had
Beside the haystack in the floods.

Another grimly moving poem, the Browningsque monologue called "The Judgement of God," supplies a second example of the same device.

Other noteworthy poems in the book are "The Little Tower," "The Wind," "The Eve of Crecy," "In Prison," and "The Blue Closet." All extremely original, they display a wide range in idea and theme. In their ability to make us understand the feelings of pain, terror, or heroic effort at particular moments in the lives of people, they all have a high psychological quality. For example, Guenevere's natural and horrible soliloquy, revealing that she has wondered how the fire would quiver yards above her head, in its startlingly true psychology improves upon the narrative of the original story. Especially in his use of monologue and dialogue, Morris successfully demonstrates that the poet can best revive the past not by detailed description of things but by faithful expression of the feelings of persons who lived long ago.

Without exaggeration, William Morris's Defence of Guenevere may be called an outstanding first volume of poetry. However, not unlike the early volumes of most poets, it did not make any particular impact upon the reading public when it appeared in 1858. This lack of widespread acclaim for the volume may have been a factor in Morris' withdrawing for some time from the writing of poetry. Another factor, of course, was his feeling that writing poetry was neither particularly notable nor difficult and that it had no precedence over the new and exciting experiments in tapestry-weaving and dyeing in which he was already engaged. Morris was content with the appreciation accorded the volume by a few of his friends, among them Burne-Jones and Dante Gabriel Rossetti—to the latter of whom it was dedicated.

DEFENCE OF POESIE

Author: Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586)

First published: 1595

Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesie is an attempt to raise poetry above the criticism that had been directed at it by contemporary critics and to establish it as the highest of the arts, best fitted both to please men and to instruct them, the two aims stated by Horace in his Ars Poetica. The first part of Defence of Poesie is primarily theoretical; Sidney weighs the respective merits of philosophy, history, and poetry as teachers of virtue. In the final section, he surveys the state of English literature soon after 1580.

Sidney's first argument for the supremacy of poetry, and by poetry he means all imaginative writing in both verse and prose, is that it was the "first light-giver to ignorance"; the first great works of science, philosophy, history, and even law were poems. Both the Italian and the English languages were polished and perfected by their poets, Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch on the one hand, Chaucer and Gower on the other. Even Plato illuminated his philosophy with myths and dramatic scenes.

Both the Hebrews and the Romans gave high distinction to poets, considering them prophets, messengers of God or the gods. The Greeks called their writers "makers," creators, who alone could rise above this world to make a "golden" one. Sidney writes of the poet: "So as he goeth hand in hand with Nature, not enclosed within the narrow warrant of her gifts, but freely ranging only within the zodiac of his own wit."

The aim of poetry, of all earthly knowledge, is "to lead and draw us to as high a perfection as our degenerate souls, made worse by their clayey lodgings, can be capable of." The moral philosopher feels himself the best teacher, for he can define and discuss virtue and vice and their causes; the historian argues that his examples from the past are far more effective instructors than the abstractions of the philosopher. Sidney finds the virtues of both combined in the poet, who can give both precept and example. He cites Homer's demonstration of wisdom personified in Ulysses; of valor, in Achilles; of anger, in Ajax. The poet is free to portray the ideal, while the historian must be faithful to his subjects, and they, being human, mingle faults with their virtues. The poet may show evil punished and good rewarded; the historian must record the vagaries of fortune, which allows the innocent to suffer and the vicious to prosper.

The poet has other advantages over the philosopher; however true his statements may be, they are hard to follow. The poet "doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet prospect into the way as will entice any man to enter into it." Men will willingly listen to stories of Aeneas or Achilles, unaware of the lessons they are learning.

Having established the superiority of poetry to his own satisfaction, Sidney analyzes both the pleasing and the instructive aspects of the various literary genres, trying to determine what faults can have brought poetry into disrepute. The pastoral can arouse sympathy for the wretchedness of the poor or illustrate civil wrongs in fables about sheep and wolves; satire makes man laugh at folly, and reform. Comedy, which has been disgraced by "naughty play-makers and stage-keepers," is valuable for the ridicule it casts upon our faults, making us scorn them as we laugh. Tragedy, stirring up feelings of wonder and pity, "teacheth the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations gilden roofs are builded."

Sidney finds nothing to criticize in the work of the lyric poet, who lauds virtuous acts, gives moral precepts, and sometimes praises God, and he defends epic poetry as the greatest of all the genres: "For, as the image of each action stirreth and instructeth the mind, so the lofty image of such worthies most inflameth the mind with desire to be worthy, and informs with counsel how to be worthy."

Concluding his defense, Sidney takes up the most frequently repeated criticisms of poetry, that it is merely rhyming and versifying, that there are other kinds of knowledge which are more worthy of men's time, that poetry is "the mother of lies," that it inspires evil lusts in men, and, finally, that Plato banished it from his commonwealth. Against the first objection Sidney reiterates his statement that poetry is not exclusively that which is written in verse, though he defends the use of verse on the grounds that it is a great aid to the memory and that it is "the only fit speech for music."

The second argument has already been answered; if poetry be the greatest of teachers and inspirations to virtue, it must be worthy of the greatest share of man's attention. To the contention that poets are liars, Sidney replies that since they never affirm their subjects to be literally true or "real," they cannot lie. They do not, indeed, reproduce details of life from specific incidents, but neither do they attempt to prove the false true. They rather call upon men's imagination for the "willing suspension of disbelief" and tell, not "what is or is not, but what should or should not be."

Sidney confesses that there is some justice in the condemnation of poetry for its scurrility, but he imputes the fault to bad poets who abuse their art, rather than to poetry itself. He suggests that Plato, in banishing poets from his Republic, was barring those bad writers who corrupted youth with false pictures of the gods, not the art of poetry itself.

Satisfied with these answers, Sidney then turns to the specific problems of literature in England in his own day. He sees no reason for poetry to flourish in Italy, France, Scotland, and not in his own nation, except the laziness of the poets themselves. They will neither study to acquire ideas nor practice to perfect a style for conveying these ideas. A few English writers and works are, however, worthy of a place in world literature. Sidney praises Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde, the "beautiful parts" of the Mirror for Magistrates, and the lyrics of the Earl of Surrey, and he finds that the Shepherd's Calendar "hath much poetry in his eclogues," though he objects to Spenser's use of "rustic language," on the grounds that neither Theocritus nor Virgil, the most famous classical writers of pastoral, employed it. For the rest of English poetry Sidney has only scorn, for it seemed to him meaningless: "One verse did but beget another, without ordering at the first what should be at the last; which becomes a confused mass of words, with a tinkling sound of rime, barely accompanied with reason."

The public criticism of drama seems to him justified, with a very few exceptions. He commends Gorboduc, a melodramatic Seneca-type tragedy, for its "stately speeches," "well-sounding phrases," and "notable morality," but he is disturbed by the authors' failure to observe the unities of time and place. The rest of the tragedies of the age seem absurd in their broad leaps in space and time, spanning continents and decades in two hours. A true Aristotelian in his views on drama, Sidney is convinced that stage action should be confined to one episode; other events may be reported in the dialogue to provide necessary background for the central events. He objects, too, to the presence of scurrilous comic scenes, chiefly designed to evoke loud laughter from the audience, in the tragedies.

Sidney's last target is the affected artificial diction of lyric poetry, especially of love poetry. He believes that the wildly imaginative conceits of the Euphuists are tedious, and he praises, in contrast, the sense of decorum, of fitting diction and imagery, of the great classical orators.

After a few comments on the relative merits of qualitative and quantitative verse and on types of rhyme, Sidney addresses his readers, promising fame and blessings to those who will appreciate the values of poetry and laying this curse on those who will not: "While you live you live in love, and never get favor, for lacking skill of a sonnet; and when you die, your memory die from the earth, for want of an epitaph."

The Defence of Poesie presents principles generally accepted by the critics throughout the Renaissance; the author leans heavily upon the dicta of the most noted classical critics, Aristotle, Plato, and Horace, and his standards are echoed by the major English critics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Dryden, Pope, and Johnson. Sidney's essay is one of the most polished and interesting pieces of Elizabethan prose, and his comments on the writing of his own time have been borne out by the judgment of the centuries. Although this work is the first major piece of English literary criticism, it has seldom been surpassed in the centuries since Sidney's death.

A DEFENCE OF POETRY

Type of work: Literary essay

Author: Percy Bysshe Shelley (1782-1822)

First published: 1840

In this essay Shelley is defending poetry—"my mistress, Urania"—against the attack by Thomas Love Peacock in "The Four Ages Of Poetry," published in the first and only number of the Literary Miscellany in 1820. The polemical exchange came to nothing for A Defence of Poetry remained unpublished until 1840. In his essay Peacock elaborated the familiar figure of the Golden and Silver Ages of classical poetry into four (Iron, Gold, Silver, and Brass), skipped over "the dark ages" and repeated the succession in English poetry. Peacock's point was that poetry never amounts to much in civilized society; Shelley's defense is that poetry is the essential man. Their views were antithetical and neither made contact with the other: Peacock's attack is a boisterous satire, Shelley's defense is an elevated prose poem.

Nevertheless, Peacock's article is still a necessary preface to Shelley's arguments, not because one prompted the other or because Shelley adopted Peacock's historical method in the middle section of his essay, but because as a pair they show clearly the opposing preferences of the older public for eighteenth century wit and of the younger for enthusiasm. Peacock's "Four Ages" has also the merit of amusing; Shelley is never amusing. Peacock's argument is that poetry belongs properly to primitive societies, that as they become civilized they become rational and nonpoetical; hence it was not until the late seventeenth century that England equaled in the work of Shakespeare and Milton the Golden Age of Homeric Greece. Early nineteenth century England seemed to him to have reached the Age of Brass in poetry but a kind of Golden Age in science; therefore, he argued, leave poetry to the primitive societies where it belongs. He is most amusing in his picture of the first Age of Iron, in which the bard of the tribal chief "is always ready to celebrate the strength of his arm, being first duly inspired by that of his liquor." Apart from Homer, Peacock respects no poet, not even Shakespeare who mixed his unities and thought nothing of "deposing a Roman Emperor by an Italian Count, and sending him off in the guise of a French pilgrim to be shot with a blunderbuss by an English archer." Peacock's jest turns sour as he tires of his figure, and his strictures on contemporary poetry become a diatribe of which the gist is that "a poet of our times is a semi-barbarian in a civilized community." Shelley, to whom Peacock sent a copy of his essay, was stirred to write his only prose statement on his craft. In it he came to the memorable conclusion that "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world."

A Defence of Poetry falls into three parts. First, Shelley presents an argument that all men are poets in some degree, for poetry is an innate faculty of Man; hence it is seen in all societies at all times and to eternity. In the second part he attempts the historical proof, which he abandons in the third to make a subjective and poetic affirmation of the perpetual presence and ennobling virtue of poetry. In presenting his beliefs, Shelley used the ideas that inspire his poems and attempted to codify them from the base Peacock had given him. But Peacock could begin at once with his first age; Shelley found it necessary to define at the outset his notion of poetry. Two major ideas run through this first section and are reflected in the rest of the essay: The Platonic idea of mimesis, in which the imagination responds to the eternal verities it glimpses behind the material form, and the eighteenth century idea of the "sympathetic imagination" which of its own initiative extends itself and assumes an empathy with external objects and beings. The first idea leads Shelley to assert the superiority of the poet as the most active in using the glimpses of truth and conveying them to lesser beings for their uplifting; for this reason the poet is the most powerful influence on mankind, a "legislator." The second idea gives the poet an insight into the ills of mankind which, once understood, can be corrected; here is the second meaning of "legislator."

with the expressive powers of poetry, which powers are part of the definition of poetry; the other two parts of the definition are contained in four paragraphs on the form of poetry, especially on its use of language, the medium which makes it superior to other art media and which is called "measured" in contradistinction to "unmeasured" language or prose. But the whole essay is prefaced by four paragraphs which define poetry in the largest or organic sense, not by its mechanics. These paragraphs go to the heart of the difference between Peacock and Shelley.

Shelley begins with a distinction between reason and imagination, leaving to the former the work of numbering, analyzing, and relating objects; the imagination perceives the similitude of objects in their innate values, not in their appearance, and synthesizes these values, presumably, into a valid and Platonic One or Truth. The synthetic principle of the imagination is poetry; Man is compared to "an Aeolian lyre," subject to impressions external and internal but possessing an inner principle (poetry) which produces not simply melody but harmony, not merely the sound of poetry but the potential of the poetic product to harmonize Man or bring him closer to the poetry of being. Poetry is thus both the name of a form of language (measured) and of the power of producing it and benefiting from the poem. Here Shelley announces that poets are "the institutors of laws, and the founders of civil society" because they discover the laws of harmony and become "legislators" by giving these laws the form of a poem. The poetic product or poem may be an act of mimesis, but the act proceeds from the poetic faculty highly developed in the poet and contained in all men: "A poem is the very image of life expressed in its eternal truth."

The argument in the second section of the first part, devoted to the effects of poetry on society, has been anticipated in the foregoing analysis. A Defence of Poetry, as an "apologia," could well end at that point but Shelley wanted to convince Peacock that his theory has external evidence. This he offers in the second part of the essay.

The historical method had already been touched on in Shelley's example of the propensity of the savage or child to imitate the impressions it receives, like a "lyre" producing melody only. Shelley's reading of history is as willful as Peacock's in his assertion that the morality of an age corresponds to the goodness or badness of its poetry; he adduces Greek classical drama as an evidence of a healthy society and Hellenic bucolic poetry as a sign of decay when the poets ceased to be the acknowledged legislators of the Alexandrian Hellenes. In order to cope with the same progression of health and decay in the literature of Rome, which would seem to prove Peacock's scheme, Shelley shifts the whole cycle into "episodes of that cyclic poem written by time upon the memories of men." He encounters further difficulty in coping with Christianity, for by Shelley's theory Jesus must be a great poet: "The scattered fragments preserved to us by the biographers of this extraordinary person, are all instinct with the most vivid poetry." But something went wrong in the Dark Ages: ". . . the extinction of the poetic principle . . . from causes too intricate to be here discussed." Shelley feels safer with Dante and Milton: "But let us not be betrayed from a defence into a critical history of poetry. . . ."

After abandoning the historical method which, had he followed Peacock step by step, would have brought him up to his contemporaries, Shelley returns to his defence by attacking "the promoters of utility" and, by implication, Peacock. To the utilitarian objection that poetry simply produces pleasure and that pleasure is profitless, Shelley asserts that the pleasure of poetry lies not in its superficial melody but in its innate harmony, alone capable of checking "the calculating faculty" which has already produced

"more scientific and economical knowledge than can be accommodated to the just distribution of the produce which it multiplies." Shelley follows this with a paragraph which summarizes the duality of the "poetic faculty"; by synthesis it "creates new materials of knowledge and power and pleasure," and by its expressive powers it reproduces those materials "according to a certain rhythm and order which may be called the beautiful and the good."

Shelley's peroration, his personal and poetic justification for poetry, opens with three paragraphs beginning: "Poetry is indeed something divine." "Poetry is the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds." "Poetry turns all things to loveliness. . . ." This is the moving genius of Adonais. Searching for the best proof to defend poetry from the rationalizations of Peacock, Shelley followed the prompting of his own "poetic principle" in concluding A Defence of Poetry with a sustained lyric in prose that Peacock could never match. The power of this essay is still inspiring. It constitutes Shelley's best claim outside his verse to be a "legislator" to the world.

DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA

Type of work: Essays in political science

Author: Alexis de Tocqueville (1805-1859)

First published: Volume I, 1835; Volume II, 1840

Alexis de Tocqueville lived in a time of enormous political change, when every conceivable variety of political theory flourished. He was born shortly after the French Revolution had turned itself into the Empire, and in his lifetime occurred those further changes which transformed France, at least nominally, into a Republic. His object in writing Democracy in America was twofold: to write about the new nation that he so much admired and to establish a new way of examining ideas of politics. Instead of proceeding from ideas of right and responsibility, de Tocqueville preferred to begin by analyzing social institutions as they functioned in reality. Instead of working, as Rousseau had worked, from an arbitrary picture of the beginnings of humanity in a "natural" condition, de Tocqueville preferred to work from what was statistically observable. Thus, Democracy in America begins with a picture of the geography of the new continent, its weather, its indigenous tribes, its economy, and its natural resources. In this respect Democracy in America is the forerunner of the scientific spirit in the investigation of social structures.

Much of Democracy in America is concerned with institutions, and the first of these described by its author is that of the partition of property. He points out that it is customary in the nations of Europe to divide property by the laws of primogeniture. The result is that property remains fixed in extent and in possession; the family, no matter how changed in each generation, is linked to the wealth and political power of landed property. The family represents the estate, the estate the family, and naturally a strong inequality is carried from one generation to another. The foundations of American culture are to be found, de Tocqueville points out, in the equal partition of land and fortune. Land is continually broken up into parcels, sold, developed, and transformed. The accompanying wealth and power is much more fluid than in societies in which descent really dominates fortune. The subsidiary effect of equal partition is the access of careers to men who might in another system be blocked from advancement.

De Tocqueville was fascinated by the practice of equality, a phenomenon rarely encountered in France during his lifetime. His next series of chapters concerns political equality; he is one of the first great commentators on the democracy of the township and corporation in early nineteenth century America. He emphasizes that it is fundamental to understand the nature of the township, particularly in its New England tradition. The key to the nature of the American nation, he finds, is the wide and responsible nature of freedom at the level of municipal government. This gives the citizen direct voice in his government and trains him for the representative democracy of the Federal government. De Tocqueville points out that under this form of government power is actually concentrated in the hands of the voter; the legislative and executive branches have no power of their own, but merely represent those who appoint them. To us this fact is commonplace, but it was a new idea for the citizens of Europe.

Although much of this work is in praise of American democracy, de Tocqueville makes some important qualifications. His first principle is that abuse in government occurs when one special interest is served to the exclusion of all others. This kind of abuse, he remarks, formerly occurred when the upper classes imposed their will on the lower, when the military, or feudal, or financial, or even religious values operate to the exclusion of all others. His great qualification of democracy is that in this form of government a kind of tyranny is also possible, that of the majority. He states that it is conceivable that the free institutions of America may be destroyed by forcing all minorities to give up their freedoms for what is supposedly the good of the majority. In that case, he concludes, democracy will give way first to despotism and then to anarchy. Above all things de Tocqueville is taken with equality, and that principle, regardless of the greatest good for the greatest number, is what animates his opinion.

Democracy in America is of course principally about its great subject, but there are in it many reminders of a larger view that its author has. One constant theme of the book is that the Old World must learn from the New; in fact, the book functions not so much as an independent study of a unique phenomenon as a study of comparative political science. We will not succeed in France, the author remarks, if we do not succeed in introducing democratic institutions. There will be independence for none, he adds, unless, like the American republic, we grant independence for all. With uncommon clarity he predicts the totalitarian potentialities of the twentieth century, where unlimited power restricts itself not to a class, but first to a party, and then to a single man. The famous ending of the first volume carries this insight to a more elaborate and specific culmination. There are two nations, de Tocqueville says, which will probably dominate the next century, the United States and Russia. One, he says, is driven by the desire for power and war, the other by the desire to increase domestic prosperity. He predicts that there will be no peace until the aggressiveness of Russia is checked by the peacefulness of the United States: in his own words, he looks to a future in which the principle of "servitude" will encounter that of "freedom."

The second volume of Democracy in America was published after a lapse of five years. The first volume had established its author as one of the best political thinkers in Europe. It won for him not only the esteem of the best minds of the Continent, but rewards financial and even political, so that from the time of its publication de Tocqueville was to take an active part as a member of the French government. The second volume is concerned not with the basic economic and social characteristics of America, but with subsidiary questions about the nature of American culture. He asks, for example, how Americans cultivate the arts and whether or not eloquence is to be encountered in the rhetoric of Congress. He covers the progress of science as well as that of poetry, the position of religious minorities, even the meaning of public monuments in a democracy. His general conclusion on the arts in America is that they do not flourish as they do in other political climates, for the arts require an atmosphere of privilege and an amount of money that a tax-conscious public is quite unlikely to spend. The "useful," he says, is much preferred in a democracy to the "beautiful." The artist becomes an artisan and, the author remarks with some delicacy, he tends to produce "imperfect commodities" rather than lasting works of art.

If these qualifications are admitted they are also weighted; de Tocqueville believes that a lowering of some standards is amply compensated by a heightening of others. Particularly in the matter of foreign policy does he admire the republican sense as well as form of government. Toward the end of Democracy in America he spends much thought on the inclinations toward war and peace of different forms of government. The democratic form, he judges, is predisposed to peace because of various influences: the rapid growth of personal wealth; the stake in property; the less material but equally important "gentleness of heart" which allows the citizens of a democracy a more humane view of life. Yet, when the democratic government is involved in war, the same application of ambition and energy that is so marked in commercial life results often in military success as well. De Tocqueville's last thoughts about the democracy and its army deal with the danger to any society from its own standing army, and he covers substantially the same ground on this matter as do the authors of the Federalist papers.

Democracy in America ends with the restatement that despotism may be encountered even in republics. While democracies can, the author admits, on occasion be violent and unjust, he believes that these occasions are exceptional. They will be more and more frequent, however, in proportion, as equality is allowed to lapse. Among the last of de Tocqueville's animated descriptions is that of the "flock of timid and industrious animals" who have given up their individuality to a strong central government. He urges a balance between central and decentralized power, the constant consciousness of equality for all members of the polity.

DEMOCRATIC VISTAS

Type of work: Social and literary criticism

Author: Walt Whitman (1819-1892)

First published: 1871

Written when Whitman was in his early fifties, Democratic Vistas demonstrates the author's discouragement at what he saw in America. The sobering effects of the Civil War, the death of Lincoln, and the overwhelming change resulting from the industrial revolution are quite evident as Whitman attempts to introduce a plan for the development of a golden age in the New World.

Like Whitman's poetry, the work has no substantial organization. It is usually repetitious and rambling. Nevertheless, in its portrait of Whitman's philosophy, and in its analysis of the potentiality of the American society, Democratic Vistas is extremely significant. Its criticism of American politics, culture, and values in general was partly the result of the disillusionment that existed after the Civil War, but the considerations are still quite applicable to American society.

Simply stated, the thesis of Democratic Vistas is that while America is surpassing all other nations industrially and has the material facilities to continue its advancement, it lacks a distinct culture or spiritual identity. According to Whitman, such an identity could only come about through works of literature written in new literary styles by new artists. In effect, he is stating that America has the human resources, the material resources, and the sound political structure to make itself the most ideal society which has ever existed. As Whitman views the American scene, however, he sees no unique values, no real expression of these new concepts, but only a materialistic society relying on old ideas and traditional expression. Thus, the overall result of the work is a plea for great literary works which would serve as a foundation for a new society.

Though the work has no organization other than the repetition of this same theme, Whitman's approach follows four general divisions: a portrait of the American society and its values; a statement of the basic principles and ideals which represent the goals of the "mass, or lump character" of America; the principle of the individual as the focal point for the ideal society; and great literature as the force which will bring about this society.

Whitman begins by stating his central theme—that America will never be great unless it is able to separate itself from the Old World tradition:

I say that democracy can never prove itself beyond cavil, until it founds and luxuriantly grows its own forms of art, poems, schools, theology, displacing all that exists, or that has been produced anywhere in the past, under opposite influences.

Whitman further states that America is a new experiment founded on new principles and cannot rely on old ideas. While some might argue that the "republic is, in performance, really enacting today the grandest arts, poems, etc., by beating up the wilderness into fertile farms, and in her railroads, ships, machinery, etc.," Whitman responds that "society, in these States, is canker'd, crude, superstitious and rotten":

The official services of America, national, state, and municipal, in all their branches and departments, except the judiciary, are saturated in corruption, bribery, falsehood, maladministration; and the judiciary is tainted.

After dwelling on the "lamentable conditions" which exist in America, Whitman states that the answer to such a problem is a "new-founded literature" which would be "consistent with science, handling the elements and forces with competent power, teaching and training men."

Having thus established the tone of his essay, Whitman proceeds to the first main consideration, an analysis of the present American society. His portrait of the "lump character" shows that the artist has, in the past, had to struggle against the masses. He also shows that the reverse has been true, for literature "has never recognized the People." It is Whitman's belief that America is experiencing the birth of a new sort of mass personality which is courageous, all-inclusive, and potentially great. To deny cultural identity to this mass would be to destroy this potentiality.

We believe the ulterior object of political and all other government, (having, of course, provided for the police, the safety of life, property, and for the basic statute and common law, and their administration, always first in order), to be among the rest, not merely to rule, to repress disorder, etc., but to develop, to open up to cultivation, to encourage the possibilities of all beneficent and manly outcroppage, and of that aspiration for independence, and the pride and self-respect latent in all characters.

In other words, Whitman believed that physical freedom is only part of America's goal. The society as a whole can progress only when it possesses a cultural freedom and a set of ideals which will enable the people to attain a transcendent spirituality. Still, the law and the political form are important to Whitman, for it is only in this governmental structure that men of all races and backgrounds can be brought together. Whitman even sees in the future a greater prosperity of the masses and a tremendous physical growth: "The true gravitational hold of liberalism in the United States will be a more universal ownership of property, general homesteads, general comfort—a vast, intertwining reticulation of wealth."

According to Whitman, this wealth, plus a genuine solidarity of mass spirit and integrity, will make this system survive. Two examples which he gives to prove this point are that "the land which could raise such as the late rebellion, could also put it down," and that the fervor of the Americans is also evident in the interest which they show in the election of their leaders: "I know nothing grander, better exercise, better digestion, more positive proof of the past, the triumphant result of faith in human kind, than a well-contested American national election."

Having discussed the quality of America's political system and the character of its people, Whitman then turns to the individual, for "rich, luxuriant, varied personalism," argues Whitman, is the key to civilization. All else, such as literature or government, is important only insofar as it assists in the "production of perfect characters among the people." It was Whitman's belief that this principle is the basis for America's future.

Whitman defines individuality as creativity, that independent thought by which each person is able to transcend the mass, and he states that it is precisely this quality that Americans lack. He attributes this failure to an attachment to "Culture," or traditional learning. The scholar, for example, is taught what to believe, and consequently believes in nothing. Rather than serving to motivate creativity, this type of culture only systematizes and stagnates individuality.

It is not that Whitman objected to culture. But he believed that instead of being limited to the "parlors or lecture rooms," it should be distributed among all people of all classes. In short, the masses should be given the opportunity to achieve identity. We have indeed developed people who are physically strong and educated, says Whitman, but the "gloomiest consequences" will result if people are left with an "unsophisticated Conscience."

The third and final section of the essay is devoted to the power which would enable the development of this "primary moral element," a great American literature:

A boundless field to fill! A new creation, with needed orbic works launch'd forth, to revolve in free and lawful circuits—to move, self-poised, through the ether, and shine like heaven's own suns! With such, and nothing less, we suggest that New World Literature, fit to rise upon, cohere, and finalize in time, these States.

By "New World Literature" Whitman does not mean quantity; we have, he states, more publications than any other country. Rather, he is referring to literary forms which would represent America as the Bible, the works of Homer, Plato, and Aeschylus represent their respective civilizations. Nor should we resort to the achievements of the past, for these works were written for remote times and problems.

Ye powerful and resplendent ones! ye were, in your atmospheres, grown not for America, but rather for her foes, the feudal and the old—while our genius is democratic and modern.

Whitman summarizes what has thus far been accomplished by describing the stages of development in American writing. He states that America has gone through two stages in preparation for a third and final stage, without which the first two become useless: "The First stage was the planning and putting on record the political foundation rights of immense masses of people. . . . The Secand stage relates to material prosperity, wealth, produce. . . ."

The third and final stage will be "a native expression-spirit," "a sublime and serious Religious Democracy sternly taking command." This spirit of impetus can come from no other land, because the foundations for this literature exist only in America.

The artist who will produce this literature will be a student of nature. "Part of the test of a great literatus," says Whitman, "shall be the absence in him of the idea of the covert, the lurid, the maleficent, the devil, . . . hell, natural depravity, and the like." More important, however, will be his faith, his simplicity of statement, and his "adherence to natural standards."

Whitman is no less explicit in his description of the themes of these great works. He says that "Nature, true Nature, and the true idea of Nature, long absent, must, above all, become fully restored, enlarged, and must furnish the pervading atmosphere to poems, and the test of all high literary and aesthetic compositions."

Here Whitman is not referring to the "posyes and nightingales of the English poets," but to the spiritual significance, symbolic and implicit, in the unity of all created matter. By means of this expression all men will be able to understand the essential harmony in the universe and thus regain their faith which has been "scared away by science."

Exactly how the artist will go about this process is not really made clear; but Whitman does say that a whole new idea of composition must be the means. In any case, he assures us that we cannot rest on what has already been accomplished; our hope is in the future.

The final tone of Whitman's essay is one which pervades the whole work; he is desperate and is trying to convince the reader that he should also be concerned. Earlier in his career Whitman had thought that great American literature was on the verge of being created. At the writing of Democratic Vistas he saw that what he dreamed of had not occurred, and he attempted to motivate the potential philosopher-artists through this essay. The result is that when he has not obscured his message with too many words, he has given an excellent critique of American society which is as significant now as it was in Whitman's day.

THE DEMON: AN EASTERN TALE

Author: Mikhail Yurievich Lermontov (1814-1841)

First published: 1841

The biographical approach to literature explains the work of a writer by relating the events of his life to a study of his art and style. The problem thus created is that often such an approach assumes a principle of determinism which obscures the less superficial and more significant aspects of the work. The biographer finds in the early life of the artist the beginnings of an inevitable development and the causes of all his preoccupations, and he becomes a sort of prophet after the event. In the case of Mikhail Lermontov, however, there exists a curious and solid relationship between biography and work that calls for close inspection.

Lermontov is considered to be the outstanding representative of Russian romanticism. From 1826 to 1834 he admittedly imitated Byron, but at the same time this imitation was more than a pose for him. In a poem of 1832 he wrote: "No I am not like Byron, like him I am a persecuted wanderer, but mine is a Russian soul. . . . I began earlier, and earlier I shall end. . . . Who will communicate my thoughts to the world? Either myself, or God, or nobody." Lermontov was admittedly egoistic, but he himself saw his narcissism as a misfortune and as a self-destructive element in his personality. He felt that the poet is made for suffering in a world where angelic and demonic principles constantly war with each other. Lermontov's long verse-narrative, The Demon, illustrates his feeling of the always-present contradiction of good and evil. Unlike Byron, he often described "glimpses of perfection" or "a state of bliss," and in The Demon he gave full rein to his ambivalent nature, to his preoccupation with evil along with a sincere though ineffectual craving for what is good. The reasons behind this juxtaposition of seemingly contradictory ideas reveal the poem to be one of Lermontov's most personal creations.

Lermontov wrote the first draft of The Demon when he was only fifteen. He reworked the theme in 1830 and 1833, and again in 1838 after being exiled to the Caucasus for his eulogistic poem to Pushkin. The Demon was finally completed, after work on several more drafts, shortly before his death in 1841. The constant revisions show that Lermontov was intensely preoccupied with the ideas of the poem and desired to express them with precision. The poem was extensively reworked at least eight times, but the final variant still retained some of the original lines of 1829.

While Lermontov was working on the first draft, he also wrote a short lyric called "My Demon." It has been said that he wrote this poem in imitation of a verse by Pushkin with the same title. Whether this claim is true or not, Lermontov did express an attitude entirely his own. Instead of denouncing the spirit of negation as Pushkin had done, Lermontov was attracted to "the sinister collection of evils." His demon was at first a fierce being: "He scorns pure love; he rejects all prayers; he beholds blood indifferently." Two years later he is less forbidding and violent. He has become more intimately bound to life, and in a sense he is a more direct representation of Lermontov himself. "The proud demon will not depart, as long as I live, from me." The dark side of the poet's personality taunts him with images of bliss and purity, but they are wholly unattainable.

The 1838 variant of The Demon replaces the previous indefinite locale with an exotic Caucasian setting. In his childhood Lermontov had twice been to the Caucasus, and doubtless the mountains and the strange customs and folklore of the region made a strong impression on him. The critic Janko Lavrin has said that Lermontov's poetic gift began to develop early and was fostered by two circumstances, one of which was his visits to the Caucasus. Lermontov was indeed impressed by the mountains, as is evidenced by his repeated descriptions of them in his verse.

The heroine of the early versions had been an anonymous nun, but in the 1838 version she is a passionate Georgian princess named Tamara. It is believed that Lermontov used as the basis for this element an Ossetian folktale about a mountain demon in love with a beautiful mortal maiden. Perhaps he was also influenced by Byron's Cain and Heaven and Earth, Thomas Moore's Love of the Angels, or Alfred de Vigny's Eloa. In any case, the final variant of The Demon is Lermontov's alone. He took a theme which other writers had used and related it to himself. In the dedication to the second draft Lermontov personalized his idea; "Like my cold and cruel Demon, I enjoyed doing evil in this world; deceit was not new to me, and my heart was full of poison. But now, like that gloomy Genius, I have been reborn through your presence for innocent delights, for hope and freedom."

Lermontov's Demon is, characteristically enough, a former angel who has rebelled against God. Despite his pride in his independence, he still remembers his former bliss. After he sees the beautiful Tamara, he begins to think his love for her might reconcile him to life and to God, "In Paradise again I'd shine, like a new angel in new splendor." Tamara cannot resist his impassioned words, but as soon as they kiss, she dies and her soul is taken by God. The Demon is left alone, doomed to dwell in the same void until the end of time. Whereas Tamara redeemed her sin by death, the Demon is incapable of sacrifice. Lermontov's personal Demon is more human than a Satan or a Mephistopheles. He is ruled by appetite, passion, and cold self-absorption.

Although Lermontov expressed in this poem his own isolation and deracination, the poem remains artificial when judged by modern standards. The theme is vague and contrived; the critic D. S. Mirsky finds significance in the fact that it became the libretto for a theatrical opera by Anton Rubenstein. The Demon was censored during the reign of Nicholas I for being "anti-religious." It was, however, circulated privately and by the second half of the nineteenth century was one of the most popular poems in Russia. The lyrical, musical quality of the poem made it especially popular. Many poets, among them Blok, Gorky, and Pasternak, have recognized it as a source of inspiration.

Perhaps it is difficult to take the theme of The Demon seriously. But even if we do not, the poem remains a powerful psychological document. It speaks of man as an exile who, after rejecting human society, still longs to be a part of it. The critic R. Poggioli has said that The Demon is simply a monologue which the poet utters through the undramatic protagonists. Accordingly, the instrument Lermontov uses in The Demon is the confession device employed simply and directly, revealing a true image of himself and his life, mirroring his guilt and shame, and becoming the source of repentance as well as hope. In other words, The Demon attempted to reconcile the angelic and demonic elements which were aspects of the poet's view of himself. Undeniably, The Demon was a very personal poem. Yet it speaks of emotion and attitude on an unrealistic level. It was not until Lermontov wrote his most outstanding work, the novel titled A Hero of Our Time, that he was able to transfer his personal complexity and contradiction to a romantic but realistically conceived tale. The protagonist of his great work of fiction is no longer a demon but a very earthy soldier. He is bitter and cynical toward life, and he, like Pushkin's Eugene Onegin, is an example of the superfluous man. The place Lermontov's Demon had as a forerunner of this idea is obvious. Despite the tendency to discount The Demon as a significant work today, it is essential to an understanding of Lermontov and perhaps even more to an understanding of the evolution of his art.

DESCENT INTO HELL

Author: Charles Williams (1886-1945)

Time: June and July, in the 1930's

Locale: Battle Hill, a residential area near London

First published: 1937

Principal characters:

PAULINE ANSTRUTHER, an orphaned girl in her twenties

MARGARET ANSTRUTHER, her grandmother

PETER STANHOPE, an eminent poet

LAWRENCE WENTWORTH, a military historian

ADELA HUNT, an aspiring actress

HUGH PRESCOTT, her suitor

MRS. LILY SAMMILE, a neighbor

MRS. PARRY, a civic leader engaged in directing a play

The events of this novel are on two planes which intersect at so many points that the ordinary barriers between the natural and supernatural worlds disappear. On the realistic plane of activities in the suburb of Battle Hill, the narrative concerns the production of a verse drama written by Peter Stanhope, an eminent poet and inhabitant of the Manor House, which had belonged to his family before the housing estate was built. A group of his neighbors, under the leadership of the capable Mrs. Parry, have the privilege of performing his new play in his garden, but only one of them, Pauline Anstruther, even remotely grasps the spiritual significance of his pastoral fantasy. Pauline's sensibility is so quickened by the nuances of his verse that she confides to him the terror which has haunted her for years: the recurrent appearance of her doppelgänger.

Peter Stanhope explains to her the principle of substitution which was fundamental in Charles Williams's thought: one person through love can take over and bear the burden of another so that the sufferer is relieved. When Pauline is willing to accept his offer to bear her burden, she discovers that she is no longer tortured by her own problem; instead, she is given the opportunity to bear someone else's burden of fear. Her growth in grace is the principal subject of the novel.

As the rehearsals for the play proceed, Pauline's role as leader of the chorus is paralleled by her role in the supernatural drama which takes place concurrently in Battle Hill. The spiritual energy released through the play sets in motion a series of events which transcend ordinary time, affecting a number of other inhabitants of the suburb. The housing estate built in the 1920's had taken its name from the hill, which had been a scene of battle from the time of the ancient Britons to the period of the Tudors. While the estate was being built, the timeless "magnetism of death," still alive on the Hill, as the suburb was usually called, had touched a despairing unskilled laborer, who had hanged himself on the scaffolding of an unfinished house. His unresting spirit still inhabits the area, unrecognized by the occupier of the finished house, Lawrence Wentworth, a noted military historian and adviser to the producer of the play. As a middle-aged bachelor Wentworth has developed a secret passion for pretty, conceited Adela Hunt, who is both the heroine in the play and the girl friend in ordinary life of the leading man, Hugh Prescott. Wentworth's jealousy is so consuming that he is destroying himself as surely as the suicide did. Also dying is Pauline's grandmother, Margaret Anstruther, but her death is the natural fulfillment of a well-spent life. Shortly before she dies, she is visited by an unpleasantly ingratiating and vaguely sinister neighbor, Mrs. Lily Sammile, who appears unexpectedly at several crises in the novel. Each of these characters is involved in the action of which Pauline is the protagonist.

The plot is comprehensible only in terms of the theme: the triumph of love over death. Pauline's love for her grandmother has been dutiful but detached during the years since her parents' death when she has lived in Mrs. Anstruther's house as dependent and companion. It is not until Stanhope has relieved her of her fear that Pauline can talk to her grandmother about it and appreciate the depth of the old woman's love. Mrs. Anstruther initiates Pauline further into the doctrine of substituted love by explaining that she may be called upon to bear the pain of their ancestor, John Struther, whose martyrdom by fire is well-known as family history.

As the dying woman approaches the limits of mortality, she can see the face of the suicide as he looks into her window during his ceaseless wandering, and soon she tells Pauline that the girl must go out in the middle of the night because someone needs her near Mr. Wentworth's. The nurse thinks the patient's mind is wandering, but Pauline knows that she must go. She discovers she no longer fears the dark, and she sees the dead man in ordinary mortal form. He asks the way to London, gently refuses her offer to pay his fare, and sets off to walk to the city. As she watches him, his form is transmuted into the agonized body of her ancestor, and she is given the opportunity of bearing his burden by enduring the fire in a mystical experience of very real pain. All this happens during the night between the dress rehearsal and the performance of the play. Mrs. Anstruther dies five minutes after Pauline gets home, but the death does not keep her from acting in the play as the producer had feared: Love has given Pauline a new perspective on time and mortality.

As a counterpoint to Pauline's experience throughout the novel, Lawrence Wentworth's love operates negatively because it is focused on himself. His passion is for his idea of Adela Hunt rather than for the real person, and his jealousy of Hugh Prescott is so powerful that it creates a tangible image of the girl who, he imagines, visits him with increasing frequency and becomes his mistress. In the bedroom where the suicide hanged himself, Wentworth's reason is destroyed by his fantasies of false love. The crisis of his descent into hell is reached on the day of the dress rehearsal, when Mrs. Parry consults him as a military historian on a detail in the costumes of the guards. Wentworth knows that they are wrong and that he could arrange for them to be altered; but he is so preoccupied with his erotic experience that he cannot be bothered and tells a lie instead of the truth. This sacrifice of the historian's integrity confirms the loss of his soul. The next day his seat at the play is empty.

On the afternoon of the performance there is an unnatural stillness in the atmosphere, like the calm before a storm. Some of the cast complain of the heat, but the play proceeds successfully and the only disturbance is Mrs. Sammille's fainting at the end. After that a number of residents of the Hill feel unwell, but life proceeds normally. Margaret Anstruther is buried. Pauline makes plans to move into London and take a job.

A few days after the funeral Adela and Hugh are walking and carrying on a mild argument which reveals the difference between them: Hugh's love for Adela is consistent with his habit of seeing life clearly, while Adela's love for him is an aspect of her desire to manipulate others. As their walk takes them near the cemetery they meet Mrs. Sammille. While they are talking to her, they become transfixed by the sight of the graves opening. Mrs. Sammille shrieks and disappears into a small shed at the edge of the cemetery. Adela screams and starts running, pursued by Hugh shouting that the illusion was caused by the wind blowing up loose earth on the graves. His mind clears rapidly, and just as quickly his love fades, so that he gives up the pursuit.

Adela's wild flight leads her instinctively to the house of the man who she knows idolizes her, but when she looks through the window she too sees the image of herself which his diseased imagination has created, and she collapses in terror. Found by a policeman and taken home, she awakens delirious with the impression that she has forgotten her part in the play, a key passage about perception and love. When Pauline calls to see her, Adela insists that Pauline must find Mrs. Sammille in the shed by the cemetery, to give her Adela's part, and thus make her well. Pauline, sensing that Lily Sammille is in fact Lilith, the image of false love, tries to offer Adela her own help in recovering her part, but she finds that only by promising to look for the old woman can she ease the tortured spirit.

The climax of love's triumph over death in the novel comes when Pauline goes, as she went out into the night at the request of her dying grandmother, to confront Lily Sammille in the cemetery shed. Recognizing her as the illusion rather than the reality of love, Pauline rejects her promises of rewards with a laugh of such pure contented joy that Lilith and her murky retreat dissolve into the dust and rubble of an old unused shed that has collapsed from her strong push on the door. In attempting to bear Adela's burden, Pauline has thus found the completion of her own part in the drama of Battle Hill and is ready to leave for London. Seen off on the train by Stanhope, who says his own role is to comfort the many people in the community who are ill, she looks forward with joy to her new life in the city. Lawrence Wentworth travels on the same train but refuses her company and goes in a daze to a historian's dinner at which his lifelong historical rival is honored and he himself sinks into complete insensibility.

The surrealistic effect of supernatural events taking place in a natural setting is the keynote of Charles Williams' narrative treatment of spiritual experience. Ordinary life is revealed as an image of a deeper reality. The play in which all the characters are involved becomes an image of life itself in which each person must perfect his own role in harmony with others. The setting of Battle Hill suggests the hill of Golgotha, and Lily Sammille's lair is revealed to Pauline as an aspect of Gomorrah. For Wentworth the journey into the city becomes the way to Gomorrah; but Pauline's destination is the eternal City. She tells Stanhope that it seems funny to be discussing the times of trains to the new Jerusalem, but for the poet the interdependence of the temporal and the eternal is fully assimilated fact.

The characterization, like the plot, is determined by the theme. Only Pauline Anstruther and Lawrence Wentworth, who experience salvation and damnation respectively, are fully delineated. The other characters are sketched in with just enough detail to give them substance as examples of different aspects of love. Stanhope and Mrs. Anstruther are seen only in relation to Pauline, Adela Hunt primarily in contrast to Pauline, and Hugh Prescott in contrast to Wentworth. Williams never falls into the error often attributed to Milton and others of making his diabolical characters more attractive than the good ones. Mrs. Sammille is described with a few telling details which make her seem real, slightly pathetic, and obscurely repulsive. Peter Stanhope, in contrast, expresses his sanctity through an easy kindness and sense of humor. The essence of goodness is seen as a quality of joy which permeates the lives of those who accept it in love. This joy is reflected not only in the characters but in the style, taking the form of wry humor in the descriptions of the play rehearsals and almost poetic rhapsody in the passages of mystical experience. The great variety in style and mood emphasizes Williams's conviction, exemplified in the plot, that reality in human life exists in multiple planes of time and space.

THE DESCENT OF MAN, AND SELECTION IN RELATION TO SEX

Type of work: Biological study
Author: Charles Darwin (1809-1882)
First published: 1871

Although The Descent of Man, and Selection in Relation to Sex has been condemned by intelligent men as little more than sophisticated drivel, most of Darwin's critics consider it to stand second only to On the Origin of Species. Problems beset Darwin when he turned from his brilliant biological study of 1859 to the more particular analysis of the relation of man to the natural world. These problems are immediately seen in the organization of this long argument: well over two-thirds of the book is a digression, exhaustive and often exhausting, on sexual selection. The book lacks the inspiration of On the Origin of Species, but in its summary and evaluation of the anthropological thought after the publication of that earlier masterpiece The Descent of Man is one of the most important books of the nineteenth century.

In his introduction Darwin says that he plans to consider three things: whether man descended from some pre-existing form, how he developed if indeed he did descend, and what value the differences between races have to such a development. He draws evidence of the descent of man from his vast knowledge of medicine and biology. That man shares bodily structure, embryonic development, and rudimentary organs with other mammals seems to him to be evidence enough for asserting a common ancestry. Since anthropologists and paleontologists had not at that time discovered significant relics of prehistoric man, Darwin's affirmation of the descent of man was based on logic alone; thus he amasses an almost overwhelming number of analogies to strengthen his case. These analogies enable him to trace the development of man from lower animals, but in order to do so he must assume a definition of man. Darwin maintains that man's uniqueness is not due to any one characteristic but to a combination of many: upright position, acquisition of language and tools, a delicate and free hand, and superior mental powers. In the possession of these traits man is different only in degree. In fact, Darwin musters evidence to show that animals have curiosity, imagination, attention, and reason, attributes that earlier philosophers thought set man apart from the rest of the animal world.

Writing as a biologist, not a moral philosopher or a theologian, Darwin does not try to consider all the implications of his theory. The single attribute that separates man from the rest of the animal world, Darwin thinks, is moral sense. But moral sense, the offspring of conscience, was the result of an evolutionary process; conscience came to early man from a struggle between duty (sympathy and the social instincts) and desire (the urge for complete freedom). The belief in God also evolved, originating in dreams and developing through "spiritual agencies" into gods. It was this application, a logical outcome of Darwin's theories, that horrified both conservative Christians and idealistic philosophers, for the theory completely eliminated the validity of revelation or of supramundane enlightenment.

Darwin, well aware of the implications of his theory, concentrates on the rise of civilization from savagery. Natural selection and the struggle for survival advanced the intellectual powers so that the history of human institutions is the history of the evolution of the intelligence of man. As tribes grew stronger, the members learned to perceive the consequences of their actions, thereby developing moral sense. Then, as man became more and more aware of his moral sense, advanced civilizations with sophisticated religions and technologies were able to develop.

This discussion of the rise of civilization brings Darwin to the differences between races. Because individual members of different races can be mated so as to form fertile offspring and because the similarities between races far outnumber the differences, Darwin assumes that races are "sub-breeds" of the species. Furthermore, Darwin discards the hypotheses that each race descended from a primal pair, that the racial differences were caused by the conditions of life, and that the races evolved independently. The only theory that can explain the differences between races is sexual selection. The question of sexual selection, necessary to prove his assumption about race, leads Darwin into the digression that fills two-thirds of his book.

In On the Origin of Species, Darwin had based his theory of evolution primarily on natural selection or the struggle for survival. In other words, a slight modification in an animal's structure might allow it to survive whereas another animal that lacked this modification would die.

Existence, then, is a continual warfare in which the animal with the slight advantage always wins. In The Descent of Man Darwin considerably modifies his view of nature by analyzing sexual selection, a different kind of biological warfare. When animals have their sexes separated, the male and female organs of reproduction differ; these are primary sexual characters. But there are other differences not directly connected with the act of reproduction, and these are secondary sexual characters. Usually the males have the most pronounced secondary sexual characters (for example, the brilliant plumage of many male birds); the males acquired these characters not from being better fitted for existence (natural selection) but from having gained advantage over other males and having transmitted their advantages to male offspring. There are usually more males than females, so that there is a struggle between males for the possession of the female; hence the female has the opportunity of selecting one out of several males. The strongest females would have first choice among the males; therefore, the secondary sexual characters that pass through the strongest male and female would have the most chance of outnumbering those characters that pass through weaker partners. In this way, the dominant characters are also the strongest. The more active the rivalry between the males, the more pronounced will be the variations between male and female, the female having remained unmodified because she does not enter into the competition.

Basing his analysis of the animal world upon these principles, Darwin begins with the lower classes of the animal kingdom. In the lowest classes these characters are absent because most often the sexes are joined in the same individual, but in the sub-kingdom of the Arthropoda undoubtable examples of secondary sexual characters appear. Darwin presents his most convincing case, however, in his long discussions on insects and birds. In both of these sub-kingdoms the characters are so clearly noticeable that Darwin can accumulate material until he overwhelms the reader in a tour de force; the reader is presented with so much detailed information that he is willing to accept the evidence submitted before Darwin applies his principles to man.

The secondary sexual characters of man are more complex than those of birds or insects because man is more complex, but this is a difference only in degree. The adult male, for example, has a beard and hairiness of the body (although there is wide variation between tribes or races); he loves to fight and hence has greater endurance and strength than the female. Because of his love of battle, the male has a delight in competition and develops his intellect more than woman, who is consequently more tender and less selfish. Having noted a few of these characters, Darwin asks how they came to be. Because men vied with one another for the woman, the choice of the woman led to certain secondary sexual characters. For example, racial differences are the result of ancient concepts of beauty; the remote ancestors of the Negro race preferred women who were dark-skinned and flat-nosed. Thus, Darwin is able to describe the differences between races without violating his basic theory of the descent of man from lower forms of life.

Darwin anxiously waited for the publication of The Descent of Man and was surprised when he discovered that people were interested but not shocked. In fact, the book was anticlimactical. The disturbance caused by On the Origin of Species had calmed and was not again stirred up, and The Descent of Man became, as it should have, a book primarily for biologists.

THE DIARIES OF KAFKA: 1910-1923

Author: Franz Kafka (1883-1924)

First published: 1948-1949

Around the turn of the century and continuing until the years following World War I, a circle of German writers in Prague exerted great influence on German literature. Franz Werfel, Rainer Maria Rilke, and Max Brod were the most widely read authors of this group, but in the closing decades of the period Franz Kafka, sometimes called the author of anxiety, found an ever increasing audience. Biographers of Kafka complain that his short life does not offer anything dramatic to report: his existence could be termed provincial because the major part of his life, except for a short period of travel, was spent within a few city blocks in Prague. His father was a merchant and his mother the daughter of a brewery owner. The family, financially well-to-do, tried to maintain a nineteenth century upper-class living standard: French governess, humanistic education for the children, and efforts to preserve a bourgeois concept of German culture. The sensitive Kafka found no understanding at home; he had almost no communication with his family and the Jewish faith practiced by his parents offered him few consolations. Thus Kafka grew up in a withdrawn isolation, constantly groping for some kind of salvation which he could only find in his writings. He earned a doctor of law degree and worked for fourteen years with an insurance company.

Kafka's continuous anxiety of being directed by forces over which he had no control and about which he had no knowledge is superbly described in his best-known novel The Trial; however, it is in his diaries that he reveals most about his motivations and his innermost feelings. His friend and fellow writer, Max Brod, has published these diaries with the care of a loving friend, though admitting the omission of a few intimate entries.

The diary was compiled out of thirteen notebooks. The first dated entry is May 17, 1910; last notes were written in the summer of 1923. There are also three travel diaries covering Kafka's travels in Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and France during the years 1911 and 1912. Since these entries are quite different from the usual character of the diary, the travel journals have been separated from the rest.

The diary was a necessity for Kafka, who said that the advantage in keeping one is that it gives awareness of change in thought and feeling. When he realizes that he has neglected his diary, he promises that he will continue to keep it because it is the only place where he can hold on to experience. His urge to write was the safety valve for the hypersensitive and withdrawn Kafka, a means of relieving his anxieties through writing down his deepest feelings so that later he could reverse the process. Literature is his only obsession because, he wrote, literature was the only thing that did not bore him. Whether this fact was only in his mind does not disturb him. He feels that he can only observe family life, not participate in it.

Contemporary historic events are without interest to him. His entry on August 2, 1914, when World War I started, notes that Germany has declared war on Russia and that he went swimming in the afternoon. He is conscious of the direction of his work and states that his fate as a writer will be to record his inner life of dreams; he feels that his life has dwindled and will continue to dwindle, but this record is the only kind of writing that will satisfy him.

The silent stroller along the streets and parks of Prague is a most inquisitive observer of people and events as he ponders on their work, their salaries, what they will be doing tomorrow, how life in their old age will be, their sleeping habits, if he could do their jobs, or how he would like doing another man's work. In spite of his talent, writing is to him an arduous task, as if he were drawing words out of empty air. Sometimes he worries about his emotional state and the struggle to find adequate words. He feels as though he is his own tombstone, that every word he puts down slaps against the next; he hears the consonants rub heavily against one another and the vowels accompany them as though they were minstrel-show Negroes.

Kafka is his own critic and seldom finds reason to be satisfied. He is sure that his preconceived ideas are dry, flat, and embarrassing to those around him. Worst of all, he feels that his ideas remain incomplete, even when he has put them down exactly as he has conceived them. He accuses himself frequently of failing and laments, while looking at a simple girl's dress, that he seldom succeeds in creating anything truly beautiful. Besides the lack of understanding shown toward his writing ambitions by his parents, his employment by an insurance firm conflicts with his literary work, and he longs to be freed of the confining office. Only when his illness becomes critical does he leave off seeing people. His earlier works were written in his parents' home. His constant struggle with noise is shown in a passage telling how he can hear every sound in the house: the front door, the oven door, singing, and house-cleaning.

Kafka knew that he was not capable of married life, but he also hated the life of a bachelor. He feared becoming an old man fighting to retain his dignity while begging for an invitation when the need for companionship was felt, or the dreariness of carrying home his meals, not returning home to a calm spouse. He was three times engaged, twice to the same girl, yet all efforts to find a partner for life failed. His self-examination provides entries which indicate that he was striving to come to terms with his surroundings, to know the whole of the human and animal community, to reduce life to simplified forms and rules: to make his life conform to these rules as quickly as he could so that he could retain favor in the eyes of the whole world. However, his opinions on basic subjects are unpromising. He said that education is part of an adult conspiracy in dealing with children.

The diaries contain many notations which demonstrate Kafka's fierce struggles with symptoms of fear, and he states that only devils could account for the misfortunes in men's lives. There are a great number of story ideas among the entries. Some are well known to Kafka readers. A great many more fragments leave the reader with the regretful realization that this life ended too soon to complete the outpouring of his unique imaginative power. In the words of Albert Camus, everything in Kafka's work is meaningful.

The travel diary reveals a lesser known side of his talent. Because he was absorbed in recording experiences outside himself, he was able to interject some humorous notes, as in his description of a linguistic encounter during a train ride in Italy. He states that the Italian language when spoken commands one's attention whether or not what is being said can be understood, even though one who is uncertain of his Italian cannot prevail against the fluent Italian speaker.

Kafka was not afraid of death. Several years before his illness he wrote that he would be content on his deathbed if the pain were not too great; he believed that the best of his writing revealed his serenity and contentment in the face of death. But a death without pain was not destined for Kafka. As his tuberculosis progressed, the entries of the diary reflect his anxiety of losing the strength to keep on writing. The entries become shorter. One of the last entries, written on June 12, 1923, states that his days and nights are filled with pain, almost without interruption.

Kafka died in a sanatorium near Vienna on June 3, 1924. In spite of the many volumes which now have been written about him, it still appears that he defies any clear definition in literary terms. A minority of critics feel that his mastery of the German language is limited because he lived in linguistic isolation and never was part of the contemporary stream of German writing. The German spoken in Prague did not encompass the avant-garde innovations which flourished shortly before and after World War I in Germany and Switzerland. But the strength of Kafka's style seems to derive from this lack of participation in literary fashions; it left him with simple word choices which expressed even more poignantly the complexities of his imaginary inner world. Whatever the criteria may be, it is undeniable that Kafka is today, in the words of a German critic, a "focal-point author." One of Kafka's few friends, Milena Jesenská, wrote that he stood beside mankind and looked at humanity in amazement, that he exposed himself to life like a naked man among the clothed. The nakedness of innocence, of wonder, of the mystery of creation in art, is clearly revealed in his diaries. The document is human because a man of deep sensibility is speaking.

From the first entry in the diary of a sixteen-year-old girl to the last letter written by an old lady seventy-one years later, Fanny Burney's record of her experiences covers an enthralling range of personalities and events. As a daughter in the talented household of Dr. Charles Burney, the first music historian, a literary young woman in Dr. Johnson's London, a lady-in-waiting at the court of King George III, the wife of a French exile after the Revolution, a resident in Paris during the Empire, and finally a lonely widow in Jane Austen's Bath, Fanny Burney d'Arblay was a perceptive and witty observer behind the scenes that have become history. Her remarkable balance of passionate involvement and ironic detachment achieved a unique synthesis of autobiography and social history.

The diary begins with a young girl's self-dramatization in its statement of purpose: "To have some account of my thoughts, manners, acquaintance and actions, when the hour arrives in which time is more nimble than memory, is the reason which induces me to keep a Journal. A Journal in which I must confess my every thought, must open my whole heart!" With innate literary discrimination, she realized that it would be more effective if addressed to an imaginary intimate; but the only confidante to whom she could reveal all her secrets was "Nobody."

To Nobody, then, will I write my Journal! since to Nobody can I be wholly unreserved—to Nobody can I reveal every thought, every wish of my heart, with the most unlimited confidence, the most unrelenting sincerity to the end of my life!

Her embarrassment when her father found her journal; her excitement at every meeting with Mr. Garrick, a frequent visitor in the Burney household; her admiration for Miss Linley, the singer who eloped with Sheridan—all were increasingly tempered by her sense of humor, as in her account of a sailing excursion:

The waves foamed in little white mountains rising above the green surface of the sea; they dashed against the rocks off the coast of Brixham with monstrous fury; and really to own the truth, I felt no inclination to be boat wrecked, however pathetic and moving a Tale our adventure might have made.

Taking herself and her diary less seriously in her early twenties, she confessed that she had burned everything she had written up to her fifteenth year, "thinking I grew too old for scribbling nonsense, but as I am less young, I grow, I fear, less wise, for I cannot any longer resist what I find to be irresistible, the pleasure of popping down my thoughts from time to time on paper."

The purpose and technique of Fanny's early diary formed the basis of the novel which first brought her recognition: "I doubt not but this memorable affair [publication of Evelina] will, in future times, mark the period whence chronologers will date the zenith of the polite arts in this island!" This characteristic of poking fun at herself reveals the objectivity with which the character of Evelina was created. The sentimental heroine, pouring out her heart in a long series of voluminous letters to her guardian, expresses not the author's view of the world, but the author's view of how the world appears to a naïve girl of seventeen. Published first under a pseudonym, Evelina became an immediate hit, and some of the most delightful passages in the diary are the accounts of Fanny Burney's unaffected pride in its success and amusement at everyone's attempts to guess the identity of the author. She seemed to enjoy the mystery more than the praise heaped upon her when the secret became known, but that too was sweet when it came from Dr. Johnson: "I almost poked myself under the table. Never did I feel so delicious a confusion since I was born!"

From 1777, when she first met Dr. Johnson, until 1784, when she visited him regularly during his last illness, Fanny Burney filled her journal with conversations which she claimed to remember almost verbatim. Although Johnson was often violent or overbearing in his arguments with fellow critics, his manner to Fanny was always kindly and courteous. The scenes in Mrs. Thrall's drawing room, in Sir Joshua Reynolds' dining room, or in Dr. Johnson's own small parlor, where Fanny met the blue-stocking ladies of Mrs. Thrale's circle and the literary men of the doctor's circle, sparkle with wit and polished repartee; but Dr. Johnson is more genial when seen through Fanny's eyes than through Boswell's. Five years after the death of their revered friend, just before the publication of Boswell's The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., Fanny met Boswell at Windsor and was embarrassed by his request for some of Johnson's letters to herself, to show him in a new light as "gay Sam, agreeable Sam, pleasant Sam." She refused his request, but she has performed the same service for Dr. Johnson in her own recollections of his talk.

During the summer before Dr. Johnson's death, Fanny had lost another friend, Mrs. Hester Thrale, through opposition to her marriage to the Italian tenor, Gabriel Piozzi. With the literary circle thus broken, Fanny's scope became socially wider, though intellectually narrower. She was introduced to Queen Charlotte, whom she found charming, and who was so impressed with the novelist that she offered her a position at court as a Keeper of the Wardrobes. Fanny felt too honored to refuse the appointment, but she had grave doubts about sacrificing her independence for the rigid routine of court life. Her doubts proved amply justified during her five-year stint, but even when her hours on duty were from six o'clock in the morning until after midnight, she usually found time to record some of her experiences. Her devotion to the royal family, her dislike of her German superior, her conscientious attitude about her duty, and her sharply observant eye and mocking wit combine to give a vivid picture of life at the court of King George III. In a letter to a sister, Fanny explained the etiquette of deportment in the royal presence:

In the third place, you must not, upon any account, stir either hand or foot. If, by chance, a black pin runs into your head, you must be sure to bear it without wincing; if it brings tears into your eyes, you must not wipe them off; if they give you a tingling by running down your cheeks, you must look as if nothing was the matter. . . . If, however, the agony is very great, you may, privately, bite the inside of your cheek, or of your lips, for a little relief: taking care, meanwhile, to do it so cautiously as to make no apparent dent outwardly. And, with that precaution, if you even gnaw a piece out, it will not be minded, only be sure either to swallow it, or commit it to a corner of the inside of your mouth till they are gone—for you must not spit.

This whimsical cynicism was dubious for a beginner in court duties, but Fanny's admiration for members of the royal family seemed unaffected by her impatience with formality. Her account of the assassination attempt in 1786 is typical. When she first heard the news she was "almost petrified with horror at the intelligence. If this King is not safe,—good, pious, beneficent as he is,—if his life is in danger, from his own subjects, what is to guard the Throne? and which way is a monarch to be secure?" She was particularly impressed by the fact that the king, on his return to his weeping family ". . . with the gayest good-humour, did his utmost to comfort them; and he gave a relation of the affair, with a calmness and unconcern that, had any one but himself been his hero, would have been regarded as totally unfeeling." In giving her family an accurate account to correct the rumors they had heard, Fanny stressed the way in which the king stopped the crowd from attacking his mad assailant and insisted that she should be taken care of.

This emphasis on the king's goodness was maintained throughout the record of the sad period of his own madness. After some months of illness he seemed greatly changed:

I had a sort of conference with his Majesty, or rather I was the object to whom he spoke, with a manner so uncommon, that a high fever alone could account for it; a rapidity, a hoarseness of voice, a volubility, an earnestness—a vehemence, rather—it startled me inexpressibly; yet with a graciousness exceeding even all I ever met with before—it was almost kindness! Heaven—Heaven preserve him!”

Months later Fanny met him by accident in Kew gardens, tried to slip away, and was terrified when he ran after her. When both of them were stopped by his attendants, she was surprised to meet “all his wonted benignity of countenance, though something still of wildness in his eyes,” and even more astonished when he kissed her on the cheek. Her observation on this action reveals as much of her own character as of his: “. . . it was but the joy of a heart unbridled, now, by the forms and proprieties of established custom and sober reason. To see any of his household thus by accident seemed such a near approach to liberty and recovery that who can wonder it should serve rather to elate than lessen what yet remains of his disorder!” Seeing George III through Fanny Burney’s eyes alters more perspectives than does seeing Dr. Johnson in a different light.

One of Fanny’s most interesting assignments was to attend the trial of Warren Hastings in order to give the queen an accurate account of the proceedings. The long passages in her diary reveal her relief at this occasional freedom from formality of the court and her delight in the opportunity to see her London friends. Her comments on who was there and with whom, who spoke to whom and to whom one could not speak, are reminiscent of dialogue in Restoration comedy, but her reaction to Hastings himself was in terms of tragedy: “What an awful moment for such a man!—a man fallen from such a height of power to a situation so humiliating.” She also followed the main stages of the trial with alert intelligence, so that she was able to give the chancellor’s opening speech from memory: “The newspapers have printed it far less accu-ately than I have retained it, though I am by no means exact or secure.” Of the speech by Edmund Burke which she heard, she gave no particulars because she assumed it would be accurately printed, but she praised her friend’s eloquence while disagreeing with his views. She revealed the influence of Johnson when she wrote: “When he narrated, he was easy, flowing, and natural; when he declaimed, energetic, warm, and brilliant.”

Close though she was to the great affairs of her day, Fanny Burney was occupied for most of her five years at court with the domestic life of the royal family. Because of a demanding schedule, long hours, cold palace passages, and draughty carriages, her health declined. At last she resigned her post and went to live again with her father. But within a year, while staying with friends in the country, she was again drawn as by a magnet into an important circle, a group of French exiles which included Talleyrand and Madame de Staël. Engaged as their tutor in English, she soon married M. d’Arblay and thus began a new life when she was nearly forty. After 1800 her husband was able to go back to France, where they lived until 1815, when d’Arblay was appointed a commander of the king’s bodyguard and sent Fanny with other refugees to Brussels. Her narrative of the events of the Hundred Days, and particularly of Brussels during the Battle of Waterloo, though written some years later, preserved the balance of emotional involvement and critical detachment that characterizes the entire journal. During her last twenty-three years of life as a widow settled in Bath, she was busy editing her father’s paper, revising her own diaries, and sorting out her letters, in a spirit more critical than sentimental:

For the rest of my life I shall take charge and save my own executor the discretionary labours that with myself are almost endless; for I now regularly destroy all letters that either may eventually do mischief, however clever, or that contain nothing of instruction or entertainment, however innocent. This, which I announce to all my correspondents who write confidentially, occasions my receiving letters that are real conversations.

Because Fanny Burney's own diaries and letters were always real conversations, they provide an atmosphere as well as a record of her times. Her style was sometimes colloquial, sometimes Johnsonian, depending on her subject. The death of her old friend, Mrs. Hester Thrale Piozzi, led to a comparison between her and Madame de Staël in the manner of the Lives of the Poets:

Their conversation was equally luminous, from the sources of their own fertile minds, and from their splendid acquisitions from the works and acquirements of others. Both were zealous to serve, liberal to bestow, and graceful to oblige and praising whatever was admirable that came in their way.

In this passage, as throughout her journal, both in what she says and in the way she says it, Fanny Burney throws a light upon her times in which she herself stands clearly revealed.

DIARY OF A WRITER

Type of work: Periodical journalism

Author: Fyodor Mikhailovich Dostoevski (1821-1881)

Dostoevski began his series of articles in the Petersburg Citizen with the plan of talking in an informal way about any subject in current events that impressed or appealed to him. He did not intend the articles to be a specifically literary endeavor and they are not, although literary subjects appear frequently. Nor did he intend his writing to be predominantly political, although he expounds his political philosophy and his slavophilic ideas at intervals throughout. This was to be a personal and freely-ranging undertaking; hence he called it a diary. It combines characteristics found in current journalism, column, editorial, and feature story. The style is flowing, associative, digressive.

The author frequently and half humorously complains that he is having no success in keeping to his main subject because the things which were intended to take up but a few words have absorbed all the space. In fact, the announced subjects are often but launching points for what Dostoevski really has to say. At the end of the 1876 issues, he admits that his main object in writing the Diary is to explain the ideas of Russia's national spiritual independence, that is, the qualities of the human mind and heart as he observes them in his countrymen. Always fascinated by the consciousness and emotions of people all of kinds, Dostoevski makes many profound observations, and the pages of his Diary reveal keen observation and sensitivity to our essential humanity. This prime interest accounts for the rambling and discursive form of his writings. As he explains, he writes of the things he has seen, heard, read. But in life, these things do not fit together, do not form patterns. All is strange, all is "segregation." The lack of order and coherence in his writings mirrors the disorder and unrest in life, which are his true subject: what life is like in Russia in the last quarter of the nineteenth century.

Dostoevski shows the quirks and quiddities of the Russian character by sketches, by narrated incidents, and by simple rumination. A visit he made to a mineral-water spa provides him with material for comments about railway traveling, social behavior, particularly the propensity of many Russians for speaking poor French rather than good Russian. Dostoevski analyzes this affectation and criticizes it. He is quick to see the faults of his countrymen: their simplicity, their lying, their dissipations. He observes that most men are not bad but wretched, a situation that may be attributed partly to the social confusion in the country after the liberation of the peasants in 1861, when many Russians could not be secure in their identities or their social positions. The writer observes that everybody wants to revenge himself on the world for his own nullity. Because people lack an outlet to express their identities, they feel neglected and faceless; they debauch, they drink, they write anonymous letters to newspapers. However, he insists, the Russian people should be judged not by their villainies but by the great and holy things they long for, even while they are committing wrongs. In the long run, he argues, Russia will be redeemed because her problems all arise from errors of the mind, not of the heart. Errors of the mind are easily remedied, by the very logic of events in life. But errors of the heart are a spiritual blindness that refuses to be cured, and would sooner destroy everything in the world.

Dostoevski feels that Russia needs a greater sense of solidarity, both personally and politically, for a sound cohesive sentiment is happiness in the life of a nation. He points toward the time, before Peter the Great, when Russia was isolationist and contrasts it with the present time, when Russians try to love Europeans, become Europeans. He talks of Germany's problems as it strove to become a single nation and sees there a parallel for Russia's problems, makes political predictions, returns to them later to comment upon their working out, discusses Russia's finances, makes plans, explains how he has formulated them and even how he is expressing them. There is no strict method in his political musings; he explores topics as they occur to him: Russia's struggles against the Turkish empire, its relations with Europe, general problems of religion—can it prevail?—the Pope, European politics, personalities, patriots and politicians. War, he decides, need not always be a scourge. Sometimes it can be a salvation, if the people need it and are ready for it. His conclusion is that the changes which are occurring around the world ought not to be feared but welcomed by Russia; because her mission is a true and lofty one, the country will endure anything and always emerge triumphant.

More appealing and important than politics for readers of the Diary are Dostoevski's discussions of minor immediate and everyday events. In these he demonstrates his real knowledge of the human heart. He returns often to the theme of alienation and the breaking of old ties. A visit to the village in which he grew up leads him to ruminate about his childhood, childhood in general, the nature of families and the changing values in the family situation. He finds a blurring of family identity, an increasing casualness toward the old ties, that he regrets. The education of children, and their peculiar charm, are related subjects he speaks on.

Current newspaper accounts involving children often come up for comment in the Diary: trials of parents for cruelty to children are discussed at great length, and also digressively. Dostoevski begins a discussion of the ethical considerations of lawyers apropos of a particular case, then says in effect that since he knows little about law, he will talk about talent in general. And he proceeds to do so. But eventually, as always, he returns to his topic. His breadth of mind constantly suggests to him new ideas related by association to the starting ones, and his pen is given free rein.

News stories of the deaths of children attract him and lead him into a consideration of Tolstoy's Childhood and Youth. Suicides are another kind of news item that provokes a response from Dostoevski. He relates long histories of suicides, speculates upon the forces that drive a man to such an extreme, and the sort of character that can accomplish self-destruction. He devotes one issue of the Diary to a short story called "The Meek One," which consists of a man's monologue just after his wife has committed suicide.

Life reminds Dostoevski of literature as faithfully as literature embodies life. Despite his frequent remarks that he does not mean to deal directly with literature and criticism, he is often led into it because, as he explains, the Diary is meant as a record of his impressions and his strongest impressions are about literature. The death of George Sand in 1876 occasions a long discussion of her popularity as a novelist, her heroines, her religion. Besides "The Meek One," Dostoevski produces another short story called "The Dream of a Strange Man," and also gives a sketch of his plan for a satiric novel. He broods lovingly over Cervantes' Don Quixote and its knowledge of the heart. The single issue of the Diary for August, 1880, consists of the text of a famous address on Pushkin that Dostoevski made to a literary society earlier that year. The significance of Pushkin for Russia, he says, is that he was the first to recognize and portray in literature the negative type of man, who is restless, suffering, without faith or cooperation, refusing to be reconciled to his world. Pushkin's universal susceptibility allowed him truly to capture the artistic beauty of the Russian spirit. There is for Dostoevski the essence of the Russian personality in this type of man, and Pushkin himself is its perfection.

The Diary met with immense acclaim during the years it appeared, but the author's death in 1881 cut short the publication of what had been, and still is, a continuing document of a sensitive man's confrontation of his world and the meaning he found in it.

THE DIARY OF HENRY CRABB ROBINSON

Type of work: Diary, reminiscences, and correspondence

Author: Henry Crabb Robinson (1775-1867)

First published: 1870

Because of his passion for literature and metaphysics, and his special affinity for knowing those men of his time who were worth knowing, Henry Crabb Robinson managed to encompass in his person many of the significant intellectual trends of the first half of the nineteenth century. His Diary reveals him as a highly characteristic post-Enlightenment mind; his encounters with German, French, and particularly English literary figures have produced a mine of information about the special temper of exuberance during the period; yet there emerges from the work as well the picture of a modest and engaging man. While still a young man, having turned to the Law for a living, he realized he could never become great; but he never ceased to follow the lure of the controversial ideas and outstanding men of his age. His mild demeanor, his exquisite tact and generosity, made him the friend of writers as various as Goethe, Wordsworth, Blake, Lamb, Landor, and Coleridge.

Robinson's life as he recorded it in the Diary was outwardly uneventful, yet full of pleasurable transitions from introspection to social intercourse. He never married, but the range of his acquaintances and friendships was enormous, as was the extent of his correspondence. Yet we also have frequent glimpses of the solitary Robinson, alone in a room reading voluminously in the philosophy and literature of his contemporaries, cultivating his Diary, or traveling on the Continent to improve his mind.

Robinson was born on May 13, 1775, at Bury St. Edmunds. His childhood was a happy one; however, because the Robinsons were Dissenters he was excluded from education at a public school or a university, and at age fifteen he was arti-

cled as a law clerk to a Colchester attorney. During the next few years he went to see John Wesley preach, rejoiced at the outbreak of the French Revolution, became a Jacobin, and read Godwin's Political Justice. Then after an unsettled life in London during the closing years of the eighteenth century, a time when he began in earnest his reading and theater-going habits and developed a mature interest in politics, he went to Germany in 1800 with money from a legacy. The next five years of independent travel and study in Germany were the crucial period of his life. With no settled plans, he began to absorb the German language and culture. By the time he returned home, he had traveled widely in Germany, had read deeply in its literature and in the emerging transcendental philosophy, had known Weimar in its great days and talked with Goethe, Schiller, Brentano, Voss, and many others. With Coleridge and Carlyle, he became one of the first English Germanophiles, an extremely eloquent advocate, for example, of the strengths and beauties of Goethe in literature and of Kant in philosophy. If the formative influence of Germany on English thought during the period between 1810 and 1850 can hardly be overrated, Robinson himself deserves much of the credit.

At Frankfurt, his first major stop, Robinson became acquainted with the poet Clemens Brentano. In July, 1801, he moved on to Grimma where, with great difficulty, he began reading Kant in earnest. After meeting Goethe and Herder at Weimar, he remarked on Goethe's immense dignity and oppressive handsomeness. Finally he settled at Jena, enrolled in the University there, and began studies in Latin and Greek and in contemporary German writing. He heard Schelling's lectures on aesthetics and thought them obscure; his acute sympathetic insight and strength of mind won him an intimacy with von Knebel; while at the same time he indulged in some good-natured student clowning, got into trouble for parodying an inept professor named Eichstädt, and was friendly enough with his fellow students to learn a good deal about their secret dueling societies. In 1804 he met Mme. de Staël. Not knowing Parisian customs, he was puzzled to be shown into her bedroom to meet the great lady as she sat decorously in her bed. In return for her introductions to many of the literary giants of Weimar, Robinson gave her lucid explanations of current German philosophies. He was later to perform the same task of intermediary for English audiences.

After a stay in England, Robinson returned to Germany as a correspondent for The Times in 1807. Later he went to Spain, where he covered the revolution in 1808. He left The Times during the next year, lived a literary life in London for a time, all the while uncertain of his future, and then in January, 1812, entered the office of a barrister. He went to the bar, he said, to acquire a "gentlemanly independence" and "society with leisure." In spite of his own disclaimers, it is clear that he was an active lawyer on the Norfolk circuit, and an able one; at the end of every year he noted accurately in pounds the steady increase in his income. From this time on he agitated for the reform of legal process in England, and he became an active enemy of the slave trade.

The Diary itself begins in 1811, during his thirty-sixth year, at a time when he was solidifying friendships with Blake, Wordsworth, Lamb, and Coleridge. The months on the circuit alternated with summer tours to Wales or the Continent, and Robinson combined with his professional life an amazingly varied round of dinners, lectures, theater-going, reading, and social intercourse with people of all ranks and opinions.

Robinson was fifty-three when, in 1828, he gave up the practice of law to devote himself to self-improvement, talk, and philanthropy. It was during this harvest of leisure that he increased his correspondence, became a mentor to many young writers, paid hundreds of social visits to the great and the insignificant alike, and watched his old friends die off one by one. In the year of his retirement he was one of the first to buy shares in the recently founded London University, afterwards University College. His long and honorable connection with University College as a member of the Managing Council extended to the time of his death. It was here too that he practiced the art of conversation, which even then was becoming a rare phenomenon and indistinguishable from argument. Henry Crabb Robinson was always an eminently clubbable man, someone who could listen as well as perform, whether he was dining at College or spending his annual Christmas vacation with the Wordsworths at Rydal Mount.

It was as a genial and social man that Robinson was remembered after his death in 1867. As the conversationalist and companion of several generations of Englishmen, he never made an enemy. In fact, this talent for conversation makes the Diary a work of continuing importance. Robinson the diarist is a mine of information on nineteenth century literary history. He was one of the first men to argue for the greatness of Goethe and Wordsworth. He saw immediately the significance of the Lyrical Ballads, and he was one of the initial supporters of Hazlitt and Keats. He transcribed the opinions, and catalogued the eccentricities, of both Coleridge and Blake; he was the friend of Charles Lamb and it is not insignificant to note that he recorded many of Lamb's best puns. He went to the theater for pleasure and recorded his responses to performances in Weimar and London from the days of Mrs. Siddons, at the turn of the century, to the 1865 performance of Twelfth Night with Miss Kate Terry in the title role. Again, over a period of years, he attended the lectures of Coleridge and Hazlitt, of Flaxman on the fine arts, and, later, of Emerson, Faraday, and Carlyle. In many cases his notes are all we possess of those lectures.

Robinson's Diary remains one of the most important single contemporary sources on the life and opinions of Wordsworth. He was Wordsworth's contemporary in time and temperament and shared with the poet an enthusiasm for the French Revolution and for Godwin in the 1790's. Both resided in Germany at the turn of the century; both gave their pity and friendship to the unfortunate Lambs; and both profited from the brilliant monologues of Coleridge. They were twice traveling companions on picturesque tours to the Continent. Robinson in the Diary evinced an affectionate but skeptical regard for the poet. Often forgetting or garbling his friend's remarks, or merely listening for the sake of pleasure and not transcription, he lacked—to use his own phrase—"the Boswell faculty." Instead, we see Wordsworth en famille, or walking around the lake at Grasmere, or wondering whether he ought to travel three hundred miles to London for the Queen's dance, or reacting stoically to the unexpected death of his daughter Dora. Robinson was the intermediary between Wordsworth and Coleridge during their misunderstanding; and his description of the motives and the frequent pettiness of the great men involved is our best record of this literary quarrel. There are accounts as well of Wordsworth on Byron, on Chatterton, on Milton, on the penny post, on politics, on the order in which his poems should be read, as well as some engaging discussion of Wordsworth's faults and virtues as a friend. This personal material is invaluable. In addition, it is worth noting that Robinson's comments on Wordsworth's poems are just and often demonstrate an acute knowledge of their texture, spirit, and relative importance. Almost all of Robinson's correspondence, particularly that with Wordsworth, exhibits an intense literary discussion of a sort unknown in our day in personal letters.

Often enough Robinson was a prosy and unselective diarist. One is obliged to use the index to find topics and names of importance. But he was alert to much of the best writing and talking of his age, and he himself evoked a portion of that intellectual activity. Obviously the thread of his own life as it is conveyed by his memoranda is for us not so important as the particulars of interesting men which the Diary preserves. Nevertheless his day to day jottings show him as a shrewd and generous man, possessed with a keen scent for literary and human greatness and a marvelous capacity for friendship.

THE DINNER PARTY

Type of work: Novel

Author: Claude Mauriac (1914-)

Time: The present

Locale: Paris

First published: 1959

Principal characters:

BERTRAND CARNÉJOUX, the host, an editor and novelist

MARTINE (PILOU) CARNÉJOUX, his wife

EUGÉNIE PRIEUR, an aging belle of Parisian society

GILLES BELLECROIX, a scenarist and aspiring novelist

LUCIENNE OSBORN, the egocentric wife of an American film producer

ROLAND SOULAIRES, a rich but frustrated bachelor

MARIE-ANGE (MARIETTA) VASGNE, an actress, mistress to Bertrand

JÉRÔME ARGULF, a childhood friend of Martine and a substitute guest

The Dinner Party is an experimental novel in the sense that it employs devices which would have amounted to experiment thirty or forty years ago: no narrator; no identification of speakers except by subject matter, leitmotif, or an occasional self-apostrophe; a fusion of conversation and soliloquy; the cross currents of two or three different subjects—stichomythic or protracted; and the illusion of simultaneity in the varied mental associations evoked by some passing remark. The difficulties of following such a presentation of multiple experience are only initial, being resolved in the development of character patterns which emerge despite the loss in translation of the uniqueness of language assigned to individual characters.

But if the experimental novel has become the sub-species of a traditional one, an example should not be dismissed as merely one more repetitive experiment but must be assessed as a work of art in an established medium. Claude Mauriac's performance in The Dinner Party is an impressive one. To treat at book length the incidental chatter and random musings of eight people during a dining period of perhaps two hours is the kind of tour de force liable to a reaction of boredom on a reader's part. But without telling a very significant story or symbolizing any extensive meaning, Mauriac sustains his kaleidoscope of sophisticated sensibilities with remarkable intensity. Not a single character in the book emerges as a great or memorable one; their relations to one another are rather trivial, in fact represent clichés of the beau monde.

There is no perceptibly dominant theme; all is dinner party experience observed and recorded by means of the dramatic method and the interior monologue. Yet the characters are thoroughly interesting people. Their talk—about history, about aristocratic genealogy, about literature (Proust, Barrès, Anatole France, Graham Greene, and Gerard Manley Hopkins), about astrology, about travel, about God, and even about intellectual parlor games—is generally absorbing, occasionally informative, and often amusing. Their thoughts about one another, about themselves, and about the matters which happen to arise, are compounded of vanity, lust, boredom, jealousy, creative perceptivity, intelligence, insight, and hopeful intentions—all projected with a psychological subtlety and effectiveness which give the book its true unity. Other characters, in the persons of servants like the seductive Armande, or members of fashionable society who are talked about or recalled in memory, add to the dimensions of the emanating reality. Even details of the courses served, descriptions of spots on the table cloth or crumbs on a chair, and appraisals of the quality of the champagne being consumed are brilliantly integrated into the vibrant texture of the writing.

The situation which Claude Mauriac creates out of his assemblage of characters suggests Proust. The atmosphere they breathe is rarified. His people are elegant, aristocratic (or socially pretentious), artistic, and sensual. They are aware of social stratification, youth fading into age, their desire for one another, the interplay of their sensibilities, and the projection of their personae. Bergson hovers over the table: the diners indulge in flights of memory stimulated by simple words or sensations; they consider their future; but everything is focused upon the present moment of consciousness.

There is no head of the table as such, but the host sits as nearly opposite his wife as a round table seating four men and four women will allow. He is Bertrand Carnéjoux, the forty-six-year-old editor of the magazine Ring and author of a successful novel entitled Sober Pleasures (the original manuscript bore the more revealing title, Metaphysics of Physical Passion.) Preëminent in Carnéjoux's mind is the desire to write another novel of even greater artistic integrity, formulated in a new way which will bring into immediate juxtaposition the words and thoughts of his characters. More than once, as he notes his conversation at table, he regrets that he does not find it possible to achieve the same brilliance, the same eloquence when he is at work over a manuscript in his study. Meanwhile he presides over the party, secure in his knowledge of amorous success with every woman present except one. His conversation is mainly about literature, his thoughts divided between love affairs and plans for writing.

His wife Martine is twenty-six, intimately known as Pilou, and the wealthy and innocent daughter of Irene, one of Bertrand's former mistresses. Throughout the party her thoughts are mainly radiant expressions of love for her two children Rachel and Jean-Paul; but she is also tempted to respond to the attentions of Bellecroix.

Gilles Bellecroix, forty-nine, is a screen writer who is more famous than Bertrand but who is not satisfied inwardly with his achievement. He is obsessed with the idea that he must produce a good novel in order to realize himself. Meanwhile he observes the dinner guests with a cinematic eye, visualizing meaningful scenes in flickers of pose or behavior. Between him and Bertrand there is a latent rivalry which carries over into Gilles's flirtation with Martine, the motion of whose dancing on an earlier occasion is unforgettable to him. But Gilles finds his real center of being in his wife Bénédicte, knows that for him true happiness lies in love, fidelity, monogamy.

Eugénie Prieur, still, at sixty-seven, called "Gigi" by young blades of Paris, is the oldest guest (too old to have been one of Bertrand's conquests), full of rich nostalgic memories, the wisdom of long experience, and an intimate knowledge of social machinations. The perspective with which she endows her world is further documented by her conversations about historic family connections.

Roland Soulaire, forty-five, is temperamentally a Prufrock who hides his fears and insecurity behind his idle dreams and his clever talk with Eugénie about social identification. Extremely wealthy, but fat and bald, he fails to interest the beautiful guest at his left.

She is twenty-four-year-old Marie-Ange Vasgne, formerly named Marietta, a Canadian farm girl, but now a sultry blond model and aspiring actress. Marie-Ange is Bertrand's current mistress who dares near the end of the party to tease him by inquiring after Marie-Plum, another mistress whom Bertrand has never been able to forget. Everyone's knowledge of these affairs, admitted or not, is the measure of civilization for these people. Marie-Ange toys with the numbers one through six, as though seeking a pattern of sense in the world.

Lucienne Osborn, forty-two, is married to an American film producer, not present at the dinner. Her mind vapid, her body faded, she is preoccupied with thoughts of television sets, suntan, her dog Zig, and her lover, Léon-Pierre.

Jérôme Aygulf, who is twenty, finds himself out of his element. A childhood friend of Martine, he was invited only at the last moment after another guest had sent regrets. Jérôme, aspiring but naïve, is at the opposite end of the scale from Eugénie. He finds himself longing for the attention and patronage of Bertrand more than for anything else. Insecure and a little awkward in this society, he nonetheless attracts the attention of Marie-Ange.

The Dinner Party belongs in that class of novels, including also The Sacred Fount and The Counterfeiters, in which a novelist as a character thinks interchangeably about experience and the novel. The center of interest in Mauriac's book really lies in the thoughts and comments expressed by Bertrand and Gilles about the novel form. Referring to his novel, Bertrand speaks of a new kind of fiction, one in which on some common occasion, such as the present dinner party, time and space would be suspended. And contemplating his next one, which will fuse thought and speech, Bertrand responds to Claudel's definition of the simplicity of truth along the line of Diderot's Proustian statement that "Everything we have ever known . . . exists within us without our knowing it." The book is studded with criticism of novelists and theories of the novel, ideas which reveal character but also illuminate the practice of Claude Mauriac in this particular novel. In one way or another The Dinner Party raises a host of interesting questions about modern fiction.

DISCOURSE ON THE ORIGIN OF INEQUALITY

Type of work: Political and philosophical essay

Author: Jean Jacques Rousseau (1712-1778)

First published: 1754

The Discourse on the Origin of Inequality is one of the early works in which Rousseau examines and expounds his rebellion against the social order as it exists, a revolt that the writer was to continue throughout his life. Rousseau believed that the evils which plague mankind have their origins not in sin but in man's departure from the natural state, in which man was happy and good. This is the typical Romantic view of the Noble Savage.

In his inquiry into the origins of inequality, Rousseau begins with man, the core and motivation of his study. He states that there are two kinds of inequality among men. One is "natural or physical" because it is created by nature and consists of the obvious physical differences. The second is what he calls "moral or political inequality," which grows out of convention and flowers because of the "consent of men." The inquiry accepts the beliefs of religion that God took man out of a state of nature by His will, but it considers also what might have become of man had he been left to develop by himself.

The first part of the inquiry concerns itself with man in his natural state, the state of nature, the "embryo of his species." In this animal state, he was the most promising of all other animals, and was therefore the most felicitously situated. He was free from artificial worries and not given to reflection. Rousseau asserts the extreme position that man thinking is a depraved animal. Nature is benign and treats all her creatures well. It is only as man departs from the cradle of nature that he begins to degenerate both physically and morally, for he is physically and morally superior in the state of nature. Metaphysically, he is superior because he is motivated solely by instinct to desire and to fear. He cannot, therefore, be either good or bad, vicious or virtuous.

Rousseau attacks directly the political philosophy of Thomas Hobbes's Leviathan and its insistence that man is fundamentally vicious and must be controlled. Rousseau urges that Hobbes should have concluded that the state of nature affords man the greatest opportunity for self-preservation without doing injury to others and therefore should be the state in which man is least vicious, wicked, and injurious to his fellow man. Hobbes failed signally in making two key observations: one, that savages are not bad merely because they cannot know good, but rather because their passions are peaceful; two, that man is by nature compassionate because of an innate repugnance to see fellow creatures suffer, and this compassion moderates the violence of egotism.

The second part of the essay concerns itself with proving that man became wicked as he became a social animal. Society began when the first man staked out property and claimed it as his own. One of Rousseau's most powerful sentences condemns this false claim and the long string of crimes, murders, misfortunes, and general horrors that sprang from it. A savior of mankind would have been the man who declared in ringing terms: "Be sure not to this imposter; you are lost, if you forget that the fruits of the earth belong to us all, and the earth itself to nobody." Rousseau quotes with approval John Locke's famous statement that "There can be no injury, where there is no property."

As men congregated into groups, each person began to think about the others and to consider public esteem. Each man who excelled in some particular thing—singing best, dancing best, hunting best, or the like—began to assert his excellence, and nobody could deny the rating. As superiority grew, so did another complication, morality. In savage minds morality had been simple. In more advanced societies punishments for offenses by one person against another became more numerous and severe. Increasingly, Rousseau asserts, it became clear to all men that there were advantages to appearing to be what one actually was not. From the difference between seeming and being sprang pomp and trickery, as well as all the lesser vices that go in their train.

From this situation it was not a long step to another vice, the establishment of law. Clever, powerful men, Rousseau says, seeing the advantage of joining their strength to exploit the weak, seduced the powerless into allowing themselves to be protected by the strong, when they had nothing to be protected against, for the sake of harmony among them all. Rousseau drives home his point with one of the most ringing statements in the book, anticipating in its power and direction the powerful statement which begins Du Contrat Social, stating that man is born free but is everywhere enslaved: "All offered their necks to the yoke in hopes of securing their liberty. . . ." The result of this flight into slavery was the eternal fixing of the laws of property and inequality. "Clever usurpation" had been converted into "unalterable right," and for the benefit of a few ambitious individuals all mankind had been reduced to perpetual labor, slavery and misery.

Political distinctions always breed civil distinctions, and the nature of man in society being what it is, men gladly submit to slavery if they are filled with the hope that they can themselves enslave others. From the great inequalities among men rise numerous evils, one of the greatest being despotism, which is bound to result in the overthrow of the despot through revolution.

Rousseau ends his discourse with a ringing declaration of the superiority of man in the state of nature over man in a state of society. The former is diametrically opposed to the latter. Man in nature is peaceful and free, wanting only to live and be free from work. Man in society is always toiling and sweating, moving, even rushing into death in order to live. Rousseau's conclusion is that all inequalities that now weigh man down result from the development of man's faculties and working of his mind. Further, it is clear that moral inequality opposes natural right.

The essay is in general a passionate explanation of the author's belief in the ideal state of man. It purports to be, and usually is to a certain extent, an unbiased and learned examination. Rousseau slights certain areas and telescopes others, passing over them with a brief word of what he could prove had he the time or inclination to present evidence; however, these passages do not invalidate or even weaken the argument in general.

Stylistically, the essay is often weak because the arguments are not tightly organized and presented. Though impassioned, it does not have the power of Rousseau's later works, especially Du Contrat Social or the Confessions.

DISCOURSES

Type of work: Dialogues

Author: Pietro Aretino (1492-1556)

Time: Sixteenth century

Locale: Rome

First published: Part I, 1534; Part II, 1536

Principal characters:

NANNA, a courtesan

ANTONIA, her friend

PIPPA, Nanna's daughter

Pietro Aretino won his reputation as "the Scourge of Princes" with his sharp, scurrilous attacks on the important men of his time; he is best known as a writer for his vigorous, witty, often obscene plays and dialogues that show him as a realist and something of an ironist. He was deeply conscious of the moral corruption of his age, but he was for the most part content to portray it vividly without endeavoring to reform it.

The Discourses (Ragionamenti) is based on an underlying premise that sex is the overriding concern of all human beings. Aretino treats the subject with great humor and gusto. He is a gifted storyteller and an acute observer of the mores of society, skillful at painting every detail of a lavish banquet or a lady's costume.

In this work Aretino has linked together a succession of tales, beast fables, and anecdotes with a narrative framework, using a pattern successfully employed by Chaucer in The Canterbury Tales and Boccaccio in The Decameron; the tone of his work is close to that of Chaucer's fabliaux, the tales of the miller, the reeve, the friar, and others of the bawdier pilgrims. Each of the two parts of Aretino's Discourses consists of three days' conversation. In Part I, Nanna takes up successively the life of the nun, the wife, and the courtesan.

Part II deals with rules for the successful prostitute, the "Betrayals of Men," and the "art" of the procuress.

On the first day Nanna, a witty, experienced courtesan, tells her friend Antonia about her entrance into a convent. Leaving grieving lovers behind, she went with fear and trembling toward what she feared was to be a grim, ascetic existence. She describes, ironically in the light of what follows, the solemn ceremony in which they divested her of her worldliness, then goes on to recount the sights that greeted her when she entered the nunnery. Pretty young nuns and handsome, merry priests feasted together in the greatest luxury, eating and drinking their fill while laughing and talking throughout the meal that was theoretically governed by the rule of silence. The banquet concluded with what can only be described as an orgy, while Nanna and a companion went strolling down the hall, entertaining themselves by spying through cracks in the wall on the grotesque amours of the older nuns. Aretino spares no details to make the scene as corrupt and disgusting as possible.

To enlighten Antonia about the deceptions commonly practiced by wives, Nanna tells several tales, all calculated to reveal the cleverness of women. In the first a doctor's wife, renowned throughout her village for her ostentatious piety, pays frequent visits to a hermit, who "stole time for his devotions" from tending his elaborate garden. The "holy couple" was discovered in bed by a villager, who promptly summoned his friends and the parish priest to see the sight. The hermit, awakened by the commotion, was unperturbed. Everyone knows, he explained, that holy men sin only when they are possessed by demons; he could not be blamed for his actions. Taking her cue from him, the doctor's wife immediately feigned madness, recovering her senses only after she had three times touched the holiest relics in the church, the two knuckle bones of the holy innocents.

Heavy irony pervades Nanna's second tale of unfaithful wives. The "heroine" is described in lyric terms. She seems to float in the air when she walks, and she genuflects with such grace that "it seemed it must be the way they did it in paradise." This paragon of virtue is desperately anxious to escape the close surveillance of her elderly husband, "called the Count from some worthless old castle or other with two chimneys and a crumbling moat." She pretends to walk in her sleep, sure that her husband will follow her, and causes him to fall and break his leg. Bedridden, he hires ten stalwart young men to guard his wife for him, and she, having accomplished what she wanted, "sleepwalks" nightly with these guards.

Nanna's description of the courtesan's life is filled with similar stories. She tells Antonia how she deceived her various lovers and filled her purse in the process. Each of her stories indicates that avarice and not lust is the dominating force in this kind of life.

At the end of the third day Antonia, considering all that Nanna has told her, advises her to make her daughter Pippa a prostitute, for it seems the most honest life of the three. Both the nun and the wife betray sacred vows, while the whore, like the soldier, "is paid for doing wrong, and doing it, she is not to be held for so doing, because that is what her shop has to sell." Her life is a luxurious one, and a little penitence at the end will clear her of her sins.

The second part of the Discourses is briefer and more disconnected than the first; it seems to have been written to capitalize on the popularity of its predecessor. The first day's discussion begins as Pippa pouts and begs her mother to make her a courtesan, as her godmother Antonia has advised. Nanna agrees and gives her daughter a few basic rules of the profession. In dealing with Spaniards, who carry on their courtships with flowery language and much hand kissing, return bow for bow and kiss for kiss, but get rid of them as quickly as possible. A Frenchman, on the other hand, should be welcomed at once, for in making love to him, one can steal the shirt from his back. Nanna reserves her greatest praise for the men of Venice, where Aretino made his home for the latter part of his life; they are generous and kind—ideal lovers, in fact.

Nanna recounts several anecdotes in the same vein as the stories told on the third day of the first group of dialogues: accounts of elaborate schemes for fleecing unsuspecting customers. She deceived one violent-tempered suitor with an elaborate plot, provoking him to strike her, then hiring a friend to paint a hideous scar on her face. Hoping to avoid arrest for assaulting her, her lover sent lavish gifts, money, and doctors to attend her. He made a settlement of five hundred ducats and paid more to have the scar "healed" by another swindler. Nanna finally restored him to her favors in return for the promise of a new dress.

Perhaps the most famous passage in the Discourses is the description of the sack of Rome by the Germans, described by Nanna as an example of the "Betrayals of Men." Aretino displays great scorn for the Romans who, hearing of the invaders, decked themselves in their finest uniforms, then fled in panic. There is a vivid description of the horrors of the night when no church, no home, no hospital offered sanctuary from the enemy. "The pity was to hear husbands, red with the blood which streamed from their wounds, calling for their lost wives in a voice that would have made the solid block of the Coliseum weep."

A stark description of the rape of a young prostitute by thirty-one stablemen reinforces Nanna's comments on men. A lighter tale, the account of the deception of a silly young wife by a poet she had been pursuing, concludes the second day's conversation.

Nanna and Pippa listen to a godmother and a nurse as they comment upon the superiority of the procuress to the prostitute, the subject of the final dialogue. The godmother tells them how she once lured strangers to the homes of young courtesans, where they were robbed of their cloaks as well as of their cash. She also boasts of her part in the elopement of a young wife, whose elderly husband was duped into admitting her lover into their home to cure his toothache.

Although Aretino's Discourses is not great literature, it is entertaining in much the same way that the Elizabethan comedies about clever rogues are. The author, giving a lively picture of the seamier side of life in his time, writes in a style that, applied to more significant topics, might have given him a much higher place among Renaissance men of letters than he now holds.

DOCTOR ZHIVAGO

Author: Boris Pasternak (1890-1960)

Locale: Moscow, the Eastern Front, Siberia

First published: 1958

Principal characters:

YURI ANDREIEVICH ZHIVAGO, physician, poet, and a man of good will

EVGRAF ANDREIEVICH ZHIVAGO, his half brother

NIKOLAI NIKOLAIEVICH VEDENIAPIN (UNCLE KOLIA), his maternal uncle

ANTONINA ALEXANDROVNA GROMKA (TONIA), his wife

LARISA FEODOROVNA GUISHAR (LARA), wife of Pavel Antipov

PAVEL PAVLOVICH ANTIPOV (PASHA), a Red commissar

INNOKENTII DUDOROV (NIKA), the son of a revolutionary terrorist MISHA GORDON, the son of a Jewish lawyer and a friend of Yurii
Zhivago
VICTOR IPPOLITOVICH KOMAROVSKY, a shady lawyer, seducer of Lara
LIBERIUS AVERKIEVICH MIKULITSYN, a Red partisan leader
TANIA, the daughter of Yurii Zhivago and Lara

It is unfortunate that the furor over Doctor Zhivago should have swept Boris Pasternak's novel so quickly into the realm of front-page news, an area of journalistic expediency in which the intense moral vision of experience functions awkwardly at best. For the true work of art never stands for this or that; it simply exists, separate and complete and self-contained, and it makes no compromises with the world of things as they are. This is one reason why the book, inevitably seized upon as a club with which to bludgeon the ideology and bureaucracy of the Kremlin, should have turned out to be a two-edged weapon, as much a reproach to certain attitudes of democratic complacency as it is an indictment of the totalitarian state. Understandably, Pasternak's literary position became embarrassing abroad as well as difficult at home, for the very simple reason that much of the acclaim which greeted his novel outside Russia was based on misunderstanding of his purpose. Pasternak was a poet-novelist, not a political pamphleteer. As a propaganda tool of the cold war, his sprawling, uneven novel lacks the single-minded concentration and drive of the inspired polemic. It is superb, however, as a statement of human dignity and of man's capacity for integrity, faith, courage, and endurance; and it is as a work in the great moral tradition of Turgenev, Tolstoy, and Dostoevski that it must be judged.

The remarkable thing is that nothing in the external circumstances of Pasternak's career had prepared readers outside the Iron Curtain for the explosion his novel touched off. Son of Leonid Pasternak, the bourgeois painter who illustrated Tolstoy's novels, and Rosa Kaufman Pasternak, a concert pianist, he grew up in the cultured atmosphere of the pre-revolutionary Russian intelligentsia, studied music under Scriabin and philosophy in Germany, and published his first book of poems at twenty-three. With Esenin and Mayakovsky he emerged as one of the three leading poets of the early Soviet regime. To him, as to many of his generation, it may have seemed that the events of 1917 held the promise of the future. If so, the dream of freedom soon faded. Esenin and Mayakovsky died by their own hands during the decade of civil war, mass violence, and terror which followed. Pasternak survived the persecutions and purges by preserving a discreet public silence. Except for translations of some of his early poems and sketches, he was known to the Western world, if at all, as a poet who no longer wrote verse, a translator of Shakespeare and Goethe.

Perhaps Pasternak's years of silence were also a season of pondering and preparation. Doctor Zhivago contains a revealing passage in which Yurii Zhivago dreams of writing a prose work on a vast scale, a book of impressions of all he had seen and thought about; his poems are a preparation for this major task. He did not live to create his grand project, but this book is undoubtedly Pasternak's, a novel powerfully imagined, deeply concerned with the moral issues of human conduct, and set against the background of a world falling apart and, through loneliness and cruelty and fear, involving a whole society in the common destruction.

The opening chapters give an impression of complexity and spaciousness. In the leisurely fashion of the full-bodied nineteenth century novel, Pasternak sets his stage, introduces his people, and draws the threads of his story together.

Ten-year-old Yurii Zhivago, the son of a wealthy profligate who has deserted his family, attends his mother's funeral in the company of his Uncle Kolia; they stay that night at a nearby monastery and to the boy, waking in the darkness, the snow-covered landscape beyond his window suggests an empty, alien world. Young Misha Gordon, traveling with his father, sees the older Zhivago kill himself in a leap from a moving train. Nika Dudorov, whose parents were a nihilistic terrorist and a Georgian princess, is being brought up in the household of Kilogrigov, a philanthropic industrialist. After his father, a revolutionary and a railway worker, has been exiled to Siberia, Pasha Antipov is taken in by the Tiverzin family, also revolutionaries. Amalia Guishar, the French widow of a Russian engineer, arrives in Moscow and opens a dressmaking establishment; her protector is Victor Komarovsky, an unscrupulous lawyer who eventually succeeds in seducing her daughter Lara.

Before long these lives begin to criss-cross. During their schooldays Yurii Zhivago and Misha Gordon live in the home of Alexander Gromeko, a professor of chemistry; their companion is Tonia, daughter of Gromeko and his ailing wife, Anna Ivanovna. Pasha and Nika take part in student riots. One night, by chance, after Madame Guishar has attempted suicide, Yurii sees Lara looking at her betrayer and guesses their secret. Lara, following an unsuccessful attempt to shoot Komarovsky, becomes a governess in the Kilogrigov household; later she marries Pasha and goes to live with him in a hamlet beyond the Urals. Yurii discovers his vocation as a poet but instead chooses a career in medicine because he believes that art is not a vocation, any more than melancholy or cheerfulness is a profession. For him most choices are as simple as that. During his student years he reveals an almost Dostoevskian gift of innocence which he never loses and which makes him vulnerable, in the end, to forces beyond his power to order or control. This trait is part of the greater, enveloping mystique which in the novel throws over much that is brutal and sordid a radiance of goodness and truth, symbolized by the light seen briefly in a strange house as Yurii and Tonia drive by to a Christmas party. Later he writes a poem about that light in the window, and at the end he dies in the same house. He marries Tonia and their first child is born shortly before World War I.

The novel's early promise of Tolstoyan richness and profusion in character and scene is never fulfilled, for with the outbreak of the war the tempo of events quickens abruptly. Yurii Zhivago serves in a hospital unit at the front. Wounded, he is nursed by Lara Antipova, who is to become the great love of his life. So he finds himself married to a wife whom he sincerely respects and loves, but at the same time pulled toward Lara by a tide of passion which sweeps him along into the unsettled years ahead. The Moscow to which he returns after the October Revolution is a city ravaged by riots and disease, from which he flees with his family to an estate, the property of Tonia's grandfather, in the Urals. The account of this journey across Russia in winter is one of the great set pieces of the novel; all Russia is on the move, restless, threatening, violent. In the village where the Zhivagos settle Yurii meets Lara again and is once more drawn to her until he is seized by a band of Red partisans and forced into service as their doctor during a campaign of guerrilla warfare against the Whites in Siberia. After his escape he returns to find that his family has gone back to Moscow. He and Lara live together in an abandoned farmhouse for a brief period of perfect happiness. Then, about to be arrested because they have become politically suspect, he sends her to safety with Komarovsky, who has become an official of the new regime. Another great scene of the novel is that in which Zhivago encounters Pasha for the last time. Pasha, now called Strelnikov—

"The Shooter"—has been a feared and hated commissar of the civil war, but he himself is in flight from Red authorities who have denounced him as he has denounced others. His suicide after a night of wild accusation and abject confession points eloquently to the revolutionary madness of the period.

Back in Moscow, Zhivago finds his life empty and meaningless. His family has found refuge in Paris. He marries a younger woman, the daughter of a former porter in the Gromeko house, practices medicine, and writes a few scientific papers. In the end he is befriended by his strange half brother Evgraf, an ambiguous figure whose relationship with Yuri Zhivago remains shadowy and symbolic. After the doctor dies of a heart attack, Evgraf arranges for the publication of a collection of Yuri's poems, some of which make up the last chapter of the novel. During World War II he also discovers Tania, the daughter of Yuri and Lara, and provides for her future.

The twenty-four poems printed at the end of the novel are not a mere appendage, as unwary readers have supposed, but an integral part of Pasternak's examination into the nature of life and death; they complete the pattern of meaning by a final statement on the themes of love, death, and resurrection. Pasternak's technique throughout reveals the working of a poet's imagination and a poet's strategy with imagery and symbol, rather than the logic of the novelist—one reason, perhaps, why the book conveys an effect of subtlety and richness. It is a novel filled with luminous, compelling images of the land itself in all weathers and seasons, so that the life of man remains rooted in the life of nature, not in systems or institutions. If this method results at times in awkwardness of structure, it gains nevertheless in perspective and insight. The mystery of personality is revealed but not explained away. And life, says Yuri Zhivago, is stronger than men's efforts to control it to their own ends. For him it is the principle of self-renewal.

Good as the novel is in its great sense of life and in tracing through the particular incidents of particular lives the special terror which is history's contribution to our century, it gains added vigor from its deep roots in the Christian tradition. The purity of Pasternak's religious feeling, uncomplicated by sect or dogma, is without the self-consciousness most Western writers display in dealing with matters of religion; the Crucifixion and the Resurrection are in his view part of an ever-renewing miracle. Early in the novel Uncle Kolia, who acts as one of his spokesmen, relates the condition of man to the march of history and the Passion of Christ. His argument is that history is the centuries-old record of man's attempt to explore the riddle of death and to overcome it. All scientific discoveries and creation in art, he says, are spiritual, based on the two ideas of modern man, the idea of freedom of spirit and the idea of sacrifice. This theme is magnificently restated in "Garden of Gethsemane," the closing poem of the novel, eloquent in its promise of a risen Christ and its imagery of the centuries coming like a caravan out of darkness for judgment.

Doctor Zhivago is a novel of honesty and passion, not a work of abstraction set within a frame of historical reference. At the same time it is not a fiction of profound psychological depth such as we have had from the great visionaries and the midnight-haunted writers of the past, nor a massive fable in the manner of Melville or Dostoevski. Its meaning and relevance are of a different order. Boris Pasternak has looked at the history of his own time with what Henry James called the "imagination of disaster." Out of poetic apprehension and the knowledge so gained he has spoken to the conscience of the world. And the world has listened to his testimony concerning the moral condition of modern man in the sweep of history. That is the important thing.

DOSTOEVSKY

Type of work: Critical study
Author: Nicholas Berdyaev (1874-1948)
First published: 1934

Nicholas Berdyaev, one of the foremost religious thinkers of modern Russia, pays homage in Mirosozertzanie Dostoievskago (original English title: The World-Outlook of Dostoevsky) to the major influence upon his unique interpretation of Jesus Christ and the role of Christianity in the twentieth century. While his critical study throws considerable light on Dostoevsky's philosophy, it admittedly reveals Berdyaev's own religious and ethical concerns to such an extent that critic and subject are inseparable. In the first part of his analysis Berdyaev, beginning with a portrait of the Russian mind, discusses Dostoevsky's conceptions of man, freedom, evil, and love. In the second, he turns more to the implications of these conceptions in terms of modern Russia, politics, and especially their most complete statement, The Grand Inquisitor, the famous chapter from The Brothers Karamazov. Altogether, the critical study provides a significant key for the understanding of Berdyaev's remarkable intellectual career as well as for Dostoevsky's works.

Asserting that he thinks Dostoevsky Russia's greatest metaphysician, Berdyaev wants to unfold the dynamic ideas that he calls Dostoevsky's conception of the world. The Russian mind, he claims as a basis of his study, is an antagonistic dualism, in which the natural tendency is to seek such extremes that the individual is sharply torn by mutually exclusive positions. The "nihilists" avidly seek anarchy, atheism, and self-destruction; the "apocalypists" want only the most excessive ascetism and a messianic revival. These two sides of the Russian spirit are more fully expressed in Dostoevsky's fiction than in any other philosophy or literature; they create the passion that makes his novels so disturbing. This passion is the tragic view of human destiny, a view that he was able to communicate because he fully expressed the dualism that he found in himself and also because he saw life in depth, never on the surface. By holding the dualism that he found in himself and also because he saw life in depth, never on the surface, and by keeping the dualism always in its greatest tension, he created the true human spirit as it faces tragedy, undergoes purification through suffering, and finds release in Christ.

Although opposed to Humanism, Dostoevsky's absorbing theme was man and man's destiny; this theme was developed in such an intense manner that the inability of Humanism to solve the tragedy of human destiny is completely undermined. All of his novels are built around a single character who is the center of a whirlpool of passions that drive him away from a social framework; once the character completely alienates himself, he believes that he is emancipated from law and from God. But this "freedom" is the condition through which Dostoevsky plunges into the inner depths of man. According to the Humanistic view of the modern world, this alienated character should be free, but Dostoevsky shows that his freedom is really a descent into Hell, for the character develops an unhealthy self-love that makes him introspective and consequently miserable. Human nature, being extreme, antinomian, and irrational, is overwhelmingly attracted toward lawless freedom, and this lawlessness can end only in the deification of man or the discovery of God. In other words, freedom is a test that leads either to misery or to release; it is the essential condition of tragic suffering.

The justification both of God and of man rests in human freedom; thus, all of Dostoevsky's novels are concerned with the experiment of human liberty. Freedom is an amoral, valueless state out of which the dignity or debasement of man grows, but freedom, being amoral, implies the freedom of evil and the freedom of good, either of which will destroy the other. Thus freedom is essentially tragic, for once it is found, it presents the free man with choices that are beyond his power. Since freedom implies such a choice, Berdyaev believes that it is by nature Christian and that the figure of Christ presents itself as the ultimate and final freedom. The experience of complete freedom, embracing both good and evil, can lead to God, but more often it ends in self-will that cancels freedom by negating God and becoming trapped in compulsion. In fact, the usual mind advocates a freedom that negates evil, and without evil there would be no need for God because the world itself would be divine.

Wherever there is freedom, there must be evil; to reject freedom on the basis that it can bring evil is to make the evil twice as bad. Thus, while freedom can degenerate into evil, goodness cannot exist without it. Dostoevsky here saw clearly into the depths of human nature: evil rests in the depths of man's own personality—it is the sign of his inner profundity and the key to true personality, not a condition caused by society. In other words, evil is the inevitable tragic road that a man must travel before he can discover himself or God; the truly free man learns that evil will defeat and destroy itself and that through this purgation he can rise to spiritual adulthood. Thus, evil is an essential step in the spiritual process: Dostoevsky's heroes go through freedom and evil to redemption. In the state of freedom, the hero believes that everything is allowable; however, he becomes obsessed by some fixed idea, and with this obsession freedom becomes tyranny. He appears to be a maniac. But all things are not allowable, because men, having been created in the image of God, have an absolute value that the hero cannot violate without violating himself and becoming a slave. Yet if man were not completely free, he could do anything and be responsible for nothing; thus the state of freedom turns the hero into a divided man, able to become either a devil or a saint.

In Dostoevsky's treatment of love, Berdyaev sees the full depth of the novelist's profundity. Love is a Dionysian force that literally tears the individual to pieces. Woman is the dark principle that draws man toward a tragic sensuality or an equally tragic pity; there is no unity or perfection in his treatment of love. Instead it is a power that infects and destroys. Yet the blame rests entirely with the man; he is powerless before the female; she brings out the tragic separation of his own nature. In sexual as well as in social love, man's inner nature yearns for an excess that enslaves him; even pity takes on a violence that is self-destructive. The only kind of love that remains real is Christian love, an affirmation of eternity; all other love is an illusion and a lie.

Having outlined Dostoevsky's conception of human destiny, Berdyaev turns to the larger issues that grow out of this central vision; these issues—revolution, socialism, and modern Russia—place the heroes' struggles in significant frameworks that shape and are shaped by them. Of all of the Russian novelists, Dostoevsky saw clearest that revolution was inevitable; the very nature of the Russian mind dictated the excessive cry for freedom that led to socialism. Socialism, however, wants to displace God and fills itself with messianic spirit; it attempts to create a utopianism that denies evil and hence God. Thus freedom leads to slavery; man loses freedom by asking for too much lawlessness and comes under an unhuman force. In fact, Dostoevsky saw that the only way to end the conditions of nineteenth century Russia was through the Church—to find the freedom of brotherhood in Christ. But before that era, the Russian people must tread the path of evil, of humiliation and despair, that will purge them of their utopianism and allow a national redemption.

In The Grand Inquisitor, Berdyaev finds Dostoevsky's greatest statement of his religious views—the untangling of the problem of human freedom. Only two choices are available to man, the alternative of Jesus Christ or that of the Inquisitor; there is no third. Christ, who is silent throughout most of the chapter, offers the true freedom of the spirit; the Inquisitor confronts Him with compulsion, recognizing that people cannot bear the freedom offered by Christ. In one sense, the Inquisitor denies God in the name of man, but he also denies man because he believes that man can be happy only as a slave. What he overlooks is that Christ can be seen only through a free act of faith. Thus the deification of man ends in hopeless misery; Christ offers to the few a love that lifts man from self-destruction, but the freedom of Christ comes only through the renunciation of all claims to earthly power.

In portraying Dostoevsky's philosophy, Berdyaev thus shows that the novelist created a violent and contradictory world in order to describe what he regards as the basic Christian message. The movement through freedom and evil to redemption is to Berdyaev the fundamental theme of Dostoevsky's works and the philosophy that makes him great.

DRAMATIC MONOLOGUES AND LYRICS OF BROWNING

First published: Dramatic Lyrics, 1842; Dramatic Romances and Lyrics, 1845; Men and Women, 1855

Much of Browning's finest writing was done during his thirties, years which comprise most of the poems in the volumes Dramatic Lyrics, Dramatic Lyrics and Romances, and Men and Women. The intentions and procedures of these three volumes are similar, so that most often one's comments on the first two hold good for the third as well. In fact, Browning himself in a later collected edition reshuffled many of these poems, breaking down the divisions between individual books but preserving always the dominating premise that the poems should be, as he said, "though often Lyric in expression, always Dramatic in principle, and so many utterances of so many imaginary persons, not mine." During his middle years we see Browning striving to write poems at once less sentimental and more objective than those of his early hero, Shelley: he develops his own form of the dramatic monologue in the attempt to overcome subjectivity and vagueness, and his success here is in the nature of an overcompensation. The poems in these volumes, "always Dramatic in principle," are brilliant but somehow chilly.

Browning's verse-play, Pippa Passes, published in 1841, immediately precedes Dramatic Lyrics and by its superb rendering of the spirit of Italy—a country which is for Browning always the dialectical counterpart of England, a kind of anti-England—the play foreshadows the skeptical attitude conveyed by the poems. In "The Bishop Orders His Tomb at Saint Praxed's Church," in "My Last Duchess," and in the immense narrative poem The Ring and the Book the poet was later to draw implicit and explicit contrasts between contemporary England and Renaissance Italy. His habitual approach is in this way argumentative and skeptical, the counterbalancing of opposing countries, times, sexes, and beliefs which is suggested even by many of the titles in these volumes: "Meeting at Night" against "Parting at Morning," "Love in a Life" against "Life in a Love,"

"The Italian in England" against "The Englishman in Italy." The method permits Browning to end an elegant dialogue between two Venetian lovers, "In a Gondola," with a vicious stabbing. Alternately, he can present the interior monologue of a warped person, allowing the character to condemn himself by his (or her) words: as is the case of the female poisoner, crossed in love, in "The Laboratory," or the deranged murderer who speaks in "Porphyria's Lover." Perhaps the best of these interior monologues is the "Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister," in which a splenetic monk grumbles against his abbot:

GR-R-R—there go, my heart's abhor-rence!
Water your damn flower-pots, do!
If hate killed men, Brother Lawrence,
God's blood, would not mine kill you!
What? your myrtle-bush wants trimming?
Oh, that rose has prior claims—
Needs its leaden vase filled brimming?
Hell dry you up with its flames!

The lines are characteristic: not only does the voice contradict the speaker's appearance and vocation, but the very exclamations and dashes render the punctuation histrionic and serve to define a particular habit of mind.

The monologues which imply a listener are psychologically more complex. "My Last Duchess" and "The Bishop Orders His Tomb at Saint Praxed's Church," appeared in 1842 and 1845, respectively, and are models, in these earlier volumes, of the kind of irony and immediacy which the dramatic method at its best is capable of generating:

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive, I call That piece a wonder, now: Fra Pandolf's hands Worked busily a day, and there she stands.

Browning consciously follows Donne in beginning poems with arresting first lines. Here, much of the Duke's ruthlessness is conveyed at the very outset by his exquisitely casual reference, with the possessive "my", to his dead wife, by his evident pleasure at being able now to consider her as an art object, not as an intractable life-study:

She had A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked what-e'er
She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

Subtly, Browning manages to turn the Duke's criticism of his former wife, his specious yet elegantly phrased "how shall I say?" claim that she was too much alive, too indiscriminately joyous, into an exposure of his own monstrous pride in "a nine-hundred-years-old name." Flexible couplets with unobtrusive rhymes are the fit medium for his self-justifying logic and for the vicious sweetness which informs even his dealings with his present auditor, the envoy of the woman who will probably be Ferrara's next Duchess ("Will't please you rise?" addressed to the envoy is a command in the guise of a question). By tracing a logic of association in the blank verse of "The Bishop Orders His Tomb at Saint Praxed's Church," Browning focuses in a similar way on an incident of crucial importance for the self-revelation of his title character, the delirious churchman whose dying words concern pagan luxury and wordly pomp rather than Christian salvation.

Two dramatic monologues from the Men and Women volume, "Fra Lippo Lippi" and "How it Strikes a Contemporary," are explicitly concerned with aesthetics and the process of composition in poetry and painting. If we read between the lines of these poems, looking for the passages which most accord with Browning's actual practice, it is clear that he believes the best art is a universalizing of individual experience; and that to this end the poet or painter must be first of all curious, pre-eminently a noticer. Indeed, the verbs "notice," "mark," "see" are common in Browning's dramatic lyrics, where to notice a unique scene or situation is to exert an individual consciousness, and where to notice intensely is the first step in separating the apparent from the real and in beginning to write, a book that in words from The Ring and the Book, "shall mean beyond the facts." Accordingly, a collection of "so many utterances of so many imaginary persons" would escape the charge of subjectivity, yet taken as a whole it would convey a meaning beyond the mathematical sum of the dramatic lyric voices involved. These speakers reveal themselves far beyond what the occasion warrants, and the poems are essentially more dramatic and romantic than lyric. Browning takes definite pleasure in the vivid selfhood of his speakers, and pleasure as well in the multiple vision of the artist who can create and embody conflicting viewpoints while remaining himself uncommitted.

Browning's interest in conflict, incongruity, even in the grotesque, has its natural complement in his dramatic technique. The range of styles and effects is as various as the range of complexity among his characters. "An Englishman in Italy" exhibits a cataloguing, descriptive style, for instance in the request that one observe a fishing skiff from Amalfi, with alien English eyes watching

. . . Our fisher arrive,
And pitch down his basket before us,
All trembling alive
With pink and gray jellies, your sea-fruit;
You touch the strange lumps,
And mouths gape there, eyes open, all manner
Of horns and lumps. . . .

In "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," and in "Incident of the French Camp," Browning manages well two very different kinds of narrative. The mode of "Pictor Ignotus," an early monologue which looks ahead to "Andrea Del Sarto" and "Fra Lippo Lippi," is one of ratiocination, following a proud artist's ebb and flux of thought:

O human faces, hath it split, my cup?
What did ye give me that I have not saved?
Nor will I say I have not dreamed (how well!)
Of going—I, in each new picture, —forth,
As, making new hearts beat and bosoms swell,
To Pope or Kaiser, East, West,
South or North. . . .

There is also the lyric outcry of "Home-Thoughts, From Abroad," with its famous lines, "Oh, to be in England/Now that April's there." Browning's metrical range is diverse and experimental as well; in "Boot and Saddle" and "How They Brought the Good News From Ghent to Aix" he brilliantly turns the difficult anapestic meter to his own purposes, for both poems succeed in conveying by a kind of metrical imitation the excitement of a fast ride on a horse ("I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three"). Finally, it accords well with Browning's perspectivism, his prizing of unique objects and irreducible selfhood, that he should have created a new metrical or stanzaic form for almost every separate poem.

These earlier poems are a true representation of Browning in that they show him to be intellectually ingenious but no philosopher; an experimenter with both social and literary norms but by no standard a Victorian radical; a writer aware of evil and violence, but for the most part a cautious optimist. The later poems and The Ring and the Book bear out one's sense that his major achievement is in fact in these dramatic poems of his middle years, where the view of truth as relative is first impressively demonstrated in dramatic monologues. There is, of course, something deeply subversive in the notion that different points of view are equally valid, in the oblique yet damaging criticisms of Victorian sexual and religious conventions conveyed in some of these poems, in the attacks on bureaucracy such as the telling poem written against the "official" Wordsworth, "The Lost Leader." The dramatic monologue, at once objective and subjective, public and private in its methods, was the main vehicle used by Browning for criticism of Victorian society and manners; the monologue permitted ethical pronouncements to be made through someone else's voice, as it were, ventriloquially.

Thus in "My Last Duchess," in "Bishop Blougram's Apology," in many of his best poems Browning is a public writer with disturbing private tendencies: he never pushes exposure or criticism past the point of pleasure, and his work as a whole gives an effect of hard impersonal brilliance. Browning was typically a man of his age in believing that the poet was a moral agent in his society, a "Maker-see" whose concerns were norms and value, the discovery and presentation of a heightened reality. Yet in wishing to write poems which would mean "beyond the facts" he settled on a method which from the start excluded personal directness. Because all his sincerities and critiques had to be conveyed indirectly, these poems for all their peculiar triumphs will be found to lack the keynote of passionate personal despair which is the most profound theme in the finest Victorian poetry.

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Author: Robert Browning (1812-1889)

First published: 1864

When Robert Browning published Dramatis Personae he was just beginning to gain a measure of general esteem, both in the eyes of the public and of the critics. The year before its publication a three-volume collection of his earlier works had sold moderately well. Dramatis Personae added considerably to his popularity, and a second edition was called for before 1864 was out. It is ironic that this volume, the first that can be said to have achieved popular success, contained the first clear signs of the decline of his poetic powers.

It was his first volume of new poems since Men and Women, published in 1855. In the interval the pattern of Browning's life had undergone complete transformation. On June 29, 1861, his wife had died. They had made their home in Italy; after her death, Browning returned to England. For years he had been virtually out of touch with the currents of English thought. Now he plunged into a society that was perplexed by what it had learned and troubled by what it had come to doubt. Browning was soon personally involved in the intellectual and religious controversies of the day.

The changes in his life produced changes in his poetry. His love poems, understandably, became more melancholy. Many of the poems in Men and Women had had historical settings; all but a few of those in Dramatis Personae have contemporary settings. Even when he gives his version of an old tale, as in "Gold Hair: A Legend of Pornic," he manages to work in discussion of nineteenth century problems. In general, he was becoming more argumentative, more of a preacher. He still preferred the dramatic mode of utterance but the voice of the poet is often heard behind the dramatic mask.

Two of the important themes in the volume are love and death, frequently juxtaposed. The death of Mrs. Browning may have been an influence on his choice of subjects, but it should not be overestimated; a number of the poems antedate her death. "Prospice," however, written in the fall of 1861, is clearly Browning speaking in his own voice. It is an open affirmation of belief in immortality. When death ends his life, he says, as it has ended hers,

O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be the rest!

In "Too Late" another man grieves over a dead woman, but with a difference. He had never expressed his love for her and now suffers not grief alone but regret at having missed his opportunity. It is a familiar theme in Browning, love unfulfilled through negligence, expressed earlier in "The Statue and the Bust," and, elsewhere in Dramatis Personae, in "Youth and Art," and in "Dis Aliter Visum; or Le Byron de Nos Jours." If "Too Late" has an autobiographical element it is of an inverse order: Browning, unlike the speaker, had not missed his opportunity for love. The speaker of "Too Late" says it would have been better to . . . have burst like a thief

And borne you away to a rock for us two
In a moment's horror, bright, bloody, and brief,
Then changed to myself again

Browning, a sedentary man, had stepped out of character once in his life, when he had spirited a middle-aged poetess off to Italy.

Two of the finest poems in Dramatis Personae, also love poems, are "Confessions" and "James Lee's Wife" (originally called, misleadingly, "James Lee"). One reason why they are perennially satisfying is that, unlike many poems in the volume, they are free from topical controversy. In "Confessions," one of Browning's shortest dramatic monologues, a dying man recalls, with satisfaction, a love affair of long ago:

How sad and bad and mad it was—
But then, how it was sweet!

In "James Lee's Wife," as in Tennyson's "Maud," the story is that of the death of love. It is a restrained, dignified cry of heartbreak, a skillfully wrought dramatic lyric, the desolate scene and the dying year serving as mute echoes of the speaker's mood.

Of the eighteen poems originally grouped in Dramatis Personae (two occasional pieces were later added: "Deaf and Dumb" and "Eurydice to Orpheus"), few are not cluttered with argument. Of these, none besides "James Lee's Wife" and "Confessions" is particularly memorable. "The Worst of It" is mawkish; "May and Death" is pleasant, but slight; "A Face" and "A Likeness" are insignificant. It should not be assumed, however, that the remaining poems, those which do serve as vehicles for Browning's beliefs, can all be dismissed as inferior poems.

"Caliban upon Setebos," for example, is not only a statement of Victorian religious belief; it is as well one of Browning's successful poems of the grotesque. But the controversial element is certainly there, as indicated by the subtitle: "Natural Theology in the Island." Browning is satirizing those who, relying too closely on their own resources, posit God in their own image. And Caliban is not merely a figure taken from Shakespeare's The Tempest; he is also a post-Darwinian figure, a poet's version of the evolutionary "missing link." The topical references in the poem do not, however, prevent it from being rated one of Browning's best dramatic monologues.

"A Death in the Desert," another dramatic monologue, is perhaps more seriously marred by its attempts to promote certain religious ideas. Proponents of the "higher criticism" of the Bible—Strauss in Leben Jesu and New Life of Jesus, Renan in La Vie de Jésus—had attempted, among other things, to prove that the Gospel of St. John had not been written, as had been assumed, by the beloved disciple. Browning's poem, an imaginative re-creation of John's death, is an argument for the authenticity of the Gospel. It contains a number of Browning's religious positions (e.g., a theory about miracles). The fact that it is the dying Apostle who gives expression to these ideas is anachronistic: many of them are clearly indigenous to the middle of the nineteenth century. As a result, the dramatic effect of the poem is appreciably undercut.

The longest poem in Dramatis Personae, "Mr. Sludge, 'The Medium,'" its 1525 lines comprising three-eighths of the entire volume, is more successful. It is one of Browning's liveliest character studies, not unworthy of comparison with the great dramatic monologues in Men and Women. But it too is tinged by Browning's growing fondness for argument. Browning satirizes spiritualism, quite a fad in the mid-nineteenth century England, by portraying a fraudulent medium whose character is based on an American, Daniel Dunglass Home, whom Browning had met. Moreover, Mr. Sludge, the speaker, gives voice, although inconsistently, to some of Browning's characteristic religious ideas. The propagandizing is done rather subtly, however, and does not strike the reader as being obtrusive.

"Rabbi Ben Ezra" and "Abt Vogler" are similar to "Mr. Sludge" in being good poems as well as statements of opinion with regard to contemporary questions. The first eight sections of "Abt Vogler" are a brilliant tour de force, a lyrical evocation of the exalted spirit of a musician improvising at the keyboard of an organ. The last four sections are not quite so successful, being too flat an exposition of one of Browning's pet theories, the "philosophy of the imperfect":

On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect round.

And what is our failure here but a triumph's evidence

For the fullness of the days?

But the argumentative element does not predominate; sound and sense are not at odds but in harmony with each other. It was one of Browning's favorites, among his own poems, and it has since been one of the favorites of his readers.

"Rabbi Ben Ezra," another of Browning's most popular poems, is perhaps somewhat less successful than "Abt Vogler." It is unsurpassed, however, as an expression of Browning's own belief in God. Some have suggested that he intended it to be an answer to the hedonism of Edward FitzGerald's The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, but if this is true it is less than obvious in the poem itself. The ideas contained in it are typical of Browning. He says, for example:

What I aspired to be,
And was not, comforts me. . . .

We are reminded of Andrea del Sarto's dictum in Men and Women: "A man's reach should exceed his grasp." Above all, "Rabbi Ben Ezra" is a cogent presentation of Browning's famous and frequently, if too facilely, maligned optimism.

"Gold Hair: A Story of Pornic" is a curious and troubling poem. The body of it relates an old story about the death of a young girl. She had been regarded virtually as a saint; years after her death, however, it is learned that she had been interested in earthly treasure far more than in a heavenly one. Some have objected to the story itself but that, though macabre and a bit cynical, is really unobjectionable. What ruins the poem are the last three stanzas Browning has tacked on:

Why I deliver this horrible verse?

As the text of a sermon, which now
I preach:

Evil or good may be better or worse

In the human heart, but the mixture of each

Is a marvel and a curse.

The candid incline to surmise of late
That the Christian faith may be false,
I find;

For our Essays-and-Reviews' debate
Begins to tell on the public mind,
And Colenso's words have weight:

I still, to suppose it true, for my part,

See reasons and reasons; this, to begin:
'Tis the faith that launched point-blank
her dart
At the head of a lie—taught Original Sin,
The Corruption of Man's Heart.

Browning makes no bones about his intention to preach, and the value of his stories begins to decline as they become more and more pointedly the texts for sermons.

"Apparent Failure," a lesser poem, again finds Browning speaking in his own voice. The story is merely the occasion for moral instruction; it is in Browning's own words, "the sermon's text."

The final poem in Dramatis Personae, "Epilogue," gives brief expression to three religious positions current when Browning wrote. The "First Speaker, as David," sums up the High Church, ritualistic position; the "Second Speaker, as Renan," expressed the skepticism of one familiar with the "higher criticism." The "Third Speaker," Browning himself, answers the first two, calling ceremony unnecessary and belief tenable. Browning's belief, not unlike Tennyson's, is sustained by personal feeling rather than by a process of the reason. What is really significant about the poem is that it makes no pretense of being dramatic. It sets the pattern for the bulk of his later poems, for Browning's values have changed; controversy now means more to him than writing poems, for poetry has become the vehicle for argument. Inevitably, poetry suffers, as some of the poems in this volume and virtually all of the later poems, save The Ring and the Book, clearly testify.

THE EAGLE AND THE SERPENT

Type of work: Autobiographical chronicle

Author: Martín Luis Guzmán (1887-)

Time: 1913-1915

Locale: Mexico and The United States

First published: 1928

Principal characters:

THE NARRATOR

FRANCISCO VILLA, revolutionist, commander of the "Division of the North"

VENUSTIANO CARRANZA, supreme chief of the Constitutionalist army

The Mexican Revolution, perhaps the only one military movement that changed radically the position of a Latin American country after achieving its independence from Spain, affected in different ways the Mexican writers of those days. Some remained indifferent; others defended its motives and facts; a few engaged themselves actively in its vicissitudes. To no one can be attributed greater and more direct participation than that of Martín Luis Guzmán. Executor, witness, chronicler, interpreter, critic, novelist, he embraced all the possible angles of relationship with the Mexican Revolution. For this reason his work about the movement is the closest, most objective and penetrating of all the literary productions written upon the subject.

Guzmán wrote three books—at the same time biography, history, and novel—about the Revolution: El Aguila y la Serpiente (The Eagle and the Serpent), La Sombra del Caudillo, and Memorias de Pancho Villa (Memoirs of Pancho Villa). Of these, the nearest to a work of the creative imagination is the first, published in fascicles in 1926 and as a book in 1928.

The reasons why Guzmán titled his book in such a way may be found in the origins of Mexican nationality. The Aztecs, the main indigenous ancestors of Mexico, had as a legendary core of their nomadic period the belief that they should found their capital city in a spot where they would find an eagle, devouring a serpent, perched upon a nopal. Guzmán took these images and turned them into symbols for his book, to show the bipolarity of Mexican history, in constant conflict between repentant passions and an ascension of the spirit.

There is no better source to know the genesis and spirit of this book than the speech pronounced by the author at the time of his reception as a member of the Mexican Academy of the Language. Son of his time and his country, Guzmán declared that from his earliest childhood he was accustomed to beauty from having lived in Tacubaya, one of the most charming suburbs of Mexico City, near the Chapultepec Castle, scene of many decisive moments in Mexican history, and that this same environment imposed on him a feeling for history in all its grandeur. Some years later, when he embraced the cause of the Revolution, he had at his disposal raw historical material of the first quality, out of which he took the subject for his most representative books.

For a long time Guzmán hesitated to write about the Revolution. On one side he had been the witness of ruthless crimes, usurpations, disloyalties; on another he had seen in many participants of that movement a great spirit of service, purity of intention, and patriotic goals. This knowledge finally moved him to write about the Revolution, to transform into literary values those violent deeds against the Porfirio Díaz' dictatorship. He finally decided to embody what he had seen or done. He thought that if the chief leaders of the Revolution had not been as faulty as they were, the Revolution would not have been what it became.

To understand some pages of this book, the reader must take into account the fact that the revolutionary movement was not born from a set of ideas but erupted from instinctive forces, submitted to oppression for many centuries.

El Aguila y la Serpiente, a work which brings together literature and history, truth and fiction, is divided into two parts: "Esperanzas Revolucionarias" ("Revolutionary Hopes") and "En la Hora del Triunfo" ("At the Hour of the Triumph"). In the first part, consisting of seven books, Guzmán tells of his revolutionary adventures during the period preceding the peak of the fighting. In the second section, also of seven books, he tells of deeds that occurred during the most turbulent years of the conflict.

The book opens when Guzmán, apparently the narrator of most of the work because of its strong autobiographical structure, escapes from Victoriano Huerta's usurping government and sets sails, incognito, in flight from Veracruz to the United States, with the intention of reaching the northern Mexican states of Sonora or Coahuila and helping Venustiano Carranza in his fight against Huerta. Aboard ship, he meets four Mexicans, one of them a physician who shares his political views. They establish relations with a beautiful American woman who turns out to be a spy of the Huerta government. When this fact becomes known to Guzmán and his associates, the physician, in order to get rid of her, pretends ardent love for the lady and proposes that they marry in Havana, the next stop on the voyage. The trick fails because the ship delays her departure in that port, after landing the Mexicans and the beautiful secret agent. Again aboard ship, the revolutionaries are afraid of being imprisoned upon their arrival in New York. Then the physician feigns intent to kill the spy, but the woman does not appear at any place when they go ashore. The reader glows perplexed over the fate of the woman, but the author does not add to what has already been told.

Guzmán, unable to carry out his plan to contact Carranza, returns to Mexico City. But his enthusiasm for the Revolution causes him to embark again for Havana and later for New Orleans. After traveling to San Antonio, Texas, he meets there José Vasconcelos, a writer and the only great minister produced by the Revolution, according to Guzmán. Finally, in Ciudad Juárez, the author meets Pancho Villa, who is for him the chief hero of the Revolution. The encounter is not as dramatic as could be expected, but an intimate, deep impression about Villa will remain with the writer. Later he is introduced to Venustiano Carranza, first chief of the Constitutionalist Army; the first ideological collision with him ensues because Carranza had the viewpoint that good will is the primary virtue in leading men; Guzmán believed in technique. The author met another revolutionary leader, Alvaro Obregón, whom he considers an impostor. Gradually, Guzmán realizes that sooner or later deep disagreement will arise among the fighters. He thinks that at the very bottom everything could be reduced to the eternal dispute of the Mexicans who are always looking for power and the accomplishment of personal ambitions instead of great, disinterested aspirations.

A good number of episodes are intermingled in this part of the work. Perhaps they are the most interesting and representative material in the novel. Among them, "A Night in Culiacán," "The Murdering Spider," "A Race in the Darkness," and "The Feast of the Bullets," emerge as masterpieces of suspense and narrative vigor. This part of the work ends when the author is again in Ciudad Juárez, under the influence of Villa, after a journey to New York.

The second part of the novel deals with the triumph of the Revolution as a group, but the schism between the leaders of the movement is inevitable, chiefly between Villa and Carranza. Guzmán joins Villa because he thinks that, in spite of the revolutionist's instinctiveness and moral blindness, he is the only possible leader who can give a democratic and impersonal character to the Revolution, in contrast with Carranza, who is too prone to oligarchy. The author arrives again at Veracruz, taken by American soldiers, and finally makes his way to Mexico City. Guzmán, exultantly, writes now the most lyric pages he has ever composed. The sight of the city and the volcanoes, the inhalation of the thin air of the plateau, the bath of clarity, the perfect adequation of person and environment, were some of the unforgettable impressions of the "rebel who returned," as Guzmán calls himself. He goes again to Chihuahua, meets Villa anew, and gets the impression that the legendary warrior could never exist if there were not a gun in the world. Villa and his pistol were a single thing; from his gun all his friendships and enmities were born. To combat now against Carranza, the writer goes to Mexico City again. For him Carranzaism is synonymous with ambition, lack of ideals, systematic corruption, and theft. Imprisoned by Carranza's orders, he is sent to Matamoros, but the Convention of Aguascalientes, a meeting of revolutionists in which was decided the way to future action of the movement, sets him free. Having been appointed Minister of War by President Roque González Garza, Guzmán rejects the post and is threatened with the penitentiary; but he escapes and goes to see Villa, who has been estranged by the Convention of Aguascalientes. The writer, caught between loyalty to the Convention and friendship toward Villa, expatriates himself to the United States.

THE EARTHLY PARADISE

Author: William Morris (1834-1896)

Of all the poems of William Morris, the most successful, in terms of popularity, is The Earthly Paradise, published originally in five thick volumes. Following closely the plan of The Canterbury Tales, this composition reveals Morris' attraction to Chaucer's method as well as his sense of beauty. Like Chaucer, he found in medieval legends and ancient myths material for his poetic narrative art; and he also found a general plan according to which these unrelated stories could be brought together harmoniously by a technique in which Eastern cultures had long anticipated Chaucer and other Europeans. Unlike Chaucer, whose plan was so large that he could not complete it, Morris, upon an almost equal scale, easily brought his work to a happy conclusion.

The prologue introduces a company of Norsemen who have fled the pestilence and set sail to seek the fabled Earthly Paradise "across the western sea where none grow old." Not having succeeded in their quest, they have returned "shrivelled, bent, and grey," after lengthy wanderings abroad, to a "nameless city in a distant sea" where the worship of the ancient Greek gods has not died out. In this hospitable city they spend the rest of their lives. Twice each month they participate in a feast at which a tale is told, alternately, by one of the city elders and one of the wanderers. The former tell tales on classical subjects, and the latter draw their tales from Norse and other medieval sources. Thus, of the twenty-four stories, twelve are Greek and classical and twelve are medieval or romantic. Each pair of stories corresponds with one of the twelve months, the first two being told in January, the second two in February, and so on. Thus the long poem is neatly partitioned into twelve books with interpolated prologues and epilogues in the form of lyrics about the progressive changes in nature. The Earthly Paradise actually revived in England an enthusiasm for long romances. Despite their high cost, many thousands of Morris' books were sold, and the effect was a favorable one for the new revival of romantic feeling which Morris was fostering in art and decoration as well as in literature. Instead of exhausting Morris, this poetic effort inspired him to embark on other vast projects such as the translation of Homer and Vergil and a modern version of a Scandinavian epic, Sigurd the Volsung.

Among the tales told by the wanderers in The Earthly Paradise, the most striking is "The Lovers of Gudrun," a version of the Icelandic Laxdaela Saga. It tells of Gudrun, daughter of a great lord in Iceland, who was loved by many men but especially by Kiartan, a youth of manly deeds and kindly disposition. Although Gudrun passionately returns his love, Kiartan, before he will marry her, goes with his bosom friend and cousin Bodli to seek fame in Norway, where he remains some years at the court of Olaf Trygvesson. When Bodli returns alone to Iceland, he yields to his passion for Gudrun and tells her that Kiartan has fallen in love with King Olaf's sister Ingibiarg and will marry her. Convinced of Kiartan's unfaithfulness, Gudrun brokenheartedly marries Bodli. When Kiartan returns to claim his bride, Gudrun curses Bodli, and the desolate Kiartan, half in contempt, spares his life. Despairing and taunted by those about him, Bodli participates in an ambush set up by Kiartan's enemies, treacherously slays his friend, and is in turn killed by Kiartan's brothers. Although Gudrun marries again, what remains indelibly with the reader is Morris' picture of her agonized realization of what, in her faithlessness, she has done:

She cried, with tremulous voice, and eyes grown wet
For the last time, what e'er should happen yet,
With hands stretched out for all that she had lost:
"I did the worst to him I loved the most."

Morris was a natural creator; that his hand could not outspeed his brain is evidenced by his composing seven hundred lines of poetry in a day. Years after the composition of The Earthly Paradise he explained the nonchalant attitude toward the writing of poetry which enabled him to race undaunted through that enormous project: "Waiting for inspiration, rushing things in reliance on inspiration, and all the rest of it, are a lazy man's habits. Get the bones of the work well into your head, and the tools well into your hand, and get on with the job, and the inspiration will come to you. . . ."

In spite of its quantity of production, his poetry has a remarkably high quality. Although somewhat lacking in humor, pathos, and rich humanity, it shows none of the crabbed agonies undergone by many poets. His range of subject matter is as broad as his composition was fluent. The very spacious cycle of stories in The Earthly Paradise includes these titles: "The Story of Theseus," "The Son of Croesus," "Cupid and Psyche," "The King's Treasure-House," "Orpheus and Eurydice," "Pygmalion," "Atalanta's Race," "The Doom of King Acrisius," "Rhodope," "The Dolphin and the Lovers," "The Fortunes of Gygis," "Bellerophon," "The Watching of the Falcon," "The Lady of the Land," "The Hill of Venus," "The Seven Sleepers," "The Man Who Never Laughed Again," "The Palace East of the Sun," "The Queen of the North," "The Story of Dorothea," "The Writing on the Image," "The Proud King," "The Ring Given to Venus," and "The Man Born to Be King."

These stories are so arranged that, with the revolving calendar, their temper becomes darker and stronger, developing into a sinister tone at the end. The full effect thus depends upon a continuous and consecutive reading. Conversely, the problem which arises as the reader progresses through this lengthy work is that the embroidery becomes too profuse to be sustained by the fabric. The result is the taint of decoration inherent in the Pre-Raphaelites—too much of beauty, love, languor, everything—so that the reader longs for a little substantial simplicity and cheerfulness. One might, therefore, argue for an occasional and selective reading of the stories, so long as their total scope is kept in mind.

The interludes give us glimpses into the poet's mind which are evidence that despite his disapproval of introspective poetry, Morris did not always avoid it. While the stories of The Earthly Paradise come from all parts of the medieval world, these poems of the months are unequivocally English; they give an admiring description of the land of Morris' birth and life. With variations, they repeat the keynote of the Prologue in which he characterizes himself as "the idle singer of an empty day" who has no power to sing of hell or heaven or to make death bearable. By "idle" Morris does not mean "useless" but, rather, one who can, by the scenes he presents, distract from "empty," daily cares. In this manner he acknowledged spiritual emptiness in his time.

Throughout this poetic work there runs a strain of despondency, doubt, and mild skepticism which records the poet's genuine pity for mankind. Although there is in the work an elemental vigor, glorying in youth, power, love, and possessions, these aspects of life are presented primarily through old men's memories. Despite the strong swift-moving action, the narrative generally seems grandly slow. Neither the tale-tellers nor the actors in the tales are particularly individualized as characters. Finally we see a vast, intricate tapestry with its panorama of interwoven figures.

ECLOGUES

Type of work: Pastoral poetry

Author: Publius Vergilius Maro (70 B.C.-19 B.C.)

First transcribed: c. 48-37 B.C.

Principal characters:

TITYRUS, an aging shepherd, sometimes thought to represent Vergil
MALIBOEUS, an exile

CORYDON, a lovelorn shepherd boy

DAPHNIS, in the fifth eclogue, a shepherd hero who had recently died

GALLUS, a poet and military leader, a friend of Vergil

Vergil's ten eclogues made their young author a nationally renowned figure when they were first made public about 39 B.C. Although these poems do not reach the heights of the Georgics or the Aeneid, they are the work of a master, not the hesitant stumblings of an apprentice writer. Vergil made the pastoral form, first popularized by Theocritus, his own and paved the way for many English poets who imitated him, among them Edmund Spenser, Philip Sidney, John Milton, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and Matthew Arnold.

Vergil's pastoral world is not populated by Dresden-china shepherdesses in a never-never landscape; while his shepherds have their light-hearted moments, they inhabit real Italian hills and farms from which they can be evicted by unjust landlords. Exile, loneliness, and poverty threaten many of the characters in the poems. Even the traditional lovelorn shepherds are tied to Vergil's world by the naturalness of the landscape in which they lament; the heat of the Italian summer, the shade of the willow tree, the rocky hillsides where sheep pasture—all are part of the total effect of the eclogues.

Much scholarly effort has been directed toward proving that these poems are allegories that deal with contemporary events. It seems more fruitful and more realistic to accept the fact that Vergil is commenting on conditions of his age, without searching for disguised poets and government officials. There is no certainty that any shepherd represents the poet's own view, although he has often been identified with Tityrus in the first eclogue.

This poem is one of the most realistic of the group; it reflects the days after Julius Caesar's assassination when residents of northern Italy were dispossessed to provide land for discharged soldiers. Meliboeus, one of the speakers, is among the exiles. He has left his newborn goats on the rocky road as he makes his way toward a new home in Africa, Scythia, or Britain. He laments the fact that the land he has labored to cultivate must fall into the hands of some barbarous veteran, and he inquires how his friend Tityrus has managed to escape the general desolation. Tityrus explains that he went to Rome to plead for his land and that a youth, whom some have identified with Augustus, granted his request, leaving him free to enjoy the humming of the bees on his neighbor's land. He offers his sympathy and his simple hospitality to the unfortunate Meliboeus.

The second eclogue is the disjointed lament of the Sicilian shepherd, Corydon, for his disdainful beloved, Alexis. Vergil conveys the character of Corydon brilliantly in his passionate, illogical outbursts, uttered as the boy wanders in the hot midday sun, when even lizards have sought shelter, recognizing the futility of his love, yet unable to forget the scornful youth and settle down to care properly for his vines.

Among the most vividly conceived personages of the eclogues are the two brash young shepherds who amicably insult each other in the third poem. Damoetas and Menalcas taunt each other with misdeeds they have witnessed; Damoetas has seen his friend slashing at a farmer's grapevines, while Menalcas suspects Damoetas of trying to steal a goat from Damon's flock. Damoetas spiritedly defends himself; he had won the goat legitimately in a singing match, but Damon refused to pay the prize. Menalcas scoffs at the notion of Damoetas' possessing such skill, and he is immediately challenged to a contest. The ensuing song follows the traditional pattern; the challenger sings one verse, then his opponent adds a second in keeping with the first, and the song moves from invocations to Jove and Apollo to tributes to the sweet-hearts of each singer to realistic comments on the scene. Each singer concludes with a riddle, and Palaemon, who has been brought in as judge, decides that both deserve prizes, as do all who know the joy or bitterness of love.

The most famous of these poems is the fourth, or Messianic, eclogue, in which Vergil prophesies the birth of a child who will usher in a new golden age when peace will prevail, man and nature will become self-sufficient, commerce will cease, and the land will need no further plowing and pruning. The poet laments that he will not survive to see this new age come to fruition, but he rejoices at being able to bid the infant smile at his mother.

The identity of the expected child has been cause for extensive speculation; both Antony and Augustus became fathers about this time, and Vergil may have politically refused to single out one or the other. However, throughout the Middle Ages Vergil was thought to have foreseen the birth of Christ; for this reason he became for later ages a kind of pagan saint.

The pastoral elegy, the form of the fifth eclogue, has been imitated more often than any of the other types of poetry in this collection. Readers of English poetry may find many echoes of Mopsus' lament for Daphnis, who is mourned by nymphs, lions, and by the men whom he taught to celebrate Bacchic rites. Since his death crops have failed, as if the flowers, too, lamented; only thorns and thistles grow where the violet and narcissus were planted. Mopsus' elegy concludes with a request for shepherds to build a mound for Daphnis and to carve an epitaph commending his fame and loveliness.

Menalcas rhapsodizes over his friend's verse, then begins his own elegy, in which he places Daphnis, now deified, at the gate of heaven, bringing peace to all the countryside. The mountains and rocks rejoice and the shepherds worship their new god in joyous rites. The contrasting moods of grief and exaltation remained a part of the pastoral tradition throughout succeeding ages, in poems like Milton's Lycidas and Shelley's Adonais.

The prologue to the sixth eclogue gives interesting insight into Vergil's poetic ambitions. The speaker, Tityrus, comments that his earliest poetry was in the Sicilian vein, pastoral, but that he had for a time turned to kings and battles until Apollo cautioned him that a shepherd poet should sing of the countryside. Therefore he depends on others to celebrate the great deeds of his friend Varus, while he must be content to dedicate to him his rustic song about the old satyr, Silenus, who tells young satyrs and naiads old tales about the creation, the Golden Age, the fate of Prometheus, and many other mythological legends. The reference within the poem to a scene in which the Muses bestowed a reed pipe upon Gallus, one of the best-known writers of Vergil's time, has led to the suggestion that in this eclogue allusions are made to Gallus' own work. The range of subject matter is wide, and there seems to be little connection between the various episodes in Silenus' narrative.

In the seventh eclogue another singing match is described. The song of Corydon and Thyrsis reflects Vergil's deep love for the countryside and for the simplicity of the life of the shepherds. The reader can almost see the mossy springs, the budding vines of the early spring, and the chestnuts.

The eighth poem is addressed to a Roman hero, variously identified as the consul, Pollio, who is mentioned within the body of the poem, or as Augustus. Vergil will attempt to please this nobleman with the pastoral song he requested, while he waits for a chance to record his heroic exploits. In the lyric itself Damon and Alphisiboeus recite songs for each other. The first is a lament for the infidelity of Nysa, Damon's beloved, who has married Mopsus. The deserted shepherd is both scornful and sentimental, at one moment recalling his first childhood meeting with the girl, at another bitterly berating the bridegroom or mourning the cold cruelty of the god of love. All nature should be upturned, with the wolf fleeing from the lamb and apples growing on oak trees when such a love does not take its natural course. The singer sees no final recourse but death; he will plunge from the mountain top into the waves below.

Alphisiboeus' song is a curious one. He speaks as a young girl who is trying to lure her lover home from town by witchcraft, and the song begins with a number of spells. The ashes on the girl's altar flame spontaneously in the last stanza, and she expresses her hope that the absent shepherd is, indeed, coming.

The mood of the first poem is recreated in the ninth as Moeris tells his friend Lycidas that he has been evicted from his property by a new owner. Lycidas expresses surprise; he had heard that Menalcas' poetry had preserved that land. Moeris, made wise in the world's ways by misfortune, replies that there was such a rumor, but that poetry has no force against the soldiers who are taking over the land. He and Menalcas barely escaped with their lives.

The thought that they might have lost the best of their shepherd poets recalls some of his lines to Lycidas and Moeris, and they quote them as they talk. One passage, referring to the new, beneficent star of "Olympian Caesar," has aroused special interest, since it obviously refers to the recently deceased Julius Caesar. This eclogue ends with an appealing scene, as Lycidas urges Moeris to stop and rest beside the calm lake they are passing and to sing as they watch countrymen pruning their vines.

The final poem is another tribute to Gallus, who was a highly competent military leader, as well as a fine poet; he served as Viceroy of Egypt after the defeat of Antony at the battle of Actium. Unfortunately, his pride led to his political downfall and probably also to the loss of his poetry; we must rely on Vergil's praise for an estimate of his talents.

Gallus' mistress, Lycoris, to whom most of his love poetry had been addressed, had run away to the north of Italy with another soldier. In Vergil's poem her betrayed lover laments her loss, followed by sympathetic shepherds. He resolves to seek what comfort he can in writing pastoral verse and hunting the wild boar, yet he cannot restrain a poignant hope that the sharp glaciers of the Alps will not cut the feet of his lost lady. He realizes, finally, that even poetry and hunting are powerless to mollify the god of love; he can only yield and accept his misery.

Vergil's Eclogues brought a new note of personal feeling and a fresh appreciation of nature into the highly artificial and rhetorical poetic tradition of his time. It is in large part this element of humanity that has sustained the appeal of his pastorals to the present day.

 MOSCO (MOSQUITO), a blind, legless beggar

Miguel Ángel Asturias, born in Guatemala, has spent much of his life elsewhere. Going to France in 1923, after finishing his studies as a lawyer at the University of Guatemala, he remained there for ten years, writing poetry in the French style and completing a novel about a Spanish American dictator that he had started before leaving home. He has also written other fiction and has served as Guatemala's diplomatic representative in France, Argentina, El Salvador, and Mexico. Following the increasing success of his writings, he retired to Buenos Aires with his wife and two sons.

It is chiefly for this bitter picture of a morally sick Latin American nation under dictatorship, a disease suffered by many of them, that he is recognized as an important New World author. The pictures of human misery in this novel make a powerful impression on even those critics who find it aesthetically weak. El Señor Presidente is rather like that other picture of Central American dictatorships, an example of esperpéntica, a mixture of satire and the grotesque.

The novel provides no clue as to date or locale, beyond the mention, when Cara de Ángel was searching the pages of El Nacional for an announcement of his wedding, that he saw mention of the Battle of Verdun, at a time when Manuel Estrada Cabrera was the Guatemalan president. Apparently Asturias had no special target in mind.

As if to lighten the unpleasant pictures of oppression and the exploitation of the poor, the author includes bits of folklore, references to 'Tohil, Giver of Fire, folk poetry, and descriptions that might have come from Asturias' earlier French impressionist poetry period. Local color and regional words are so numerous in the novel that Asturias felt the need to include a vocabulary and glossary covering eight pages. The French version of the novel was awarded first place in the International Novel Competition in 1952.

The novel that Asturias felt the need to name President of an unnamed Spanish American nation. He is a dictator who maintains himself in power by cruelty and ruthlessness, though his portrait, pasted everywhere, with punishment for its removal, makes him appear a youthful charmer wearing huge epaulets and about to be crowned with a laurel wreath by a smiling cherub. Judge Advocate de Guerra summed up the President's theory of control: never let anyone have grounds for hope; make them realize, by brutal beatings and kickings if necessary, that there is none. The President, lamenting the murder of his hatchetman, Colonel Parrales Sonriente, killed by a crazy beggar named Zany whom he had taunted on the cathedral steps, also revealed his philosophy by declaring that he had intended to make Parrales a general because of his ability to trample on the populace and humiliate them.

The killing of the officer provided the President with an excuse for getting rid of a political rival, General Canales, along with a fellow plotter, Lawyer Abel Carvajal. The Advocate General gathered up all the beggars from the cathedral door where the killing had taken place and beat them until they were willing to swear they had seen Canales commit the murder. The only one refusing to sign the accusation, Mosquito, the legless, blind beggar, was beaten to death. To prevent discovery of the true facts, Vásquez, of the secret police, came upon Zany, the real murderer, trying to flee, and silenced him with two bullets.

Further evidence of the merciless nature of the President is revealed as he orders the beating of his personal physician, Dr. Barreño, for uncovering political graft that had caused the death of soldiers at the hospital, poisoned by impure sodium sulphate. Even worse, he has his secretary whipped to death for spilling ink on a document. It is easy to understand how such a man could mark the innocent General Canales for death.

In order to carry out his scheme against General Canales, the President involved his crony, Miguel Angel Face, in an elaborate plot, first ordering the police to shoot the general if he attempted to flee, then sending Angel Face to warn him of his danger and urge him to escape. The crony, in love with the general's daughter, betrayed his master by getting his victim safely across the frontier. However, the general died before he could recruit an army for invasion.

Complications, including acceptance of bribes by the Judge Advocate to put Camila Canales into the Sweet Enchantment brothel, and her rescue by Angel Face, resulted in the arrangement of the marriage of Camila and Angel Face by the President to insure the loyalty of his crony, but through treachery Angel Face was illegally imprisoned and soon died. Other rebels against the President also died. As opposition continued, so did the atmosphere of terror that allowed the dictator's favorites to thrive in a generally corrupt society. With the Secret Police in power El Señor Presidente continued to have his way.

A dictatorship in Spanish America may have several aspects. It is frequently viewed by the outside world as a comic opera sort of thing. O. Henry and others have written of its amusing moments and its romantic and adventurous episodes such as gun-running, but frequently it is much more tragic and cruel. The stakes are high and the financial returns enormous. History records many long-term Latin American dictatorships. Asturias' novel shows how fear and terror can make such longevity possible.

THE ELDER STATESMAN

Author: T. S. Eliot (1888-1965)

Time: The present

Locale: London and Badgley Court, a nursing home

First presented: 1958

Principal characters:

LORD CLAVERTON, the "elder statesman"

MICHAEL CLAVERTON-FERRY, his son

MONICA CLAVERTON-FERRY, his daughter

CHARLES HEMINGTON, her fiancé

"FEDERICO GOMEZ," formerly Fred Culverwell

"MRS. CARGHILL" (Maisie Batterson, alias MAISIE MONTJOY), a woman out of Lord Claverton's past

At the first production of this play during the Edinburgh Festival in the summer of 1958, it was accorded more praise than had been given to Eliot's earlier dramatic works. It was described as being "warmer," "mellower," and "more human" than Murder in the Cathedral or The Cocktail Party, which had been received with the respectful attention due the work of a great poet rather than with any genuine enthusiasm. Yet since its publication in England and America, the play has attracted far less notice than might have been expected when one considers the reputation of its author.

In an essay of 1951, "Poetry and Drama," Eliot discussed at some length not only the general question of the poetic drama but also the particular problems that he had encountered in writing his own plays. The crux of this problem was to find a form of verse such that the audience would not be conscious of it. This search led Eliot to reject some of the methods that his predecessors in poetic drama had employed. Blank verse, he felt, would not do, for, through its long use in nondramatic poetry after the Elizabethan age, it had lost the flexibility necessary to give the proper conversational tone; and to the use of blank verse he attributed the failure of nineteenth century poets who had attempted plays in verse. The prose poetry of Synge was too limited to the Aran Islands; the poetry of William Butler Yeats's later plays was suitable only for mythological kings and queens. For this reason Eliot felt that he had to forge his own tool if he were to write plays of contemporary people, not historical pageants. And so, beginning with The Family Reunion, he employed a line varying in length and syllables, with a caesura and three stresses, with one stress on one side of the caesura and two on the other. This versification, Eliot thought, would be close enough to the rhythm of contemporary speech to avoid the obviously "poetic" that would be unacceptable to a modern audience.

As in his later plays, The Family Reunion, The Cocktail Party, and The Confidential Clerk, Eliot here chose a contemporary setting and an apparently simple plot. But since, in the essay cited above, he slyly confessed that the plot of The Cocktail Party had been merely that of the Alcestis of Euripides in modern dress and that no one had noticed this fact, we cannot be certain that some Greek play may not be lurking beneath the surface of The Elder Statesman. Certainly, however, none is immediately apparent.

Although Lord Claverton, the "elder statesman," does not appear at the opening of the play, he dominates the scene from the rising of the curtain. His daughter's fiancé, Charles, is protesting that, should he stay for tea in the Claverton town house, he will not be able to have any private conversation with Monica because of her father's presence. It is clear that Monica worships her father, who has been a famous man in both the political and financial worlds of England but who has now, on his doctor's orders, retired from public life and is preparing for a rest cure at Badgley Court, a nursing home somewhere in the country. When Lord Claverton enters, we are conscious of a man of great dignity who has always expected deference and who has received it, although now he has become querulous over the emptiness of his future. Like most men of affairs who have been compelled to give up their former activities, he realizes the hollowness of his past eminence, yet cannot endure the prospect of a life devoid of these activities. Life is now a mere waiting for death. He recognizes himself as a ghost and, with dramatic irony, remarks that he smiles when he thinks men are frightened of ghosts.

Hardly has this remark been uttered when the first ghost from his own past arrives in the form of one Señor Gomez from the Latin American Republic of San Marco. Almost immediately Gomez is revealed as Fred Culverwell, a friend of Lord Claverton's Oxford days. The unbearably suave expatriate is in possession of a damaging secret: when, years ago, the two university students were driving at night with two girls, Claverton—then plain Dick Ferry—ran over a man and did not stop because he feared the possible scandal. Culverwell also accuses Claverton of having been the cause of his ruin in England: by taking him up at Oxford and teaching him expensive tastes which he, a poor boy, lacked the means to gratify, Claverton had forced him to resort to theft and finally to forgery which had led to a prison sentence and flight from England. But in San Marco, with its peculiar political situation, he had done well; he is no crude blackmailer and wants only Claverton's friendship, something to give him "reality" after thirty-five years of homesick exile under an assumed name. He is a realist; he knows that, although a worldly success, he has failed, though not so badly as has Claverton, who has had to keep on pretending to himself that he has succeeded. To Claverton's credit, he stands the attack well, maintains his dignity, and shows no fear of the moral blackmail that Culverwell is so subtly exercising.

Lord Claverton's doctor had ordered him to Badgley Court, a nursing home run in a grimly cheerful fashion, for a complete rest. But hardly has he arrived when there appears another ghost from his past, this time in the form of Mrs. Carghill. A generation before she had been Maisie Montjoy, a star of the music halls; now she is a prosperous widow. The Dick Ferry of those far-off days had been in love with her and she with him—or so she claims. But she had settled her breach of promise suit out of court, and now she retains only sentimental memories and all of his letters, both the originals and photostatic copies. Again Lord Claverton, in spite of her sarcastic comments, maintains his unruffled dignity, even when she points out that there is only a negligible difference between being an elder statesman and posing as one. Twice have these ghosts brought home to him his essential emptiness.

The ultimate trial comes in the form of his son Michael, a spendthrift and ne'er-do-well who, even in his effort to see his father, has become involved in a motor accident, though not a serious one. In a sense, Michael is also a ghost, the ghost of the boy Claverton might have been had he not been possessed by a devil who was prudent as well as wayward. The son, though obviously a weakling, does have his side of the story: he is desperately eager to get out of England into some country where he can have a life of his own, free from the oppressive shadow of his father's great name. It is clear that the father has dominated the son far too much. But just as the situation between the two seems to have reached an impasse, the solution is provided by the two "ghosts"; Mrs. Carghill has suggested to Gomez that he take Michael back with him to the mysterious business in San Marco. But the price that has to be paid for this solution to the problem is that Claverton must have all his past errors laid bare before his daughter and her fiancé. This is his act of contrition, after which he receives absolution in the form of Monica's forgiveness and understanding. The ghosts from his past are at last exorcised, to return into the darkness whence they came. And so he goes out into the grounds of the nursing home to await death, much as Oedipus left the grove at Colonus sacred to the Eumenides to find his appointed end. The mask of the "elder statesman" has been dropped forever; he has become himself, the real man under the mask.

Aristotle asserted that "A discovery is, as the very word implies, a change from ignorance to knowledge, and thus to either love or hate in the personages marked for good or evil fortune." This feature of the classical drama is perfectly illustrated in Eliot's play, for it is by the discovery of his true self that Claverton is able to achieve love. He realizes at last the real nature of his past mistakes; he had always proceeded by the letter of the law; he has never been technically guilty, for the man he had run over was proved to be dead before the accident, and Maisie had been paid off handsomely. He had never understood his wife and his son because he had never loved them. Even his affection for his daughter had been mere possessiveness. Now that he understands himself, can understand that his whole career has been a sham, he can love and hence can find peace. The central theme of the play is, thus, the Christian doctrine of redemption; and redemption leads to love.

It is, of course, unfair to judge a play only by reading it. Certainly The Elder Statesman was well received when it appeared. It is also certain that Eliot has been more successful in finding the right poetic language for this play than in his previous efforts. It is probable, however, that many readers will find the play essentially undramatic. The pace is too even; there is a lack of suspense and excitement, which may be crude elements but which are necessary to a good play. Exquisitely handled language does not alone make for effective drama. Perhaps Eliot has been on the wrong track in attributing the failure of the poetic drama of the nineteenth century to the choice of a poor poetic medium. Perhaps these poets, like Eliot himself, lacked the real feeling for the theater which is often possessed by greatly inferior writers.

THE ELEGIES OF PROPERTIUS

Type of work: Poetry

Author: Sextus Propertius (C. 50 B.C.-before A.D. 2)

First transcribed: Elegies, I, 26 B.C.(?); II, 24-23 B.C.(?); III, 22-21 B.C.(?); IV, not earlier than 16 B.C.

Sextus Propertius wrote in the poetic genre known as the Roman love elegy, a form first developed and made famous by Gallus (of whose work only one line survives), Tibullus, Ovid, and Propertius himself. The love elegy was written in alternating hexameter and pentameter lines; the pentameter was actually a hexameter shortened by the removal of syllable in the middle and another at the end of the line. The tone of this genre was always personal and passionate, and it was characterized by the first-person lament of the frustrated or grieving lover alternating with erotic joy. It is from the unhappy aspect of the Roman love elegy that our understanding of the word "elegiac" has developed.

Each of the three more or less contemporary early elegists whose work has, at least in part, survived has a distinctive effect. Tibullus is a man of great sensibility who suffers tenderly. Ovid is an erotic cynic who treats love as a game. Proper-tius is a passionate and tempestuous lover who both loudly complains and exalts in his love. His style, while generally smooth, vivid, and rapid, is sometimes freighted with a heavy load of learning. Love is not the unique subject of Propertius' four surviving books of elegies—the elegiac form was capable of other subjects than love—but it is his love poems that are the most interesting. Making up the greater part of the work, they are what concerns the modern reader.

Propertius was born in the province of Umbria, Italy; his family was of equestrian rank. His father died when he was a boy and the family suffered serious financial reverses. Propertius began to study the law in his youth, but soon left it for poetry. From its beginning the essential subject of his poetry was his grand passion for Cynthia—her real name was Hostia. Cynthia was a loose woman; she was not exactly a prostitute, but a courtesan who made her living by pleasing wealthy men. Propertius' affair with her was marked by frequent infidelities on Cynthia's part and much anger and lament on Propertius' part. But Propertius had a mind of his own and was, if blindly in love, still capable of dealing with the equally strong-minded Cynthia.

Book One contains twenty-three poems. The first is an introduction to his love affair and the last is a brief biographical sketch, though more important biographical information is found in the first poem of Book Four. The remaining poems in the first book are concerned with various aspects of the poet's passion.

The first poem, which gives us the basic outline and describes the specific nature of the poet's relationship to Cynthia, states that she first taught Propertius what it was to love, though he had formerly been involved with one Lycinna. For a year he has suffered an agony of love and has been wholly drawn away from the decent life and any interest in honest women, all this despite the fact that Cynthia has refused to love him and to make his life less painful. Finally, however, Cynthia gave in. In the second poem we find a description of Cynthia's charms. Pointing out that she is wholly beautiful, Propertius tells Cynthia to forget useless adornments and go naked, as does love himself. In the third elegy we get our first really close look at the woman. The poet, home late from a party, speaks over his sleeping mistress. She awakes and petulantly chides him for keeping her awake with worry. Four, five, and six are thematically related in that all have to do with attempts to separate the poet from Cynthia. First he argues with a friend who wants him to break with her. Then he warns another friend to stop making overtures to her. Later he regretfully tells another friend that Cynthia will not let him travel abroad with the friend. Here we see another dimension of this love affair. Propertius, full of passion, is nevertheless irritated by Cynthia's possessiveness. This and similar paradoxes have much to do with the interest of Propertius' love poetry. The very perversity of the two strong-minded lovers attracts us.

In the seventh poem, Propertius warns the epic poet Ponticus that he will be less satisfied with himself and the epic style if he should ever fall in love. In the eighth a crisis arises. Cynthia has decided that she will go abroad, and with a rival of the poet. Propertius prays for a storm to hold her back, but he wishes her a safe trip if she does go. Then in eight-A, he ecstatically informs us that Cynthia has decided not to go. In nine we find Propertius saying, in effect, "I told you so" to the epic poet of poem seven, and in ten Propertius is happy because a possible rival has been sidetracked. Cynthia, we find in eleven, has gone to the seaside resort of Baiae, and the poet is worried that she will act scandalously and ruin her "good" name; he begs her to come back to Rome. Twelve and thirteen form a pair: in the former Propertius admits that he has been unable to work lately because of his all dominating attachment to the once more estranged Cynthia. In the latter, the poet, speaking to the man who has just accused him of sloth, says that his friend may gloat over Propertius' love troubles, but that he will not retaliate. Next, in number fourteen, we hear of a reconciliation. The pleasures of love, the poet claims, are superior to the joys of wealth. But in fifteen we find that Propertius is again in trouble with Cynthia. Though he must face some danger, Cynthia is unconcerned and takes a new lover. The poet claims that he will nevertheless remain faithful.

Poems sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen are the lover's laments. The first is expressed beside Cynthia's door, now closed to him; the second has for background a storm at sea; and the third poem, a very influential piece, is set in a wild and lonely forest. Apparently the laments had some effect, for in nineteen the lovers seem to be reconciled. In this piece Propertius contemplates death and urges lovers to love while they may. Neither twenty, twenty-one, or twenty-three (the autobiographical poem) are concerned with Cynthia. Twenty is a version of the myth of the rape of Hylas, and twenty-one contains the final words of a man being murdered by bandits.

The appearance and success of the first book of elegies brought Propertius to the attention of the great Roman patron of letters, Maecenas. Propertius was admitted to his circle, and thus Book Two begins with a dedicatory poem to Maecenas. Here the poet protests he can only write of love, since his being is dominated by Cynthia. Poems two through nine return to the subject of his love. Cynthia's beauty is praised more fully; her perversity and falseness are described; the poet's continued infatuation and his joy at the repeal of a law that might have forced him to abandon the woman are discussed. Just as love was previously seen to be superior to wealth, it is here proclaimed more wonderful than the soldier's glory. In the tenth poem however, the poet momentarily turns from love, claiming that only youth writes of that subject; now he will turn to the more mature subject of war. Then, he immediately reverses himself, and the rest of the rather confused second book discusses various aspects of his affair with Cynthia. In these poems we observe an interesting aspect of the affair and a clever bit of lover's flattery. Propertius emphasizes the intellectual ability and literary judgment of his mistress. In poem thirteen, for example, he claims that he is not impressed with beauty and breeding alone in a woman. His greatest joy is to lie in the arms of Cynthia, reading his poems which she so intelligently appreciates and so judiciously criticizes. As the book proceeds, however, Propertius' recriminations become both more frequent and bitter; the affair is subtly changing for the worse.

This progress comes to its climax in Book Three. Though he writes on several other topics, love is still his important theme. Particularly noteworthy are poems ten, fifteen, twenty-four and twenty-five. Ten is a beautiful and clever elegy on Cynthia's birthday. The poet sensuously describes the awakening of Cynthia, the birthday ceremonies, the rich and happy banquet; then, he suggests, after much joy and many emptied goblets they will retire to the bedroom to conduct those rites appointed by Venus and thus complete the course of her natal day. Fifteen is interesting in that it speaks of his adolescent love, Lycinna (mentioned several other times in the elegies) who was Propertius' introduction to women. He gives some details of the early affair and a description of how Cynthia swept Lycinna from his mind. In poems twenty-four and twenty-five, the poet bitterly proclaims his final break with Cynthia. In the first Propertius says that the too proud Cynthia puts too much trust in the efficacy of her beauty. As for him, after a long time being tossed about in the sea of love, he has now escaped and is cured of his infatuation. Henceforth, good sense will dictate his ways. In the second poem, the poet remains adamant despite the tears of Cynthia, for too often in the past has he been beguiled by her weeping. For five years her domination of him has been a public joke. He ends by cursing her with a wrinkled old age and says that he will relish her inevitable loneliness.

Book Four is almost wholly taken up with more solemn themes than love. Included are a series of aetiological poems on the god Vertumnus (two), on Tarpeia (four), on the anniversary of Actium (six), on the Great Altar of Rome (nine) and on Jupiter Feretrius (ten). Only two poems, seven and eight, are concerned with Cynthia. Both are excellent. Seven is in the form of a striking and touching interview with Cynthia's ghost in which she chides a moved Propertius for his neglect. Eight is an amusing and active retrospective account of a night when Propertius, bitter at Cynthia's harsh treatment, set out to console himself with two other ladies of easy virtue. Suddenly Cynthia shows up. She violently drives off the girls and physically attacks Propertius. He bows to her chastisements and all is made well on the couch so familiar to them.

Book Four closes with a solemn funeral poem which, paradoxically for a poet made famous by his love poems, is commonly accounted Propertius' greatest single elegy. The poem celebrates Cornelia, the daughter of Augustus' wife Scribonia. Noble in tone, the poem praises the virtue of the dead woman to the judges of the dead, to her family, and to the world.

Sinclair Lewis wrote Elmer Gantry at the height of his fame, in the middle of the remarkable decade of the 1920's that began for Lewis with Main Street and ended with Dodsworth and that saw not only Babbitt and Arrowsmith but also their author's refusal of a Pulitzer Prize that had been awarded to him. Yet curiously, Elmer Gantry gives us a first hint of the waning of Lewis' powers. Before this novel Lewis had served a long apprenticeship, and had achieved great success. From 1915 to 1920 he wrote fifty short stories and five novels, trying out his themes and characterizations, sketching out his satiric portraits of various types; not the least among these were religious types, though the climax of that kind of portraiture was not to come until Elmer Gantry appeared in 1927.

Main Street burst upon the world in 1920, the result of several years Lewis spent perfecting his method of research to establish the realistic foundation upon which his satires were to rest. His book was a sensational best seller, and apparently it occurred to Lewis that he could repeat his success if he would only, in a programmatic way, turn his satiric eye upon the various aspects of American life in sequence. After his exposure of the village he next chose Zenith, a middle-sized city, and George F. Babbitt a middle-class businessman. Then he applied his attention (now in collaboration with Dr. Paul de Kruif) to medicine, public health, and medical experimentation. Other projects flashed through his mind and were rejected, until he at last found a challenging project he could eagerly work upon, the ministry; and he began to consider how he could assemble ideas, plot, character, and especially background for what would later become Elmer Gantry. Undertaking an exposure of hypocrisy in religion was a formidable and dangerous task, but Lewis felt confidently ready for it. In Babbitt he had written of Mike Monday, the evangelist; Mrs. Opal Emerson Mudge, leader of the New Thought League; and the Reverend John Jennison Drew, author of The Manly Man's Religion.

Following his usual method of research, he sought expert advice to provide the background for his novel. Acquainted with a minister in Kansas City, he went there to find some of his material. He gathered a weekly "seminar" of local pastors of many faiths and sects; after luncheon, there might be a session on "The Holy Spirit," with Lewis challenging, pressing, arguing, and thus absorbing material. Gradually, characters and plot took shape. Elmer Gantry was to be Lewis' most extravagant faker, a salesman of religion with no real knowledge of theology and no scruples or morals, a stupid man who would exploit his parishioners as he climbed to success from village to town to city, a seducer of women, a man of greed.

Elmer Gantry, captain of the football team at Terwillinger College, was known as "Hell-cat" to his classmates and especially to his roommate, a drinking, and carousing friend, Jim Lefferts. Then something happened to convert Gantry from being the heathen that he was; he was taken up with the moment. He had met Judson Roberts, the ex-football star who had a following among members of the "manly" set. Gantry's mother had been urging him to give his soul to God and so at a prayer meeting Elmer was swept up and converted with a mob of other "saved" people, while his mother, Judson Roberts, and his disbelieving classmates looked on. From that point on, Lewis exposed Gantry's cheap education, revealed his mistaken, temporary, and even fraudulent initial religious impulses, surrounded him with religionists of neither character nor morality, carried him through several near-catastrophes, only to allow Gantry to recover and rise further still.

Gantry was ordained a minister at Mizpah Theological Seminary. During his time there he was sent to a spur-line town, Schoenheim, with an assistant, Frank Shallard. Shallard, noting Gantry's questionable motives toward Lulu Bains, a deacon's daughter, reproached Elmer and threatened to take the matter to Dean Trosper. Gantry caught Shallard off guard and reminded him that his faith was shaky and that if Dean Trosper were to know of this it would end Shallard's career at the seminary. When Shallard realized that someone else was aware of this problem, he left the post at Schoenheim and devoted his time to added study. But in his effort to set against Gantry some men of good will and genuine religiosity, Lewis' imagination and understanding failed him, and no true opponent, no convincing expression of what religion could mean or be, emerges from the book. Frank Shallard, Elmer's chief antagonist, remains only a shadowy character; finally his doubts get the best of him and he leaves the ministry in order to put his Christian principles into practice—and he is painfully defeated.

But Gantry's troubles with Lulu Bains had just begun; she informed him that they must get married and thus Gantry was forced into announcing his betrothal to her. He finally managed to get Lulu involved with an innocent but willing bystander, and in this way he was able to break the engagement.

Gantry left Schoenheim, supposedly heartbroken, and was sent to a new post in Monarch. On his way to preach the Sunday sermon he met Ad Locust, a traveling salesman for the Pequot Farm Implement Company. When Gantry became too drunk to show up at the church, he was fired from the seminary, even though he remained an ordained Baptist minister. Elmer then took a job with the Pequot Farm Implement Company and worked for them for two years. While in Sautersville, Nebraska, he met Sharon Falconer, a woman evangelist. He followed her and eventually became her assistant and lover. Everything went well for Gantry until the opening of Sharon's Waters of Jordan Tabernacle, which burned, killing a large number of the attending worshipers and Sharon.

Gantry then took up with Mrs. Evans Riddle, but he was kicked out of her group when she discovered that he was stealing from the collection. He then moved to a Methodist pastorate after teaching his own school of thought for a brief time. At this post he married Cleo Benham. After several successful charges in larger churches, Gantry was given a large church in New York. Gantry had not lived a pious life even after his marriage, and he became involved with his secretary, Mrs. Hettie Dowler. Those who opposed him used this opportunity to get back at him for his hellfire and brimstone sermons in which he spared no one. The newspapers got wind of the scandal and printed it, but T. J. Riggs saved Gantry from ruin. Gantry swore he would never again desire another woman, but as he knelt to pray because of his congregation's faith in him, he noticed at the same time the ankles of a new and attractive choir member.

Lewis has shown us a large gallery of ministerial frauds, such as Mrs. Riddle, the New Thought leader who taught classes in Concentration, Prosperity, Love, Metaphysics, Oriental Mysticism, and the Fourth Dimension, as well as how to keep one's husband. Another example is Judson Roberts, the state secretary of the Y.M.C.A., a young giant with curly hair and a booming voice that he used to bring in the big fellows.

Lewis gave much of his attention to his portrait of Sharon Falconer, the beautiful and somewhat mad female evangelist who preaches in a majestic temple, then leads Gantry to her retreat in the hills where she allows herself to be seduced on an altar she has built to such pagan goddesses as Astarte. Sharon says she has visions and confesses that she hates little vices like smoking and swearing but loves big ones like lust and murder. Yet from some confused notions about God Sharon derives sufficient strength to stand at the pulpit in her burning tabernacle and attempt to quell the panic of the mob of her parishioners, while Gantry knocks aside dozens of helpless people and is able to escape. Into such scenes as these, and into the final episode in which Gantry narrowly is saved from entrapment in the old badger game, Lewis poured all his vitality. But what critics have missed, and what seems to suggest the first waning of Lewis' powers, is the lack of any real opposition, referred to before. In Gantry himself there seems to be no decency, and therefore there are no alternatives contending in his soul. In the "good" characters there is insufficient understanding and fortitude, and they neither supply important alternatives nor force Gantry to any choices. In this book Lewis displayed his virtuosity as a satirist, but he also indulged it and failed to find for it any opposition in positive values. Thus, as a satirist of American life, he was by now really beginning to repeat himself, and it turned out to be essentially true (though not without some occasional exceptions) that he was to go on for about twenty-five years looking here and there for aspects of American life to expose, exploiting as best he could his earlier brilliance at recording the clichés of our lives and language but not advancing to any new understanding either for himself or for his readers. Meanwhile, the world moved on. If he was right that there was hypocrisy and corruption in the religious practices of America, his portrait was also incomplete in not showing us some of the glimmer that would begin to be fanned into the light of leadership that religion is trying to provide in the crises of today.

ÈLOGES AND OTHER POEMS

Author: St.-John Perse (Alexis St.-Léger Léger, 1887-)
First published: 1910; enlarged edition, 1956

In its present form Èloges (Praises) is a revised collection made up of poems dating as far back as 1909, to which has been added "Lullaby" ("Berceuse"), first published in 1945.

Alexis St.-Léger Léger, who writes under the name of St.-John Perse, was born in Guadeloupe, and he has had a long and very distinguished career in both the prewar and postwar French diplomatic service, and thus represents the peculiarly French combination of the public servant and the man of letters. Though his Anabasis has been translated by so famous a writer as T. S. Eliot, he remains little known to American readers, in spite of his great reputation in Continental literary circles. Because of the obscurity of his poems, it is highly improbable that his work will ever achieve any wide degree of popularity; nevertheless, because of his marked influence on modern poetry, he is an important figure, at least to the literary historian.

"Pictures for Crusoe," the earliest of the poems included in the volume, should be read first; they are the clearest and, when once understood, provide a sort of key to the other sections. In them, the reader is made immediately aware of the author's background of a childhood spent in the tropics—the succession of luxuriant images from the island left behind by Crusoe, the nostalgia for the clean wind and sea and sand, for the brilliant colors of dawn and sunset. It is the theme of this series of short poems that Crusoe's real disaster occurs when he returns to the cities of men and leaves forever the lost tropic island. Everything that he brings with him, every symbol of the island—the goatskin parasol, the bow, the parrot—decays in the sour dirt of the city; the seed of the purple tropic flower that he plants will not grow; even Goodman Friday, as he steals from the larder, leers with eyes that have become sly and vicious. Crusoe weeps, remembering the surf, the moonlight, and other, distant shores.

The same theme of nostalgia, much less clearly stated, runs through the longer poems entitled "To Celebrate a Childhood" and "Praises." Here the poet tries to recapture, by the same device of a series of pictures, the lost world of a childhood spent against the background of violent contrasts of brilliant light and shining water and crowding vegetation that is in memory the tropics. The lush images succeed one another with bewildering rapidity until a total effect is achieved and the lost childhood is recreated. Indeed, the images are heaped with such profusion that the poems become almost cloying, like over-ripe fruit.

There is a shift of emphasis here also, for no longer is there a contrast between two worlds, the island and the city, but rather an almost total recall of the beauty and the squalor of the tropics.

The second section of the book, "The Glory of Kings," consists of four poems, two written in 1910 and two in 1924. These poems are much more obscure than those in the first section. In them, Perse seems to have moved from the background of his childhood in Guadeloupe to the world of some primitive people where nameless speakers address praises to their half-human, half-divine rulers—the Queen, a mysterious Sphinx-like creature, at once the queen and the mother; the Prince, with his towering headdress, the Healer and Enchanter, keeping vigil. It may be that Perse is trying to express something of the spirit in which members of a primitive society identify themselves with their rulers, until the King becomes the symbol, indeed the very soul, of his people and is rejoiced in as such. By implication, this attitude is set against the critical, questioning attitude of modern man, shorn of reverence, cut off from "the sources of the spirit." "The Glory of Kings" seems to develop further a theme implicit in "Pictures for Crusoe"—the modern cult of the primitive that has appeared in the work of so many contemporary writers.

Under the first pen name of their author, these early poems by Perse are referred to by Proust, who, in Cities of the Plain, gives an appreciation of them and an indication of the likely reaction of the average reader. Lying on the narrator's bed was a book of the admirable but ambiguous poems of Saint-Léger Léger. Mme. Céleste Albaret picks up the book and asks if he is sure that they are poems and not riddles. It is natural that Proust, preoccupied as he was with the evocation of the past in all of its subtle ramifications in time and place, would have delighted in a poet bent on the same task of recapturing the totality of the experiences of childhood—the sights, the sounds, the odors. Nor is it surprising that these pictures from the tropics, so different from the hothouse, artificial life that Proust knew, should, by their very contrast, have appealed to him.

Yet by including the remark of Mme. Céleste, so distressing to the narrator, Proust succinctly indicates the probable response of most readers of poetry who in this volume approach Perse for the first time. For it cannot be denied that these poems make very difficult reading. T. S. Eliot, in his preface to his translation of Perse's Anabasis, tries to defend the author against the charge of willful obscurity by saying that their seeming obscurity is due to the linkage of explanatory and connecting matter, not to incoherence. Eliot's advice to the reader was to allow the images of the poem to fall into the memory with unquestioning acceptance, each contributing to a total effect apparent at the end of the poem. It is an indication of the contribution that Perse has made to the technique of modern poetry that this analysis could equally well be applied to much of Eliot's own work.

It is by means of this sequence of images, abruptly shifting into one another, that Perse achieves his total effect. It is this aspect of his technique that has elicited the special praise of Valéry Larbaud, who considers his descriptions far superior to those of Chateaubriand: concrete, exact, precise, and filled with meaning. The result is a blending of the ugly and the beautiful, the whole a passionate rendering of experience. In his descriptions Perse makes full use of a device so characteristic of contemporary poetry: the sudden juxtaposition of the "poetic" and the deliberately ugly or grotesque. A coconut, tossed into the street, "diverts from the gutter/the metallic splendor of the purple waters mottled with grease and urine, where soap weaves a spider's web." It is difficult to realize that such lines were being written in France in 1910, at a time when English poetry was dominated by the Georgians.

No modern poet so little known to the reading public has received from his fellow craftsmen such high praise as has Perse. He has been translated into English, German, Spanish, Italian, Russian, Rumanian. Hugo von Hofmannsthal considers that a direct road leads from Rimbaud to the early work of Stefan George and to that of Perse. Valéry Larbaud maintains that between 1895 and 1925 perhaps a hundred poets appeared in France, of whom at least thirty continue to be worthy of attention; of these thirty, only five—Claudel, Jammes, Valéry, Fargue, and Perse—will survive. To both of these critics, Perse is valuable because of his attempt, through the manipulation of language and his brilliant descriptions, to revivify French lyricism. It may well be, however, that Perse will remain essentially a poets' poet, important to other writers because of what they can learn from his method, rather than a poet for the general reader. It is no longer necessary for the poet to appeal to the community and the wider view. He may now appeal to himself and the urgencies of his private vision.

THE END OF THE ROAD

Author: John Barth (1930-)

Time: 1951-1955

Locale: Wicomico, Maryland

First published: 1958

Principal characters:

JACOB HORNER, a teacher of English, the narrator

JOE MORGAN, a teacher of history

RENNIE MORGAN, his wife

PEGGY RANKIN, a teacher of English

THE DOCTOR, a doubtful M.D.

The End of the Road begins ambiguously with some doubt as to the narrator's, Jacob Horner's, existence. He tells us that he became a teacher of English at Wicomico State Teachers College on the advice of the Doctor, never given a name, who operates a Remobilization Farm for the treatment of functional paralysis. Between this doubtful beginning and the non-ending, Barth examines the problems of existence and identity that began with his first novel, The Floating Opera.

Read on a literal level, the story is a rather banal love triangle involving Jacob, Joe Morgan, and Joe's wife. Read on a serious abstract ethical level, it becomes the setting for a duel of opposing points of view, both concerned with the problems of nihilism.

Jacob meets the Doctor in a railroad station, where he has come after finishing his oral examination for his Master's Degree. In trying to decide where to go for a vacation, he has been overcome by paralysis. He is unable to make a choice. No one destination seems better than another; his will to do anything at all is paralyzed. The Doctor takes him to his Remobilization Farm near Wicomico and begins a series of therapies designed to avoid situations involving complicated choices, the point being to make some choice, any choice, in order to keep moving, so that he would not fall into immobility again.

Mythotherapy, based on the existentialist premises that existence precedes essence, and that man is free not only to choose his essence but to change it at will, is the chief therapy prescribed for Jacob. It is a process of assigning a role to himself and carrying it out logically. It is essentially a mask to protect the ego.

At the college, Jacob becomes acquainted with Joe Morgan and his wife Rennie. The relationship quickly develops into a love triangle, but one in which the responsibility is shared equally by all three. Here, as elsewhere, Barth gives us no chance to make any judgments, to fasten onto any solid ethical ground. The End of the Road is a short novel with the characters sketched and filled in quickly, with very little background or examination of motivational processes.

Jacob's modus operandi is mythotherapy. Joe's is one of ethical positivism; he has a set of consistent, relative values which he is trying to impress on Rennie. It is around Rennie that the action centers. While teaching Jacob to ride horseback, she tells him of her meeting with Joe, their subsequent relationship and marriage. Until she met Joe, she had no philosophy of her own and she willingly erased her own personality to adopt that of Joe. She is still unsure of herself and not quite at ease with her adopted role. Later on she comes to see Jacob as Satan, tempting her to abandon her assumed personality. She sees him as not consistent, but as having nothing but ever-changing masks, donned one after the other as the situation demands. Following logically, she sees Joe as God: consistent, moral, and logically right. Over the battleground of Rennie, Jacob and Joe fight out their opposing points of view, Jacob with the shifting inconsistencies and limited goals of existentialism, Joe with his relative ethical values that denies any absolutes.

After Rennie and Jacob commit adultery, Barth abandons any consideration of Rennie and concentrates on the relationship between Jacob and Joe. The adultery had happened almost casually, while Joe was away. The seeds had been planted for it when Jacob and Rennie, peeking in on Joe after one of their rides, watched him making faces at himself in the mirror and engaging in a series of disgusting sex activities. Rennie is shattered; her god has his inconsistencies, too.

Rennie tells Joe of her infidelity and he confronts Jacob with it. Instead of behaving like an outraged husband, Joe tries to find the reasons behind the deed. All Jacob can say is that he does not know why it happened. Joe's search for causes goes far beyond the point of believability so that one is forced to view it in abstract terms. Here, as elsewhere, Barth carries action to an extreme and exaggerated point until it becomes parody.

Jacob's relationship with Peggy Rankin is a parody of Joe's and Rennie's relationship. Both fail, Joe's because it is too intellectualized and Jacob's because it is too physical. Barth implies a middle way, one would assume, but he never says so directly. In fact, Barth provides no absolutes, but merely presents a set of actions. He seems to suggest that human involvement is the answer to the problems posed by nihilism.

Under Joe's urging, Rennie visits Jacob several more times. She tells him that she does not know whether she hates or loves Jacob, but she wants to find out. When both Rennie and Joe visit Jacob one evening, it is to tell him that Rennie is pregnant and that they do not know whose child it is. All she knows is that she will commit suicide if she cannot have an abortion. This situation drives Jacob to his hour of concern. Through a series of lies, impersonations, and gall, he convinces one of the local doctors to give Rennie something to make her abort. When he tells Rennie what he has done and that she must give a false name and story, she refuses. She would rather shoot herself than lie. Jacob, by his imperfect realization of his role and his readiness to assume all the responsibility, has become fully involved, but his commitment is the very thing that the Doctor had told him he must avoid. Joe also has failed in his personal absolutism by turning to Jacob for an answer.

In desperation, Jacob goes to the Doctor and asks him to perform an abortion. The Doctor finally agrees on the condition that Jacob will give him all his money and go with him to a new location in Pennsylvania. Jacob agrees and brings Rennie to the Remobilization Farm. While on the operating table, Rennie dies.

Jacob is afraid that Joe will inform the police. Several days later he receives a telephone call from Joe, who tells him that he has taken care of everything. Joe and his convictions have suffered a mortal blow. He is lost and desperate. He turns to Jacob for an explanation, but Jacob has nothing to offer. Both positions, moral nihilism and ethical positivism, have been wrecked in their encounter with reality. Joe is left to reconstruct his life. Jacob returns to the Doctor because he is not yet ready to assume the responsibilities of life.

The End of the Road is a bitter commentary on the plight of man. Barth, in his examination of nihilism, has given us no answers. There are no moments of high good humor, as in The Sot-Weed Factor, only an unrelieved pessimism. On the surface, the novel is akin to the theater of the absurd in its insistence on telling only the observable actions of a story. Barth points no morals and draws no conclusions, but only shows us that nihilism, in its several guises, is not an end in itself.

ENGLAND UNDER THE STUARTS

Type of work: History

Author: George Macaulay Trevelyan (1876-1962)

First published: 1904

Principal personages:

KING JAMES I

KING CHARLES I

KING CHARLES II

KING JAMES II

QUEEN ANNE

QUEEN MARY

WILLIAM OF ORANGE

OLIVER CROMWELL

The value of Trevelyan's England Under the Stuarts is not in its accuracy and its wealth of detail. Its special quality is its art. From the outset of his career Trevelyan wished to write history that was also literature, and he achieved his goal especially in this book.

He became a historian at a time when the claims of "scientific" history were ascendant. He says in his autobiography that he tried to be a traditional kind of historian, relating history to literature, against a current in the other direction. Indeed, he has a style that is a delight to read. He can combine and condense without losing touch with details. He is pleased to pause to give full treatment to the social scene, the landscape, and the character of the persons of his historical period. He informs his reader of purpose, motive, conclusion, and evaluation. These qualities spring from his commitment to liberal democracy, and the reader feels Trevelyan's constant pleasure in watching the development of English Parliamentary government, humane law, and accomplishment in the arts that grace a civilization. It seems undoubtedly true that he played an important part in inspiring historians to write readable history without losing sight of factual accuracy.

The theme of England Under the Stuarts is the exploration of England's unique contribution to the history of the world, which came about through her dealings with the House of Stuart. For in a line of development directly contrary to what was happening elsewhere in Europe, England transferred sovereignty from the Crown to Parliament and thus laid the foundation for modern democratic government. Despotism, Trevelyan says, was entrenched throughout Europe and would have determined the future but for the events in England during the seventeenth century.

To prepare the reader for these confrontations, Trevelyan skillfully sketches the social, economic, and religious life of the various classes in England in 1603, as James I rode from Scotland to take the English throne. He shows us manor house "high-vaulted dining halls . . . hung with tapestry, armour, weapons, and relics of the chase," hunting, duelling, manners and marriages, education, and religion (the rack, the stake, the burning town, and the massacre). He continues with accounts of the middle and lower classes, the open fields, the wilderness as yet unenclosed, disease, manufacturing, the growing towns.

He prepares us further by discussing Puritanism with thoroughness and clarity. He divides the Puritans into three groups: those who wished to modify customs of the Established Church, retaining bishops; "those who wished for Puritan coercion under a Presbyterian regime"; and "men who desired to abolish the coercive power of the church, whether Anglican or Presbyterian," allowing congregations to form freely.

The first of the great antagonists on the scene was James I, characterized by Trevelyan as a pedant, but human, whose defect was that he "couldn't tell a good man from a rogue, or a wise man from a fool." In the initial three years of his reign, says Trevelyan, King James set into motion the forces that were to drive two Stuart kings from the throne. In such perceptions and phrasings lies the special quality of Trevelyan's history. He views the century broadly and from a high perspective; he establishes a theme, and he frequently reminds his reader of the controlling motives and ideas of the period. Each action is related to the whole pattern. The Puritans petitioned James "not for supremacy, but for security," and James decided against them. "No Bishop, no King," he declared; "I will make them conform themselves, or else will harry them out of the land." But when his Commons supported the Millenary Petition, the struggle was determined. That the alliance of Puritan and Commons was ominous was a matter disregarded by the king.

It is not necessary to detail the events of the century, Trevelyan's sure grasp of fact and theme reveals itself everywhere. His sentences encompass much. There is little documentation in the conventional sense of footnoting, yet evidence everywhere supports generalization. His summary powers can be shown at the conclusion of his chapters on James I. He notes how James, having allowed the debasement of the kingship, was now mocked in the taverns, so that "when at last the Puritan idealists rode out to battle against the King, they were followed by neighbors Pliable and Worldly-wiseman, who had come to imagine by force of long political sympathy that they themselves were Puritans."

When he comes to the climactic event of the century, the execution of King Charles I, though acknowledging that the Commission had no power and that Charles had committed no legal crime, Trevelyan nonetheless sees the action as the event that first ushered into the world of English politics "the sovereignty of the people and the equality of man with man." Yet the people themselves hardly yet knew the significance of the deed, and "when the bleeding head was held up," the multitude groaned. Thus the outrage postponed the kind of democratic success the leadership had hoped for. No man, not even Cromwell, could have held the Commonwealth permanently together, yet Trevelyan praises him for saving the political liberties of the people and for preventing the destruction of the free-thinkers and dissenters.

Trevelyan's narrative moves rapidly and smoothly everywhere, preparing us for such illuminating summary and interpretative passages as those already mentioned. Nor is he less effective in his treatment of the return of Charles II, or in his description of the social picture of the Restoration. This century of crowded events in England leaves little space for Trevelyan to discuss the settlement of the colonies in America—too little, considering that affairs on one continent were reflected on the other.

In 1665 and 1666 the Great Plague and the Great Fire struck London. The fire brought opportunities for rebuilding the outdated city. Not the least of these opportunities was the chance for the reconstruction of churches, wherein the artistry of Christopher Wren was expressed. Trevelyan finds further meaning in the effects of plague and fire. They influenced the atmosphere of politics "for twenty years to come," for they were interpreted superstitiously by the middle and lower classes, who thought them the result of "God's anger against their governors." Simultaneously, they also thought the fire to be the work of the Papists. Thus there was a resurgence of Puritanism not too long after it had suffered political defeat. There was also a temporary setback for rationalism. In this manner Trevelyan draws for us the complex pattern of history.

Then follow the Popish Plots, the terror, and the final flight of James II, completing the action set in motion eighty-five years earlier. In another fifty pages Trevelyan finishes the story of the century by discussing the reigns of Queen Anne and William and Mary. This extension allows him to conclude upon the note of a triumph of religious toleration, though he recognizes that religious equality was yet to come. The whole book is a model of achievement. One is everywhere impressed by the accomplishment of Trevelyan's announced tasks—to write cultural history in a literary manner.

THE ENGLISH NOTEBOOKS

Author: Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804-1864)

First published: 1870; 1941

As a result of Nathaniel Hawthorne's close friendship with President Franklin Pierce for whom he had written a successful campaign biography, he was appointed United States Consul to Liverpool in 1853. Hawthorne eagerly anticipated his first trip abroad, although he hated to leave his pleasant home in Concord.

During the years Hawthorne was in England, 1853-1858, he did no creative writing, largely because he was too busy with his duties as consul and also because he spent much time touring England, Scotland, and Wales. But he did keep an extensive notebook of his English sojourn, and this journal of 300,000 words, comprising seven manuscript volumes, is what has come down to us as The English Notebooks.

The English Notebooks has had a curious history. It was first published posthumously in 1870 as Passages from the English Notebooks, edited by Hawthorne's wife Sophia. But this edition was a bowdlerized version. To abide by standards of Victorian taste, Mrs. Hawthorne very carefully revised her husband's manuscripts, superimposing an aura of decorum on the whole book. She made stylistic revisions, deleting colloquialisms or substituting genteel language for Hawthorne's more commonplace terminology; she omitted passages in which mundane, unsavory, or crude subjects were treated; she withheld passages which were too harsh on England and on various English contemporaries of Hawthorne; and she struck out those which gave too personal an account of the Hawthorne family. Though Sophia's version of the journals was better than nothing, obviously it cast deceptive shadows on the true personality of her husband.

It was not until the work of the late Randall Stewart that The English Notebooks was published in its authentic form. Stewart's edition, made possible by infrared light as well as his own deft scholarly judgment, gives us Hawthorne's own words and thereby not only gives us a more candid look at the author's view of England and its people but also presents us with a Hawthorne who is more human, more worldly in interests—in short, more alive—than the rather stolid personage of Sophia's rendition. The notebooks as edited by Stewart are now the standard edition.

The notebooks are not only a fascinating, detailed account of many aspects of England—its topography, the customs of its people, the splendors of its historic buildings—but also an important disclosure of a nineteenth century American's feelings toward England. Hawthorne's reaction to the mother country was in part unfavorable. As Professor Stewart points out in his introduction, such a bias was not uncommon among Americans of that day, for a strong patriotism augmented by the Revolution and the War of 1812 still lingered in this country. England was still something of a foe. Moreover, there was much supercilious criticism of America by the British in many English books and periodicals that criticized and satirized America and her customs. As a result, in the notebooks Hawthorne asserts America's superiority over England whenever he can. He writes of the superiority of American women over their "gross" English counterparts; he praises the common American man for knowing more of political happenings than the English countryman; he even feels American natural scenery, though not as richly verdant as that in England, is superior. He rarely wearies of lightly scoffing at the diminutive lakes, rivers, and mountains he sees in England. And he notes the relative lack of brooks and streams in England as compared to those found in New England.

But there was also much about England that attracted Hawthorne. He loved the beauties of nature, such as the luxuriant hedge rows, and felt in some ways more akin to this mild, domesticated nature than to his own rugged New England terrain. His romantic appetite for old ruins in picturesque settings was also satisfied. Repeatedly he describes ivy-covered ruins and marvels over the hazy, antiquated atmosphere surrounding them. He also cherishes his visits to homes of famous deceased English authors.

The major attraction England held for Hawthorne, however, is less tangible than the others. Despite the statement he once made that New England was all his heart could hold, he was possessed by the haunting feeling of ancestral bondage to England. He had always had a keen sense of the past, a fact which is evident both in his fiction and in his inherent sense of guilt over the misguided role some of his ancestors had played in the Salem witchcraft trials. Being keenly conscious of ancestry and the past, Hawthorne felt that his going to England was in a way representative of the Hawthorne line returning to its original home, from which his forefathers had departed in 1635. The very thought of finding a gravestone there with his family name on it excited him. This theme of the ancestral tie appears throughout the notebooks and was later to be the subject of two of the fragmentary novels he left at his death. The Ancestral Footstep and Doctor Grimshawe's Secret.

Thus, The English Notebooks shows Hawthorne's feelings toward England to be ambivalent. While criticizing many aspects of England, he also found much to admire in this land which held a mysterious claim on his affections.

Since Hawthorne made it a practice to make notebook entries of practically everything he noticed, it is impossible in a limited space to cover the wide range of material he included. But four major categories of his jottings may be distinguished and treated in some detail.

First, much of the notebooks is given over to detailed accounts of side trips which Hawthorne and his family took throughout England, Scotland, and Wales. There were the two visits to the Scottish Highlands, the leisurely tours of the Cumberland lake country, the excursions to such well-known attractions as Blenheim, and the frequent journeys to London. Second, and of necessity related to the first, there are many passages describing Hawthorne's visits to homes of famous deceased authors, among them Shakespeare, Scott, Dr. Johnson, and Southey and also encounters with illustrious English personages still living. Many of the latter occasions were simply brief meetings; others developed into fast friendships. He saw Macaulay at a dinner and Disraeli at the House of Commons, and he observed Tennyson at an art exhibition at Old Trafford but was too shy to introduce himself to the redoubtable poet laureate. He became friends, however, with Leigh Hunt, a "beautiful and venerable" old man, and especially with Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. The Hawthornes' friendship with the Brownings was to continue into their Italian days, from 1858 to 1860.

The third category of Hawthorne's recordings in the notebooks is directly related to his published writings. Although he wrote no fiction during his years in England, he was laying the groundwork for later creative work. In the first place, his later collection of essays on England, Our Old Home, borrowed heavily from his notebook entries. Such essays as "Leamington Spa," "Lichfield and Uttoxeter," and "Outside Glimpses of English Poverty" closely followed his notebook accounts.

Moreover, many of the observations recorded in the notebooks were later used in The Marble Faun and the fragmentary novels, The Ancestral Footstep, Doctor Grimshawe's Secret, Septimius Felton, and The Dolliver Romance. For example, an attractive, exotic-looking Jewess Hawthorne observed at the Lord Mayor's banquet in 1856 became the prototype for the enigmatic Miriam of The Marble Faun. An imprint in stone somewhat resembling a footprint at Smithell's Hall, said to be that of a Protestant martyr who stamped his foot in protest against religious injustice during Bloody Mary's reign, became the germ of The Ancestral Footstep. Fascinated by the way moss on English tombstones served to bring out the inscriptions and thereby prolong the memory of the deceased, Hawthorne used this phenomenon in both Septimius Felton and Doctor Grimshawe's Secret. A venerable yew tree which Hawthorne observed in a churchyard at Eastham was later used in Doctor Grimshawe's Secret as a symbol of the lingering influence of the past on the present. The luxuriant English gardens seemed to Hawthorne to tempt man to withdraw from life and seclude himself in their protective sanctuaries, an idea he later introduced into his unfinished novels. A rare flower, supposedly everlasting, presented to Sophia by a gardener at the hot houses at Eaton Hall became a symbol of earthly immortality in Septimius Felton and The Dolliver Romance. In short, the notebooks are a storehouse of raw materials which Hawthorne molded into characters, settings, plot elements, and symbols in his later fiction.

Finally, and perhaps ultimately most important, The English Notebooks reveals Hawthorne the man. Lurking in the shadows is Hawthorne the romancer; but in the limelight is the man who loved playing parlor games with his family on cold winter nights, who longed to smoke a cigar with Tennyson, who was simultaneously aroused and repulsed by the sensuous Jewess, who performed his mundane duties of the consulate with diligence yet weariness, and who was moved by the grandeur of English cathedrals but felt strong yearnings for the simpler church services of his Puritan heritage stirring within him. This is the Hawthorne who emerges from the notebooks, a rich portrait which belies the dated picture of him as a brooding, almost unworldly recluse.

THE EPIGRAMS OF MELEAGER

Type of work: Epigrams

Author: Meleager (c. 140-c. 70 B.C.)

First transcribed: First century B.C.

Meleager is one of the few surviving voices in Greek literature from the early first century B.C. This century, so rich in Roman literature, was perhaps the scantiest of all the classical period for Greek. One's sense of dearth is intensified by the kind of literature which survived. Ancient Greek literature at no time produced seriously realistic writing, and when the mythical core vanished, the remains took the form of history, philosophy, or stereotyped, artificial styles such as New Comedy, Romance, and Epigram. So it is that in this unsettled century, when the details of personality and daily existence would have been so fascinating, the chief creative writer transmits to us some one hundred thirty epigrams consisting chiefly of picturesque variations on standard themes and topics of earlier epigrammatic love poets. The incongruity is all the keener from the fact that Meleager's home until manhood was Gadara in Syria, the very town at which Jesus was to cast devils into swine. These two Semitic figures, when juxtaposed in the imagination, are utterly immiscible, as are the styles of their literary remains.

Meleager might be for us somewhat less the hothouse orchid he is if his juvenilia had been preserved. His earliest writings were satirical dialogues in prose, modeled on the writings of Menippus, the famous Cynic philosopher and teacher at Gadara. Something of their character may be sensed from the later dialogues of Lucian. The subject of one is reported as a comparison of pease-porridge with lentil-soup. But these were lost, and Meleager's remains now consist of the epigrams found in the great collection known as the Greek Anthology.

The last of Meleager's literary productions was itself one of the early stages in the development of that anthology: his Stephanos (usually translated Garland) was a collection of epigrams of some fifty poets, himself included, with a famous verse preface which compares each poet to that flower which most suggests his poetic character. Later anthologists included the Stephanos in larger gatherings; the final collection (apart from the additions derived from Planudes) was made in the tenth century. The poetically significant sections of that collection are the love poems, dedicatory inscriptions, epitaphs, declamatory, moralizing, convivial, and satiric epigrams. Only about twenty of Meleager's epigrams, however, are to be found outside the love poems.

There is a tendency in the anthology, even within the major sections, to arrange poems on the same theme in a sequence. This tendency provides the most important clue for the appreciation of Meleager. The innocent reader on first encounter is likely to ascribe to Meleager both a hectic variety of erotic liaisons and a continuous intensity of emotion reflected in the extravagant language both of which in fact distract the reader from the true poetic center of most of the epigrams. The poems are best approached as exercises in various types, attempts at overbidding previous treatments of a topic—overbidding in wit, imagery, and rhetoric. (The case is similar to that of such poets as Herrick and Jonson, many of whose short lyrics are adaptations or emulations of Anacreon, Catullus, and the Greek Anthology itself.) To illustrate, here is an epigram by the earlier poet Asclepiades (XII, 166):

Let this that is left of my soul, whatever it be, let this at least, ye Loves, have rest for heaven's sake. Or else no longer shoot me with arrows but with thunderbolts, and make me utterly into ashes and cinders. Yea! yea! strike me, ye Loves; for withered away as I am by distress, I would have from you, If I may aught, this little gift.

Meleager takes up the notion of the incinerated lover and exploits it in various ways. For instance (XII, 74):

I am down; set thy foot on my neck, fierce demon. I know thee, yea by the gods, yea heavy art thou to bear: I know, too, thy fiery arrows. But if thou set thy torch to my heart, thou shalt no longer burn it; already it is all ash.

If I perish, Cleobulus (for cast, nigh all of me, into the flame of lads' love, I lie, a burnt remnant, in the ashes), I pray thee make the urn drunk with wine ere thou lay it in earth, writing thereon, "Love's gift to Death."

The practice of poetry-as-outcapping comes all the more naturally to Meleager in that he was part of the wave of rhetorical fashion known as the Asianic. Meleager was a Syrian, but Oriental race or culture has nothing to do with Asianism, which is purely a development within classical literature. The Asianic style sought for something like the Baroque: extravagance in diction and imagery, special tricks and effects in word arrangements. Most of this is hard to illustrate outside the Greek, but the use of repetition and fancy compounds in the following may give some of the flavor (VII, 476, 1-4):

Tears, the last gift of my love, even down through the earth I send to thee in Hades, Heliodora—tears ill to shed, and on thy much-wept tomb I pour them in memory of longing, in memory of affection.

The witty side of Meleager's Asianism brings him close at times to the Metaphysicals' conceits (V, 156):

Love-loving Asclepias, with her clear blue eyes, like summer seas, persuadeth all to make the love-voyage.

None of the foregoing is meant to deny the existence of genuine emotion in Meleager's poetry. The point is that, where emotion is found, it emerges from, launches, or sets on fire the already existing framework of artificial craft, and artifice is inseparable from the result. In various ways, of course, the same can be said of all poetry, but it is so dominant in Meleager (and other epigrammatists) that it needs special emphasis as a defining characteristic.

As for the quality of the emotional experience in those few poems where emotion is genuinely present, this is no place for a full disquisition on the Meleagrian species of "Love in the Western World." J. W. Mackail has spoken of a mystical, almost medieval strain in Meleager's love poetry. The religious aspect is overstated in this judgment, but there is one way in which Meleager does at times approach a medieval quality: more than the other epigrammatists, he expresses the total subjection, abasement, humiliation of the lover, much as the courtly lover of the Middle Ages conceived himself as the abject servant of his lady (XII, 158, 1-2):

The goddess, queen of the Desires, gave me to thee, Theocles; Love, the soft-sandalled, laid me low for thee to tread on . . .

Along with the intermittent intensity of his passion, however, there is an element of coyness and sentimentality which pervades Meleager as well as most of the other love-epigrammatists of the Greek Anthology, an element absent from the love of poetry of the Lyric Age of Greece (c. 700-500 B.C.), absent even from Anacreon. Perhaps it is possible to account for the change by the fact that the period was Hellenistic, not Hellenic. The great love poetry is written when Eros is integrated within or demonically opposed to a religious framework, and for most educated men of the Hellenistic Age there was no serious religion, only philosophy.

One other feature of Meleager's love poetry which needs simply to be noted, at least for contemporary readers, is the characteristic type of the beloved. Meleager's loved ones fall exclusively into two classes: hetaerae (professional female entertainers or courtesans) and boys in their early teens. Since these two classes account for practically all extant ancient Greek love poetry (Sappho is the major exception), this otherwise rather striking phenomenon needs no special discussion in connection with Meleager.

One should not over-emphasize Meleager as a love poet; nor should one be concerned with seeking out those poems which embody "genuine passion," as if these must necessarily be his best. Sheer flights of linguistic dexterity and brilliant variations of traditional themes can produce fine epigrams. Perhaps the most memorable characteristic of Meleager is an outgrowth of this side of his poetry; his bursts of wit often have an element of sheer playfulness and tender humor. In one poem he sends forth a gnat on the dangerous Herculean mission of rousing Heliodora from the side of her current lover to bring her back: the reward will be Hercules' club and lion skin. In another he asks the dew-drunk cicada to strum in antiphon with Pan's piping at high noon and lull him to sleep. An epigraph he wrote for himself makes fun of his own garrulity. In all this one can see a survival of the Meleager who wrote on pease-porridge and lentil-soup.

Meleager's oeuvre is a curious mixture of the complex and the trivial, the passionate and the sophisticated. Connoisseurs of the cameo, exquisites of the Yellow Nineties are ex officio licensed to cherish his work; all others will have done him sufficient justice if they read him, at judicious intervals, as an interesting minor poet.

THE EPISTLES OF HORACE

Type of work: Letters in verse

Author: Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus, 65-8 B.C.)

First transcribed: Book One, c. 19 B.C.; Book Two, c. 13 B.C.

The close and intimate life of the Greek city state gave rise to most of the literary forms of ancient literature, the greater number of which were adopted and adapted by the Romans. However, the epistle, the letter in verse, was a Roman literary invention brought to perfection by Horace during the first days of the Roman imperial period. With Rome administering most of the known world, friends would often be separated in different parts of the empire for years, and even if a citizen remained in Italy he would often, as did Horace, retire to his country estate. Letter writing became not merely a matter of occasional necessity, but often the only means of communication, and it was natural that poets and men of letters should turn the epistle into a literary form so that even at a distance friends could share both poetry and, in some measure, epistolary conversation.

Horace's epistles were published in two books; the first, containing twenty letters, appeared about 20 or 19 B.C.; the second, containing two long letters, probably appeared in 13 B.C. Some scholars argue that the second book of epistles should contain the famous Epistle to the Pisos, the Ars Poetica. However, this work has traditionally been published separately.

In his first book, Horace is a moralist; in the second, a literary critic. The shorter epistles in the first book, some less than fifteen lines long, are familiar and intimate; one need not doubt that they were written as letters first and poems second. In these shorter letters we see Horace, a man of forty-five who claims his days of writing lyric poetry are finished, interested in the writing of the younger generation, inviting a friend to dinner, or the like. The longer epistles of the first book, however, are much more formal and tend to the didactic; they smack of the tour de force, and while they may well have been sent to the persons to whom they are addressed, they read more like open letters to the poet's entire audience. Typical of these longer letters, and setting the moral tone of the first book, is Epistle One, addressed to the poet's friend and patron, Maecenas. In it the poet bids farewell to poetry and states that in his declining years he will devote himself to philosophic inquiry. But he will be an eclectic, limiting his speculation to the precepts of no one school of philosophy, for his interest is to find what is ultimately and lastingly profitable for the achievement of virtue. The calm pursuit of wisdom, he states, is the highest good, not the frantic pursuit of things. Showing himself to be as much a Stoic as anything else, he claims the secret of happiness is not to value anything too much. Other matters he speaks of in the first epistle are the need to control the passions so as not to ruin enjoyment, the need to train one's character, and the need to adapt oneself to both company and oneself alone. Horace's wish from life, he concludes, is enough books and enough food to keep him comfortable.

With the tone thus set, Horace proceeds to write of the following matters in the successive epistles of the first book. Epistle Two, to Lollius, begins with the old doctrine that important moral lessons are to be learned from the study of Homer. Horace quickly turns to his real subject, however, which is the foolishness of putting off or not exerting the effort requisite for moral self-improvement. Epistle Three, to Julius Florus, was written to a friend who was abroad campaigning with Claudius; the poet inquires about other young friends on Claudius' staff. He is particularly interested in their literary activity. Epistle Four, to Tibullus, the poet, is a short note of warm friendship in which Horace gently recommends the Epicurean idea that one should live each day as if it were his last. Epistle Five to Torquatus is an invitation to a frugal but cheerful and friendly dinner party. Epistle Six, to Numicius, is a lay sermon on the famous Horatian phrase, Nil admirari, "wonder at nothing." The wise man should love nothing but virtue: live, and be happy. Epistle Seven, to Maecenas, is a note of appreciation for various favors. Horace apologizes for absenting himself from Rome for so long, and he uses the occasion to describe the ideal giver and, with some humor, the ideal receiver. Self-sufficiency, he claims, is preferable to all other blessings. Epistle Eight, to Celsus Albivanus, is a letter to a member of Tiberius' staff. The poet describes his own ill health and admonishes Celsus to bear up well under prosperity. Epistle Nine, to Claudius Tiberius Nero, is a graceful letter of recommendation for Horace's friend Septimus. Epistle Ten, to Aristius Fuscus, praises the superiority of country life as being more conducive to the contented mind and more favorable to liberty of spirit than the city life of Fuscus.

Epistle Eleven, to Bullatus, is an attempt to call this friend back to Rome from Asia, where he has retired because of his despair over the civil wars. Happiness, Horace says, is not in travel but in the mind and is to be achieved anywhere or nowhere. Epistle Twelve, to Iccius, ironically ridicules miserliness, introduces a friend, and gives news of recent events in the empire. Epistle Thirteen, to Vinicius Asina, cautions Asina, Horace's emissary, to present certain of Horace's writings to Augustus at a propitious and proper moment, and with due decorum. Epistle Fourteen chastises the caretaker of his farm, to whom the letter is written, for missing city life. Horace briefly reminisces about his wild younger years and then advises the wisdom of contentment. Epistle Fifteen, to C. Numonius Vala, asks about the situation and conditions of the town of Velia, where Horace has been advised by his physician to take a cure. Again he comments on country life. Epistle Sixteen, to Quinctius, describes the situation and advantages of Horace's Sabine farm. His description is detailed enough that its position can be determined. The poet goes on to philosophize on the nature of true virtue and the self-sufficiency and freedom of the virtuous man. Epistle Seventeen, to Scaeva, is a letter of advice to one who would seek advantage by frequenting the company of the great. The friendship of the great, the poet says is a good thing, but one must always solicit favors from them with modesty and caution. Epistle Eighteen, to Lollius, in a more elaborate way treats of the same topic as the seventeenth. Horace discusses the tact and discretion a client of the great must have; he concludes with remarks concerning peace of mind, a quality difficult to achieve when one depends on the favor of the great. Epistle Nineteen, to Maecenas, is a review of the poet's literary career; he decries the folly of slavish imitation, and he attacks his detractors. Epistle Twenty, addressed to his book, is developed as an argument between the poet and his now completed first book of epistles. The book is spoken to as if it were a young slave, a favorite of his master, who wants to be sold out of a quiet country household and into an exciting city house where he can seek advancement. Horace explains all the troubles and chances he must undergo. He ends the poem with remarks on what he expects from posterity. The tone of the nineteenth and twentieth epistles implies that the poet is finished now with his writing career.

The impression we receive from these twenty letters is that middle-aged Horace is feeling old and is in delicate health, and that he will write no more. Perhaps he really did believe he was through with poetry; however, he still had a few more poems to write, and among them, of course, were the two long discourses on literature (companion pieces, in effect, to the Ars Poetica) that make up the second volume of epistles.

The first of these two letters is to Augustus. After first paying the emperor the highest kind of compliments, Horace plunges into a consideration of the current state of literature. First he intervenes in the then raging Roman "battle of the ancients and the moderns." He acknowledges the greatness of the earlier Greek poets, but he wants to have the early Latin poets respected more than they usually are. Horace sketches out the history of Latin poetry from the beginnings up through the Greeks "capture" of their captor, Rome, and then on to his own day. Looking at the present state of letters, Horace judges (and history shows him to have been quite correct) that the drama would not reach great heights in Rome: the taste of the people was for spectacle, mimes, and elaborate staging. But non-dramatic poetry, he thinks will do very well; for Augustus, whose taste is impeccable, will encourage poetry and will not be deceived by second-rate poets.

The second epistle of the last book is to Julius Florus, a friend of the poet who apparently wanted also to be a poet. This letter is much more personal in tone than the letter to Augustus and is full of intimate detail. Horace begins by testifying that he is rather lazy and undependable now that he no longer must write poetry in order to stay alive, as he did when he was young. Moreover, poetry is one of the follies of the young and, now that he is growing old, he must give it up as he has his other youthful pastimes. How, he asks, can a man write real poetry amidst the hustle and bustle and distractions of Rome? The real poet must live and write in the quiet countryside. The poets who stay in the city form worthless mutual admiration societies out of which comes no true criticism. A good poet is a good critic too, and he can take and use valid criticism of his own work. Bad poets hate criticism of any kind. Perhaps the happiest writer is the madman who writes very badly, but who thinks he writes divinely. At any rate, Horace concludes, at his age it is proper to think of gaining happiness, which is found in calm and content, not wealth.

AN ESSAY OF DRAMATIC POESY

Type of work: Literary criticism

Author: John Dryden (1631-1700)

First published: 1668

Principal characters:

CRITES, a sharp-tongued gentleman, a stanch classicist

EUGENIUS, a defender of the English theater of his own time

LISIDEIUS, a devotee of the French classical drama

NEANDER, representative of the author, a lover of the great Elizabethans

The period after the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne is notable in English literary history as an age in which criticism flourished, probably in no small part as a result of the emphasis on neoclassical rules of art in seventeenth century France, where many of Charles' courtiers and literati had passed the years of Cromwell's rule. John Dryden's An Essay of Dramatic Poesy is an exposition of several of the major critical positions of the time, set out in a semi-dramatic form that gives life to the abstract theories.

Dryden sets his discussion in June, 1665 during a naval battle between England and the Netherlands. Four cultivated gentlemen, Eugenius, Lisideius, Crites and Neander, have taken a barge down the Thames to observe the combat, and, as guns sound in the background, they comment on the sorry state of modern literature; this naval encounter will inspire hundreds of bad verses commending the victors or consoling the vanquished. Crites laments that his contemporaries will never equal the standard set by the Greeks and the Romans. Eugenius, more optimistic, disagrees and suggests that they pass the remainder of the day debating the relative merits of classical and modern literature. He proposes that Crites choose one literary genre for comparison and initiate the discussion.

As Crites begins his defense of the classical drama, he mentions one point which is accepted by all the others: drama is, as Aristotle wrote, an imitation of life, and it is successful as it reflects human nature clearly. He also discusses the three unities, rules dear to both the classicist and the neoclassicist, requiring that a play take place in one locale, during one day, and that it encompass one, and only one, action or plot.

Crites contends that modern playwrights are but pale shadows of Aeschylus, Sophocles, Seneca, and Terence. The classical dramatists not only followed the unities successfully; they also used language more skillfully than their successors. He calls to witness Ben Jonson, the Elizabethan dramatist most highly respected by the neoclassical critics, a writer who borrowed copiously from many of the classical authors and prided himself on being a modern Horace: "I will use no further argument to you than his example: I will produce before you Father Ben, dressed in all the ornaments and colours of the ancients; you will need no other guide to our party, if you follow him."

Eugenius pleads the cause of the modern English dramatists, not by pointing out their virtues, but by criticizing the faults of the classical playwrights. He objects to the absence of division by acts in the works of the latter, as well as to the lack of originality in their plots. Tragedies are based on threadbare myths familiar to the whole audience; comedies revolve around hackneyed intrigues of stolen heiresses and miraculous restorations. A more serious defect is these authors' disregard of poetic justice: "Instead of punishing vice and rewarding virtue, they have often shown a prosperous wickedness, and an unhappy piety."

Pointing to scenes from several plays, Eugenius notes the lack of tenderness in classical drama. Crites grants Eugenius his preference, but he argues that each age has its own modes of behavior; Homer's heroes were "men of great appetites, lovers of beef broiled upon the coals, and good fellows," while the principal characters of modern French romances "neither eat, nor drink, nor sleep, for love."

Lisideius takes up the debate on behalf of the French theater of the early seventeenth century. The French classical dramatists, led by Corneille, were careful observers of the unities, and they did not attempt to combine tragedy and comedy, an English practice which he finds absurd: "Here a course of mirth, there another of sadness and passion, and a third of honour and a duel: thus, in two hours and a half, we run through all the fits of Bedlam."

The French playwrights are so attentive to poetic justice that when they base their plots on historical events they alter the original situations to mete out just reward and punishment. The French dramatist "so interweaves truth with probable fiction that he puts a pleasing fallacy upon us; mends the intrigues of fate, and dispenses with the severity of history, to reward that virtue which has been rendered to us there unfortunate." Plot, as the preceding comments might suggest, is of secondary concern in these plays. The dramatist's chief aim is to express appropriate emotions; violent action always takes place off stage, and it is generally reported by a messenger.

Just as Eugenius devoted much of his discussion to refuting Crites' arguments, Neander, whose views are generally Dryden's own, contradicts Lisideius' claims for the superiority of the French drama. Stating his own preference for the works of English writers, especially of the great Elizabethans, Neander suggests that it is they who best fulfill the primary requirement of drama, that it be "an imitation of life." The beauties of the French stage are, to him, cold; they may "raise perfection higher where it is, but are not sufficient to give it where it is not." He compares these beauties to those of a statue, flawless, but without a soul. Intense human feeling is, Neander feels, an essential part of drama.

Neander argues that tragi-comedy is the best form for drama, for it is the closest to life; emotions are heightened by contrast, and both mirth and sadness are more vivid when they are set side by side. He believes, too, that subplots enrich a play; he finds the French drama, with its single action, thin. Like Samuel Johnson, who defended Shakespeare's disregard of the unities, Dryden suggests that close adherence to the rules prevents dramatic depth. Human actions will be more believable if there is time for the characters' emotions to develop. Neander sees no validity in the argument that changes of place and time in plays lessen dramatic credibility; the theatergoer knows that he is in a world of illusion from the beginning, and he can easily accept leaps in time and place, as well as makeshift battles.

Concluding his comparison of French and English drama, Neander characterizes the best of the Elizabethan playwrights. His judgments have often been quoted for their perceptivity. He calls Shakespeare "the man who of all modern, and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul." Beaumont and Fletcher are praised for their wit and for their language, whose smoothness and polish Dryden considers their greatest accomplishment: "I am apt to believe the English language in them arrived to its highest perfection."

Dryden commends Ben Jonson for his

learning and judgment, for his "correctness," yet he feels that Shakespeare surpassed him in "wit," by which he seems to mean something like natural ability or inspiration. This discussion ends with the familiar comparison: "Shakespeare was the Homer, or father of our dramatic poets; Jonson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing; I admire him, but I love Shakespeare."

Neander concludes his argument for the superiority of the Elizabethans with a close critical analysis of Jonson's The Silent Woman, which he believes a perfect demonstration that the English were capable of following classical rules triumphantly. Dryden's allegiance to the neo-classical tradition is clear here; Samuel Johnson could disparage the unities in his Preface to Shakespeare, but Dryden, even as he refuses to be a slave to the rules, makes Jonson's successful observance of them his decisive argument.

The essay closes with a long discussion of the value of rhyme in plays. Crites feels that blank verse, as the poetic form nearest prose, is most suitable for drama, while Neander favors rhyme, which encourages succinctness and clarity. He believes that the Restoration dramatists can make their one claim to superiority through their development of the heroic couplet. Dryden is very much a man of his time in this argument; the modern reader who has suffered through the often empty declamation of the Restoration hero returns with relief to the blank verse of the Elizabethans.

Dryden ends his work without a real conclusion; the barge reaches its destination, the stairs at Somerset House, and the debate is, of necessity, over. Moving with the digressions and contradictions of a real conversation, the discussion has provided a clear, lively picture of many of the literary opinions of Dryden's time.

ESSAY ON CRITICISM

Type of work: Verse essay

Author: Alexander Pope (1688-1744)

First published: 1711

Published when Alexander Pope was twenty-two years old, the Essay on Criticism remains one of the best known discussions of literary criticism, of its ends and means, in our language. It stands today the source of numerous familiar epigrams known to the reading public. Pope was very young when he wrote the work; existing evidence points to 1708 or 1709 as the probable period of composition. Pope wrote of its composition: "The things that I have written fastest, have always pleased the most. I wrote the Essay on Criticism fast; for I had digested all the matter in prose, before I began upon it in verse." Although Pope may seem to rely too heavily upon the authority of the ancient authors as literary masters, he certainly recognizes, as many readers fail to note, the "grace beyond the reach of art" which no model can teach.

True genius and judgment are innate gifts of heaven, as Pope says, but many do possess the seeds of taste and judgment that, with proper training, may flourish. The genius of the ancients cannot be imitated but their principles may be. The poem is structured in three parts: the general qualities of a critic; the particular laws by which he judges a work; and the ideal character of a critic.

Part I opens with Pope's indictment of the false critic. He remarks that as poets may be prejudiced about their own merits, so critics can be partial to their own judgment. Judgment, or "True Taste," derives like the poet's genius from nature, but nature provides everyone with some taste, which if not perverted by a poor education or other defects, may enable the critic to judge properly. The first job of the critic then is to know himself, his own judgment, tastes, abilities; in short, to know his personal limitations.

The second task of the critic is to know Nature, which is his standard as it is the poet's. Nature is defined ambiguously as

Unerring Nature, still divinely bright,
One clear, unchanged, and universal light,
Life, force, and beauty, must to all impart,
At once the source, and end, the test of Art.

Nature thus becomes a universal or cosmic force, an ideal sought by poet and critic alike in the general scheme, things universally approved throughout history by all men. This ideal must be apprehended by the critic through his judicious balance of wit and judgment, of imaginative invention and deliberative reason.

The rules of literary criticism may best be located in those works that have stood the test of time and universal approbation, the works of antiquity. From the ancient authors critics have derived rules of art that are not self-imposed at the whim of the critic, but are discovered justly operating in the writings of the best authors. Such rules are "Nature still, but Nature methodized."

Formerly critics did restrict themselves to discovering rules in classical literature; now, however, critics stray from the principles of these earlier critics whose motive was solely to make art "more beloved," and prescribe their own rules, which are pedantic, unimaginative, and basely critical of literature. Thus what was once a subordinate sister to creative art now replaces or turns against its superior, assuming a higher place in the order of things. Criticism, once destined to teach the "world . . . to admire" the poet's art, today presumes to be master.

The true critic must learn thoroughly the ancients, particularly Homer and Vergil, for "To copy nature is to copy them." But there are beauties of art which cannot be taught by rules; these intangible beauties are the "nameless graces which no methods teach/And which a master-hand alone can reach." But modern writers should avoid transcending, unless rarely, the rules of art first established by the great men of the past.

Part II traces the causes hindering good judgment—that chief virtue of a true critic. Pope advises the critic to avoid the dangers of blindness caused by pride, the greatest source of poor judgment, by learning his own defects and by profiting even from the strictures of his enemies. Inadequate learning is another reason a critic errs: "A little learning is a dangerous thing;/Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring." Or if a critic looks too closely at the parts of a poem, he may find himself preferring a poem dull as a whole yet perfect in parts to one imperfect in part but pleasing as a whole. It is the unity of the many small parts in one whole that affects us: "'Tis not a lip, or eye, we beauty call,/But the joint force and full result of all." Art without any fault at all, moreover, can never be. And finally, any critic errs who condemns a work for failing to achieve that which its author never intended: in short, "regard the writer's End,/Since none can compass more than they intend."

As some critics deviate from nature in judging "by a love to parts," others confine their attention to conceits, images, or metaphors. Poets who dissimulate their want of art with a wild profusion of imagery have not learned to control their imagination; they overvalue mere decoration and paint, not "the naked nature and the living grace," but the external variables of nature. "True Wit," Pope says, "is Nature to advantage dressed,/What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed."

Other critics too highly praise style and language without respect for content; true eloquence clarifies and improves the thought, revealing nature at her finest, but "False Eloquence" imposes a veil upon the face of nature, obscuring with its finery the truths of nature. Proper expression, in addition, should fit with the content; the poet should never attempt to lend false dignity by archaic words. Proper diction is neither too old nor too modern.

Most false critics judge by meter, criticizing according to the roughness or smoothness of the verse. Overfondness for metrics results in the dull clichés of poetry, such as "the cooling western breeze," and the like. Pope avers that rough or smooth verse should not be the poet's ideal; he should aim rather to fit the sound to the sense

Soft is the strain when Zephyr gently blows,
And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;
But when loud surges lash the sounding shore,
The hoarse, rough verse should like a torrent roar.

Lines 344-383 of the poem constitute a digression by Pope to illustrate "representative meter."

The true critic generally abides by rules of tolerance and aloofness from extremes of fashion and personal taste. The critic who indulges in petty predilections for certain schools or kinds of poets sacrifices his objectivity. Be a patron of no separate group, whether ancient or modern, foreign or native, Pope advises. The critic should pledge himself to truth, not to passing cults. Nor should a critic fear to advance his own judgment merely because the public favors other poets and schools; no critic should echo fashion or let a writer's name influence him. Especially reprehensible is that critic who derives his opinions about literature from lords of quality.

The final pitfall of the false critic is subjectivity, measuring by personal preferences. Private or public envy may distort one's evaluation. The critic must put aside personal motives and praise accord- ing to less personal criteria. Nor should the critic be led astray by self-love: "Good-nature and good-sense must ever join." A critic may justly vent his spleen upon more worthy targets, of which many exist in "these flagitious times." Obscenity, dullness, immodesty: all should concern the critic and receive his lash. But the vices of an age should not infect a critic's judgment on other mat- ters.

Finally, Part III outlines the ideal character of a critic. It lists rules for his manners and contrasts the ideal critic with the "incorrigible poet" and "impertinent Critic," concluding with a brief summary of literary criticism and the character of the best critics.

It is not enough for the critic to know, Pope writes; he must also share the quali- ties of a good man, worthy of respect not only for his intellect but also for his char- acter. Integrity stands at the head of a list of good qualities for a critic. Modesty that forbids both unseemly outspokenness and rigid adherence to erroneous opinion, tact that supports truth without alienat- ing by bluntness, and courage that fears not to pursue truth despite censure are important attributes for the true critic. But as some dull and foolish poets are best not maligned for fear of provoking them to greater folly, so the critic full of pedantry and impertinence should be ig- nored. Nothing is too sacred for the learned fool, who rushes in "where An- gels fear to tread." The true critic is one "Still pleased to teach, and yet not proud to know." Such a man has knowledge both "of books and human kind."

Having outlined the characteristics of true critics, Pope catalogues the most fa- mous critics, "the happy few" of Greece and Rome: Aristotle, Horace, Dionysius, Quintilian, Longinus. Aristotle, "Who conquered Nature" respected by the poets as the lawgiver; Horace, who "still charms with graceful negligence"; Quin- tilian's "justest rules, and clearest method": such are the true critics who flourished along with the great empires of their nations. With the fall of the empire came the fall of learning, enslavement of mind and body. Erasmus stemmed the barbarian's reign of ignorance and Boileau of France signified the advancement of critical learning in Europe. Except for the Duke of Buckinghamshire's Essay on Poetry, England despises and remains untouched by the return to the "juster ancient cause."

ESSAY ON MAN

Type of work: Philosophical verse essay

Author: Alexander Pope (1688-1744)

First published: 1733-1734

Pope's Essay on Man stands as the intellectual landmark of the eighteenth century because it embodies the cosmological, theological, and ethical thought of its age. Heavily influenced by Pope's friend Lord Bolingbroke, whose philosophy was congenial to Pope, the Essay on Man actually sums up the leading principles of the time, principles whose origins may be traced to Plato, Aristotle, Leibnitz, and others, but which were commonplace ideas by Pope's day. Arthur Lovejoy's The Great Chain of Being provides the essential background for a thorough understanding of the traditions upon which Pope drew.

The central conception of this poem rests, however, upon the ideas of plenitude, gradation, and continuity. Plenitude, for Pope, meant the overwhelming fullness of creation, of a universe inhabited by all possible essences created by God out of His own goodness. The abundance and variety of creation is also marked by gradation, the notion that there exists a graduated chain or rank among creation, moving from the lowest created thing up to God. This chain implies, of course, subordination of lower creatures to higher because each step up the ladder marks a slight variation upon the preceding step. Thus man is superior by virtue of his reason to lower beings. The ordered harmony of the entire creation depends upon the proper ordering of parts. Continuity, this ordered continuum of creation, is for Pope the principle of social and divine love which ties together all forms of creation in measured rule.

Epistle I explains the relationship of man to the universe. Man's knowledge of the universe must be limited to this world only; however, because evil exists on earth, we should not question God's ways or His justice. It is enough to know that God, because of His infinite goodness, created a perfect system and that man is merely a small part of the gigantic whole. God created the universe in one vast chain; somewhere along this chain man's place may be found. The imperfections in his nature man pretends to find are not really imperfections, for God created man suited to his place and rank in creation. Our happiness here consists in two things: our ignorance of the future and our hope for better things in the future. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast:/Man never Is, but always to be blest."

Man's chief error is his pride which causes him to aspire to be better than he is, to question Providence about the fitness of things. Such pride inverts the real order since we are the judged, not the judges. We must not presume to doubt the justice of God's dispensations. Another error is that man sees himself wrongly as the final cause of all creation, as though all nature exists to serve him alone.

Equally unjust is our wish for the strength of wild beasts or the power of angels, because God made the earth and all its inhabitants in a graduated scale; at the bottom are the lowest of creatures, man stands in the middle, and above men are multitudes of angels and, finally, God.

Vast chain of Being! which from God began,
Natures ethereal, human, angel, man,
Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see,
No glass can reach; from Infinite to thee,
From thee to Nothing.

Each animal is subordinated to the ranks above and superior to those below. Man, by virtue of his reason, rules all creation below, but he is not of ethereal substance, as an angel is, and does not possess angelic power. Therefore it is absurd to claim another's place since each is a part of the whole ordained by God. To break this vast chain at any point would destroy the whole and violate God's plan. Man should not view creation as imperfect because he can envision only a part of it. His middle place on the scale implies a limited perception of the complete plan, and what he sees as evil is actually from God's larger vision, partial evil contributing ultimately to His universal good.

All partial Evil, universal Good:
And, spite of Pride, in erring Reason's spite,
One truth is clear, WHATEVER IS,
IS RIGHT.

Epistle II discusses the nature and state of man as an individual whose tragic situation is that he is in this middle state, both god and beast, both spirit and body. In human nature two principles, self-love and reason, operate often at odds with one another. Neither is entirely good or bad; when each does its function properly and works in conjunction with the other, good results occur. Pope compares these two principles to the mechanism of a watch; within men self-love is the spring, reason the balance wheel. Without one man could not act; without the other action would be aimless. Without self-love men would vegetate; without reason men would consume themselves in lawless passion. Self-love motivates, inspires, while reason checks, advises. Self-love judges by present good and reason by future consequences. Reason through time acquires power to control impulsive self-love.

The passions are modes of self-love good as long as they conform to reason's dictates. One, the Ruling Passion, often dominates all others and determines the character of a man. No virtue arising from any passion can be wholly without value if subdued, as lust may be turned to gentle love, anger to zeal.

Although man contains both vice and virtue, Heaven compensates by converting individual defects into the strength of all. Our weaknesses motivate mutual reliance. And since each man is given his due portion of happiness and misery no one should wish to exchange his state for another's. Each should rest content with his own lot.

Epistle III discusses the role of man in society. Pope sees the whole universe as one comprehensive society, a complex system of interrelations cementing all creation. Each part relates to others but rank in the chain of being confers power and control over inferior ranks. But with rule comes responsibility, and man, the imperial race, must care for his underlings as God cares for him.

Whether ruled by animal instinct or human reason each enjoys that power best suited to his place. Although God set the necessary bounds to each species, allotting to each its particular share to happiness, he designed to ensure the happiness of the whole rather than of the part. The happiness of all depends entirely upon maintaining the proper relations among the individuals; each should love itself and others.

In the primitive state of society self-love and social love existed. Man's reason then learned useful rules from instinct. Reason observed principles of government from monarchical bees and republican ants. Man constructed his own cities and societies and soon common interest suggested the need for a ruler, who was chosen for his virtues in learning and arms. True religion and government were united in love. Superstition and tyranny arose to invert nature's order, but man's self-love taught him to protect his interests by erecting governments and laws, finding private good in public. Self-love directed to social love returned general social harmony. It is this charity that renders particular forms of government and religion unessential, for charity always seeks the happiness of all, linking self-love with social love, enlisting all ranks of creation into a harmonious order.

Epistle IV views man in relation to happiness. Since God works by general laws, he intends all to be happy, not merely a few. Because order is Heaven's first law, there can be only one result: that some beings will be greater than others. Yet, if Heaven intended all to be equally happy, to be greater is not to be happier. True happiness is not located in external condition or possessions. God compensates those who lack them with hope for the future; those who have them fear the future.

Individual bliss on earth rests on three possessions: health, peace, and competence. To good or bad men fortune may bestow its blessings, but gifts of fortune dispose the individual as he obtains them to enjoy them less. In achieving bliss the virtuous man has most advantages. We must not impute injustice to God because the virtuous man often finds calamities his reward for virtue. Calamity occurs through fortune or natural law; God does not dispense with his laws merely to favor a special person. Virtue, moreover, is not rewarded with material gifts.

Virtue's reward is not earthly and external. Its reward resides in the peace and joy of the heart. Earthly recompense would either be disdained as unworthy or would destroy the very virtue that prompted it. No shame or honor arises from one's station in life. True honor comes from faithful employment of one's responsibility. It is character that distinguishes a man, not his worldly fortune or fame. History teaches that those who attained worldly prizes frequently paid dearly for them. What deeds made the hero often corrupted the man.

Only true virtue is happiness. It is the sole thing a man may possess without loss to himself. Heaven's bliss is bestowed on him who avoids the extremism of sect and who observes in the creation the presence of God and the divine chain that links all to God. Such a man knows that true happiness belongs not to the individual but to the whole creation, that the source of all faith, law, morality, and happiness is love of God and of man. Self-love, transcending self in pursuing social love and divine, showers blessings upon all things. Self-love awakens the virtuous mind, and like a pebble dropped into water, stirring ripples on the surface, ever embraces wider and wider spheres, from friend, to parent, to neighbor, until it encompasses all living creation.

AN ESSAY TOWARDS A NEW THEORY OF VISION

Type of work: Psychological study of perception

Author: George Berkeley (1685-1753)

First published: 1709

Berkeley is most importantly a philosopher, the second of the three British Empiricists, following John Locke and preceding David Hume. An Essay Towards a New Theory of Vision was published in 1709, one year before his first important philosophical work, A Treatise Concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge. Yet the Essay is not primarily a philosophical work. It is a study of visual perception which is best classed with experimental psychology. Its major objective is to show how we perceive the distance and size of objects and their spatial relation to other objects. In so doing, Berkeley manages to criticize most of the accepted views on the topic. The last part of the Essay is a consideration of the difference between perception by sight and by touch and of whether we ever perceive the same thing by both faculties. It is in his treatment of this latter issue that Berkeley hints at the philosophical doctrines which he soon elaborated.

Most of the standard discussions of vision in Berkeley's day were couched in terms of geometric diagrams showing how light rays converged and diverged when they passed through lenses or were reflected from surfaces of varying curvature. It was claimed that distance was estimated on the basis of the angle at which light entered the eye. His criticisms of such views give the first insight into the special character of Berkeley's concern. He says that the perception of distance cannot be explained by lines and angles because we never perceive any such things and those who know nothing of optics perceive distance without ever thinking of such lines and angles. Berkeley wants to know what we perceive immediately which allows us to say that something is near or far away. Nor will he allow us to say we perceive the distance between us and an object. We estimate it on the basis of our immediate perceptions. There are three we typically use: first, the sensation we get when we cross our eyes to see something very close; second, the confused appearance of an object as it gets close to the eye, and third, the muscular strain involved in preventing, temporarily, the confused appearance of an object close to the eye. In addition to these we use our knowledge of the size, number, kind, and so on, of the objects in question. There is no necessary connection between these perceptions and the distance of objects. We have found the connection in experience and this gives rise to a habitual or customary connection between these two kinds of ideas. Visual perceptions are signs of distance and are related to it in the way a blush is to shame, or a word to the idea it stands for.

The more usual features of Berkeley's doctrine come to the fore when he explains how it is that we experience the visual sign and its connection with the distance it signifies. The idea of distance comes from touch. He insists that what we really mean when we say that an object is at a distance is that certain movements will result in certain sensations of touch. Not only do we not visually perceive distance—we do not visually perceive that which we claim to be at a distance. We say that the moon is at a great distance from us, but what we see is a small luminous disk. That is certainly not what we would find if we traversed the distance between us and the moon. What is really at a distance from us is the object of touch, not the object of sight. What we actually see is merely light and colors and these are only ideas, or sensations, and are not outside the mind at all, much less at some distance or other from us. Berkeley says that we no more see distance or distant objects than we hear distance or distant objects when we say on the basis of a clatter that the coach is a block away. In experience, certain visual perceptions are always connected with certain objects at certain distances, and one learns to infer what objects are at what distances on the basis of these perceptions. A man blind from birth and newly given sight could not tell, visually, what objects were in front of him or how far away they were. He sees neither them nor the distance and has not had the experience which will permit him to infer what the visual signs signify.

Berkeley's theory of the basis of judgments of magnitude is much the same as that for distance. Geometric explanations are rejected, and three immediate visual perceptions are offered. The first is the magnitude of the visual object; the second its confusion or distinctness, and the third its faintness or vividness. On the basis of these, singly and in combination, and the general perceptual situation, we judge the size of objects. Here Berkeley makes another distinction between visible and tangible objects. When we speak of the size of an object, it is almost always the tangible size we refer to. Visual magnitude is used as a sign and is not really noticed. Insofar as a given object is thought to have a determinate size, this is tangible size, for visible size changes with location of the perceiver.

Failure to distinguish between visible and tangible objects is easy to explain as well as the source of much confusion. Our foremost concern with the size and distance of objects is to gain the pleasant ones and to avoid the painful ones. Pleasure and pain are much more tactual than visual matters; thus, for reasons of economy, our speech and ordinary thoughts are directed to tactual magnitude and location. We so seldom have occasion to focus on visible objects in their own right that we forget they are distinct entities. Failure to distinguish them is what makes certain visual phenomena puzzling. By not confusing them, Berkeley claims to remove the anomalies connected with the moon when it appears large on the horizon, and with the fact that the retinal image of what we see is inverted.

The final quarter of the Essay is a negative answer to the question whether we can see and touch the same kinds of things; that is, shapes and sizes. Berkeley's final judgment is that one who had no tactual experience of a certain shape or size could not identify it visually. A visible square and a tangible square have nothing more in common than do a man and his name, and only the regularity of our experience justifies us in taking the visible to be a sign of the tangible. He goes so far as to say that a being which could think and see but not touch could not do geometry.

The Essay seems to contradict Berkeley's philosophy at one crucial point: it says tangible objects exist outside the mind, a view his philosophy explicitly denies. In Section 44 of the Principles, Berkeley says that he realized this to be a vulgar error, but that it was beside the point to refute it in the Essay. Whether or not this represents complete candor, Berkeley's Essay is interesting on its own and as an anticipation of his later views.

ESSAYS OF A BIOLOGIST

Type of work: Studies on scientific and religious themes

Author: Julian Huxley (1887-)

First published: 1923

Essays of a Biologist contains seven essays, besides the preface, which is an essay in itself. According to the author, the two most important studies are at the beginning and the end, but all are variations on the same theme.

Huxley's main purpose in all the essays is to demonstrate that biological science can be the basis of a new and stimulating religion. It is easier to explain what this religion is not than what it is, a fact which is perfectly understandable when one considers how complicated human knowledge and human culture have become. According to Huxley, a primitive religion based upon supernaturalism is for primitive people, but as science advances knowledge, and human relations become more and more complex, religion must adapt itself if it is to be effective. In ancient times, when little was known about the universe or man's place in it, a religion based upon supernaturalism, ritual, revelation, and priestcraft was sufficient, but in the twentieth century it is an anachronism.

If religion is to serve modern man, it must first be stripped of all outworn and antiquated theology. To people bred in the Christian tradition, such a stripping would seem to destroy religion entirely. Huxley believes, however, that it would only clear the way for a more realistic, powerful, and effective religion. It would be like tearing down an old building which had outlived its usefulness to build in its place a fine new structure, architecturally planned to fit present conditions.

Although Huxley never mentions the word semantics, he applies the principles of semantics to such words as religion and God. He does not discard the symbols, as some humanists have done, but seeks, rather, to give them new meaning. Both word symbols have meant many things to many people, and still do. In the terms of semantics, they are "loaded" words, more fraught with connotation than denotation. In seeking to give these words new meaning, therefore, Huxley is merely doing what many scholars, both religious and secular, have attempted to do, each according to his convictions. Because of his beliefs, Huxley has been called an atheist, but the word atheist is more often a term of vituperation than an exact, descriptive term. If it denotes the denial of any God whatsoever, then Huxley is not an atheist, but the founder and prophet of a new religion based on biological science.

Biology has reached the same point that physics and chemistry reached a century before: the extension of control. But, whereas control in chemistry and physics has enabled man to do more and experience more, biological science can give man control over body and mind to the extent that his entire view of the universe and his relation to it is transfigured.

The biologist, by studying evolution, has discovered proof that progress in the development of living organisms is not a delusion but a fact. This progress can be demonstrated in a purely objective manner, as Huxley shows in the essay "Progress. Biological and Other." Among living organisms, progress can be measured by (1) increasing efficiency of body organs, (2) improved co-ordination, (3) growth in size, (4) increasing accuracy and range of senses, (5) the development of capacity for knowledge, (6) memory and educability, and (7) emotional intensity. That these are actual gains can be proved by the fact that they all lead to greater control over the external world and greater independence from environment.

But progress is no longer merely physical and organic. In man, evolution has entered a "Psychozoic Era" in which progress will be measured in terms of the mind rather than of the body. Before the development of self-consciousness in man, evolution was entirely blind, depending on chance variation and selection. Now, through man, evolution is conscious of itself and therefore better able to guide and control itself. Unfortunately, man has always shown a pronounced aversion to taking any responsibility for the state of the universe. It is much easier to shift the responsibility to Fate, God, Nature, and other such capital-letter abstractions. So long as man believes that the ordering of the universe is in the hands of an omnipotent Providence, he will continue to shun responsibility and will do little or nothing to advance the process of evolution.

In all the essays, but particularly in "Progress, Biological and Other," "Biology and Sociology," "Rationalism and the Idea of God," and "Religion and Science: Old Wine in New Bottles," Huxley repeatedly seeks to convince the reader that man must be responsible for progress and improvement in the world, that he can no longer afford to shift the burden on supernatural powers and other convenient abstractions. Man is himself a part of Nature and, most important, the conscious part. Evolutionary progress will henceforth be in the mind, in developing new and more effective psychical powers, and man, the only creature in which self-consciousness has occurred, must assume full responsibility for good or evil in the world.

A religion based on science, rather than on theology, has the following characteristics and advantages: 1) It stresses religious experience rather than belief in any particular dogma. (2) It recognizes that religious experience is psychological, a product of the living mind, and not something inspired from without by supernatural powers. (3) It emphasizes the need for tolerance and enlightenment. Because it is based on no fixed creed, it can expand and adapt itself as man adds new facts to his knowledge of the world. (4) It recognizes that morals have evolved and should continue to evolve. The idea that morals are a fixed code established in the remote past by divine command has led to the present confused attitude toward sex as something shameful, unnatural, and sinful. (5) It makes possible a unified Weltanschauung in place of the present dual system of science and religion, natural and supernatural. (6) It maintains that if religious experience is accepted as psychological sublimation, the need for special priests or clerical mediators will be eliminated. Sublimation can be inspired by music, painting, sculpture, literature, philosophy, communion with nature, or by any deeply felt experience. There will be no need for a set "place of worship," or any set time. Men will be able to worship anywhere at any time.

The other three essays included in the book are of lesser import and will be treated briefly.

"Ils N'ont que de L'Âme: An Essay on Bird Mind" states that birds represent an evolutionary line of descent in which the development of emotions has superseded that of intellect. There are many examples of the apparent stupidity of birds, but Huxley is chiefly interested in convincing the reader that whatever birds lack in intelligence, they make up in emotions. He develops this theme by describing in some detail the courtship rites of such birds as egrets, grebes, kestrels, penguins, water turkeys, and others, some observed in Louisiana and some in England.

In "Sex Biology and Sex Psychology" Huxley discusses both the biological and the psychological aspects of sex. Under biology, he discusses the importance of the gonads and the entire endocrine system in the proper development of sex. He believes that at least some of the so-called Freudian complexes are physiological rather than psychological. Nevertheless, psychological maladjustments and conflicts are real enough, and many of these could be averted by proper sex education for children. Total repression of sex is very injurious, but so is complete indulgence purely on the physical level. In man, sex is no longer a mere reproductive instinct as it is in the lower animals. Because of his superior intellectual and social development, man has made sex an important part of his mental organization, where it can do great harm or great good. Harm comes when the sex drive masters all others, or when it is suppressed, or when it is sublimated to an unnatural extent. It can do the most good when it is subordinated to higher drives, but still permitted to fulfill the normal physical needs of the organism.

The remaining essay, if it can be called such, consists of two entirely different fantasies loosely joined by an informal running commentary. Although the title, "Philosophic Ants: a Biologic Fantasy," would lead the reader to expect only a fable concerning ants, equal space is given to a story about a scientist who invents a machine capable of altering the rhythm at which human beings live. The latter, as Huxley notes, is similar to "The New Accelerator," by H. G. Wells, but not influenced by it, since he was unfamiliar with the story when he wrote his fantasy. The "moral" of both fantasies concerns "biological relativity," meaning that what we perceive in the world about us is relative to the fluctuations of our environment, our own mental and emotional states, and the particular rhythm at which we live.

THE ESSAYS OF ALDOUS HUXLEY

Author: Aldous Huxley (1894-1963)

First published: On the Margin, 1923; Essays New and Old, 1926; Proper Studies, 1927; Do What You Will, 1929; Holy Face and Other Essays, 1929; Music at Night, 1931; The Olive Tree, 1936; The Art of Seeing, 1943; Themes and Variations, 1950; The Doors of Perception, 1954; Brave New World Revisited, 1958; Collected Essays, 1959; On Art and Artists, 1960; Literature and Science, 1963

Aldous Huxley wrote essays on a great variety of subjects: on nature, travel, literature, love and sex, psychology, music, painting, and even politics. Yet the division of his essays into groups can be misleading. In many of his studies the ostensible subject is only the point of a wedge and exists as the focus of opinions which are more or less contingent. Some of these opinions, it must be admitted, are in the nature of prejudices, and they are introduced into the essays at some peril.

For example, one of his essays on India, superficially an account of a railroad journey "Between Peshawar and Lahore," turns out to be an attack (a predictable one given Huxley's passionate secularism) on Indian religion in particular and on all religion in general. Huxley encounters on the train an Indian mystic, and the fact that this particular guru seems to be highly unspiritual leads with remarkable rapidity to an indictment of all religious belief. Huxley reflects, always with unquestionable brilliance, malice, and style, on the guru's character, on those of his disciples, and on his self-evident importance to himself. This particular holy man is dirty and rather objectionably the center of attention moreover, the attention accorded him is decidedly irrational and this fact particularly arouses Huxley's contempt. In response to his presence Huxley argues—and here one may wish to query the extension of his thought—that it is characteristic of all religions to honor the mindless and obedient, the dirty and the anti-intellectual. The conclusion is a large step from the example to the deduction, but Huxley seems to make it without much difficulty. Yet, with characteristic common sense

Huxley stops what he calls his own "Voltaireanism." He states that if all clerics were destroyed and if pure rationalism became the universal religion, all would perhaps be well. But, he adds, all would of course not be well at all, for there are other irrationalities which would soon take the place of religion. Like Voltaire, he sees religion as an institution of use to mankind. His viewpoint, although secular, is pragmatic: he objects to the nature of religion, not to its functions.

The values of Huxley are not to be compassed by religion, or even defined in the religious sense. He stands for a stable mental life, as we see in "Madness, Badness, Sadness"; for a realistic form of love, as we see in "Fashions in Love"; and for scientific toleration, as we see in "Beliefs." In the first of these essays Huxley reviews the history of the treatment of mental illness and asserts that some of the very worst excesses have been characteristic of religious intervention. He goes so far as to accuse Christianity of turning madness into a form of profit: the practices of Catholic magistrates and Protestant witch hunters were designed to make scapegoats of the mad. Since madmen and non-believers could equally be disposed of under religious repressions, they constituted a most attractive target for those who kept themselves in power by attacking men weaker than themselves. The argument is tenuous. One may note that religious persecution was a characteristic of certain ages as well as of certain institutions, but the point is not dealt with by Huxley. His general assumption is that religion is responsible for all those things which occur in the area it putatively overlooks.

When Huxley addresses himself to the problem of love, he notes that two conceptions of love exist in our minds at present. They represent different conventions and opinions, and they struggle for dominance in this century. One derives from the ideals of Christianity, and is of course founded on a moral interpretation of love. The other derives from nineteenth century Romanticism and is founded on an unreal sense of human experience. These two tend to give love a falsely ideal identity, and they are perpetually in conflict with the practices of postwar life. To Huxley, both our ideals and our practices seem to offer a singularly poor basis for love, and he hopes that the subject will be amenable to scientific investigation. His "Fashions in Love" asserts that the older, Christian, and non-scientific form of love was born of a set of weaknesses. It is a mixture of contradictions, of the ascetic dread of passion and the romantic worship of passion. These united to form love as we know of its "official" existence, a blend of mysticism and naturalism. In opposition to this view Huxley offers his own anthropological idea of love.

Every form of amorous behavior, he notes, no matter how strange, is found both among animals and men. In any given society, at any given moment, love is the result of the interaction of the instinctive material of sex with conventions, morality, religion, laws, prejudices, and ideals. Now this is both scientific and fascinating, and certainly no clearer statement of this position has been made. It might be pointed out, however, that in Huxley's argument amorous behavior is given the benefit of certain assumptions. For one thing, it is granted the quality of permanence simply because it is biological. Does it seem that ideas are any less valid, simply because they are not biological? One presumes not. Second, one might note that sexual activity is granted a certain value by Huxley, and this value is totally withheld from sexual restraint. In other words, Huxley accepts fully the fact that sexual behavior operates with biological authenticity in every human being—but he somehow neglects to mention that the morality governing sexual behavior seems to be no less instinctive and permanent. Indeed, if we examine primitive cultures which have presumably escaped the burden of both Christianity and Victorian naturalism, we shall find that restrictions on sexual life are every bit as thorough and perhaps every bit as comical as our own taboos. To ask, then, as Huxley does in the conclusion of "Fashions of Love," for a new mythology of nature which will make love both more intelligible and less subject to irrational moral restraints, is perhaps to ask for something which is itself mythical.

To argue with Huxley, however, is to pay tribute to the openness of his mind. In other essays he reveals the capacities of mind which have made his iconoclasm a weapon of critical value. In "Wordsworth and the Tropics" Huxley attacks an old and cherished idea that nature is a great moral force and teacher and that "nature" poetry somehow accounts for the presence and conduct of man in his environment. He reflects on what would happen if Wordsworth were to experience not the cool and chaste Gemütlichkeit of the English countryside but the darkness and fever of the tropical jungle. In that setting, hostile, diseased, full of presences inimical to man, Wordsworth and his cult might forget their faith in the goodness of nature and waken to an awareness of evil.

Other essays carry Huxley's scientific iconoclasm into resounding conflict with the totems and taboos of our culture. In "Vulgarity in Literature" he seizes upon Dickens and belabors him for the treasonable loss of intelligence to sentimentality. Dickens, according to Huxley, ceases to be able and probably ceases to wish to see reality. His actual intention, on those occasions when he deals with tears and joy, is simply to overflow, nothing more. Huxley deals with D. H. Lawrence in a much less hostile way, yet he points out that the weakness of Lawrence, as it was his strength, was his compulsion to orient himself around the sexual drives. There are very few men and ideas that can escape the qualifications of Huxley's judgment. Among them can be numbered Goya, on whom Huxley has done a remarkable job of interpretation. His sympathetic account of Goya's desastres in "Variations on Goya" is a model of artistic interpretation. For him to say that Goya remains incomparable is great praise indeed. We must realize how fully Huxley is committed to the scientific realism so well objectified by Goya's sketches of the Napoleonic Wars. That every detail of butchery and torment is true remains the foundation of Huxley's praise: Goya becomes the archetype of the Huxleyan artist, scientific, objective, material in the highest sense. It is important that he refrains from picturing either the glory or picturesqueness of war—Goya's great virtue. Here one is able to comprehend the artist as the pictorial equivalent of Huxley, in that he paints horror upon horror because that is what he recognizes in telling detail in the world around him.

THE ESSAYS OF EDGAR ALLAN POE

Author: Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849)

First published: 1850

In his youthful Essay on Criticism, Alexander Pope contended that only a demonstrated talent for creative writing gives a man the right to assess the literary productions of others. The history of criticism, of course, affords some notable exceptions. We are happy to accept the credentials of such distinguished literary critics as Aristotle, Longinus, George Saintsbury, or, to cite a modern example, I. A. Richards, even though none of these men has produced a substantial work of creative literature. Sometimes the reverse happens. The critical essays of Wordsworth, for example, are sometimes dismissed as the left-handed scribbles of a poet whose own practice repudiates his theory. But the criticism of Edgar Allan Poe is another matter. For whatever it may be worth, he meets the criterion of Pope; he had produced a number of poems and short stories before turning to criticism in the years that followed 1830. Furthermore, in spite of the fact that his criticism is often vituperative, narrow, derivative, or vague, he writes it with the authority of an accomplished master of composition, and it is here that he has something of value to say.

Most of Poe's critical essays appeared in The Southern Literary Messenger and Graham's Magazine, both of which he edited for brief periods between 1835 and 1842. Before he began his work as an editor and reviewer, however, he set forth a kind of prospectus of his critical theory in a "Letter" which first appeared as the preface to his Poems of 1831 (later published with slight revisions in the Southern Literary Messenger for July, 1836). The essay is youthful, impudent, and slight, but it definitely adumbrates the major themes of Poe's maturer criticism. And it is riddled with a number of inconsistencies. Like Pope, Poe begins by asserting that poets alone possess the ability to judge poetry—and shortly after cites a critical opinion of Aristotle. He denounces the reverence paid to foreign writers in preference to American ones, and he delivers a tirade against Wordsworth and Coleridge; but he concludes his essay with a definition of poetry that is lifted verbatim, and without acknowledgement, from the Biographia Literaria. His attack on Wordsworth is spiteful and even sophomoric. At one point he quotes a passage from Wordsworth's Advertisement to the Lyrical Ballads of 1798 and embellishes it with jeering, parenthetical interspersions of his own. Nevertheless, in his complaints about the didactic implications of Wordsworth's statements on poetry, he begins to suggest the direction of his own views—that poetry should seek to communicate pleasure rather than truth. He tells us also that music is essential to poetry because of its indefiniteness and that poetry is therefore the combination of music with a pleasurable idea.

In the reviews that began with his editorship of the Southern Literary Messenger in 1835, Poe exercised his vituperative energies with considerable gusto, but at the same time he worked toward increasing refinement and precision in his formulation of literary principles. First of all, he sought to persuade the public that criticism of the literary art is a science, founded on the fixed and immutable laws of human reason and emotion, rather than simply an expression of opinion which might include any vague generalization about the work under scrutiny. He denounced especially the chauvinistic tendency of American reviewers, who gave indiscriminate praise to native writers and to books on "American" themes, regardless of their artistic quality, and who instinctively denounced any book with a foreign subject. For his own part, Poe gave no quarter to his own countrymen. He struck with a scalpel at Theodore S. Fay's Norman Leslie, a novel by the influential editor of the New York Mirror, mercilessly dissecting its preposterous plot and extravagant language. Yet while the review of Norman Leslie is largely an ad hoc exposé of Fay's inadequacies as a novelist, Poe's other reviews are often buttressed by an appeal to critical and literary principles, to considerations which transcend the work in question and which therefore provide a sounder criterion for judgment. His examination of poems by Joseph Drake and Fitz-Greene Halleck in 1836, for example, moves beyond the immediate subject for review into a discussion of poetry in itself. Poetic sentiment, he says, is the sense of the beautiful, the sublime and the mystical; and the only means of evaluating the merits of a poem is by gauging its power to elicit this sentiment in the reader. He introduces, therefore, the principle that becomes a keystone in his poetic and literary theory: a work of creative literature must be analyzed in terms of its total effect.

This principle forms the basis of his critical perspective in all the essays that follow. In a review which appeared in Graham's Magazine in April, 1841, he applies it carefully to Night and Morning, a novel by Bulwer-Lytton. Poe admires the novel because of its perfection of plot, which he defines as an arrangement of incidents so interdependent that none can be displaced without destroying the fabric of the whole. Bulwer-Lytton, Poe conjectures, has written his story backwards, because he has first conceived his denouement and then designed his incidents to act as causes for the final effect. But Poe dislikes the episodic character of the book. He complains that its complexity is too great for the mind to comprehend at one time, so that it does not strike the reader with a single, unified effect. For its failure to produce such an effect, according to Poe, the length of the book is also responsible; this is the reason why he was so dissatisfied with anything long in poetry or fiction. Again and again he asserted that an overextended narrative destroys the unity of effect which he thought essential to a literary work.

With his review of Longfellow's Balads and Other Poems in Graham's Magazine of April, 1842, Poe enters the final and most important phase of his career as a critic. In this essay he explicitly condemns didacticism in literature, specifically the tendency of Longfellow's poems to inculcate a moral. Using terms and categories which he seems to have borrowed from Kant by way of Coleridge, he maintains that just as truth appeals to the intellect and duty to the moral sense, so poetry must appeal to taste alone, for taste is the sense which enables mankind to appreciate the beautiful, and especially that which is eternally or supernally beautiful. This is the first of three crucial ingredients in poetry as Poe conceives it. The second is novelty or creativity, and the third—recalling a statement in his early "Letter"—is music, because of its celestial quality. The combination of these ingredients produces the definition to which Poe is finally committed: poetry is the rhythmical creation of beauty.

The remainder of Poe's essays simply elaborate the principles he has already announced. In reviewing Hawthorne's Twice Told Tales in Graham's Magazine of May, 1842, Poe uses the concept of unified effect to formulate his theory of literary composition. He pays tribute to Hawthorne's genius (a generous gesture at the time), but he finds Hawthorne peculiar rather than original, because Hawthorne's stories fail to satisfy the reader's sense of the new. Also, Poe declares that Hawthorne's strain of allegory is objectionable because it interferes with that unity of effect which is absolutely essential to the success of a tale. After these rather perfunctory statements, he proceeds to enunciate his views on the value of brevity in literature. In his review of Bulwer-Lytton's novel he had criticized the assumption that length has any intrinsic merit; now he contends that if a poem is to produce the effect of intense excitement, it must be short. But it cannot be too short, he says, for it must have sufficient time to build the kind of momentum that makes a powerful impact. In poetry, as in the tale, the writer must have full control over the reader, and extreme length makes such control impossible. It militates against the fulfillment of the single effect which the writer must seek to establish with every word he writes. This is why Poe believes that a long poem is an impossibility. In his judgment, the hallmark of an effective composition is the evidence of design in every part of it, the ordering of all its aspects to a pre-established end.

Poe demonstrates the practical application of this axiom in what is perhaps the most famous of his critical essays, "The Philosophy of Composition," first published in Graham's Magazine of April, 1846. Here he offers a detailed, step-by-step analysis of the process by which he composed The Raven. Whatever we may think of this cold-blooded dissection of the creative act, it is very probably true to the spirit (if not the letter) of what actually happened as Poe wrote the poem. In any event, the explication shows exactly how Poe intends a writer to achieve the all-important unity of impression; his composition of The Raven is a paradigm of the creative process as he understood it. He began, he tells us, with the intention of creating a single impression, an intense, elevating excitement of the soul. Every piece of the poem was then selected and arranged with this effect in view. First of all, he decided that the poem must be brief. Second, because beauty is the province of poetry he determined to achieve it with a tone of melancholy, established in a single, sonorous word and continuously repeated for maximum impact. Out of this grew the details of the poem—the refrain of "Nevermore," the raven, the bereaved lover, the dead woman, the chamber at midnight, the antiphonal exchange of questions and answers, and the driving rhythm with its strong alliteration and internal rhymes. All of these details were designed to produce a preconceived effect upon the reader, a feeling of beauty tinged with sadness. According to Poe, therefore, the principles of composition are precise, logical, and impersonal, even though the end in view is the evocation of intense psychic excitement. There is no place in the writing of poetry for careless rapture or fine frenzy. Cool and detached, the poet constructs a formula for the kind of impression he seeks to convey.

In a lecture he delivered frequently during the last years of his life, Poe summarized the major tenets of his literary theory under the title, "The Poetic Principle," and after his death the lecture was published as an essay in The New York Home Journal of August 31, 1850. He recapitulates here the points we have already seen in the earlier essays, condemning length and didacticism, and emphasizing particularly that the value of a poem can be measured only by the effect it produces. But the chief purpose of the essay is to show, by a number of examples from various poems, that the poetic principle itself is the human aspiration for supernal beauty and that the principle is always manifested in an elevating excitement of the soul. Poe thus concludes his literary criticism on a note of majestic vagueness, but he leaves us at the same time with a theory of poetry that springs from years of contemplation on his own practice. For all his generalities, his dogmatism, his vituperative harshness, and his intellectual debts abroad, Poe commands a prominent place in the history of literary criticism of America.

THE ESSAYS OF G. K. CHESTERTON

Robert Graves called Chesterton "the elephantine paradoxist." Like the man, the body of Chesterton's literature is enormous. A versatile and prolific writer, like his hero Samuel Johnson, he wrote plays, biographies, novels, and detective stories, nonfiction in such areas as anthropology, archaeology, ancient and recent history, national and international politics, theology, philosophy, art, and literary criticism; and he was also a renowned lecturer. The scope of his interests embraced almost every aspect of contemporary life. Although he was an eminent man of letters, he preferred to call himself a journalist. Beginning in 1901, he contributed regularly to two leading newspapers; in 1918, he became editor of G. K.'s Weekly. For thirty-five years, he regularly wrote informal essays to the exacting space limitations of the newspaper column form. That he welcomed such limitations is evident in many of the essays; one of his favorite paradoxes was that restraint, externally imposed by social necessity, internally dictated by a self-disciplined conscience, offered the only freedom worth striving to achieve. Chesterton's informal essays provide a comprehensive presentation of his views.

Never as light as his contemporary, Max Beerbohm, Chesterton was seldom overtly serious. Occasionally he conveyed his serious points through fantasy. Though his most common tone was mildly satirical, his essays were seldom sustained satires. While he showed that pure reason has severe limitations and imposes certain penalties, it was clear thinking that enabled him to recognize the importance of nonsense. He feigned lunacy momentarily as a lever for insight into the nature and practice of sanity; in his views a sane man was one who, in a single moment, could have "tragedy in his heart and comedy in his head." The seeming lightness of his essays makes his insights more bearable and lasting.

Because his technique is transparent, perhaps, Chesterton's use of rhetorical devices appears even more impressive. He makes us aware of certain devices only to capture us with others that operate simultaneously. For instance, he appears to end a thought in his characteristically epigrammatic way, but a few sentences later he startles us with a brilliant paradox or thrust of wit that he planted, parenthetically, in the epigram. His paradoxes are often inverted truisms. Each essay is a necklace of such paradoxes, used to choke or adorn the reader, depending on his doctrinal affinities. If his paradoxes are sometimes shallow, one must remember that deep ones are not so easy to dredge up that one can fill hundreds of essays, line by line, with them.

The informal essay is to prose what the lyric is to poetry, and it is most fascinating when the practitioner conveys a sense of himself. Chesterton's commanding "I", always felt, is overwhelming. He is constantly setting the reader straight, advising, scolding, cautioning him, balancing this aggression with an amiably ironical attitude toward himself. His exuberance, frank enthusiasm, vigor, robustness, and masculine high spirits reveal a strong man, an antidote to the whiners, weaklings, and victim mentalities of his time and ours. But he was a man of fine feeling. In "The Secret of a Train," upon discovering that he and a dead man are the sole passengers, he throws away his cigar, and thus understands the meaning of ritual. The mainspring of most of his essays is a personal experience, in the relating of which his facility for descriptive writing is apparent. Perhaps his most appealing characteristic is his belief, paradoxical for a conservative, in the importance of a romantic attitude. Most of the best things in the universe cost nothing; the others cost only a halfpenny. The source of man's major perplexity, he felt, ought to be the realization that there are so many interesting things in life that one cannot be sufficiently interested in any of them. In "On Running After One's Hat" and "The Romantic in the Rain" he argues that one should joyously and poetically transform the irritations of everyday life. With one leg temporarily maimed, he saw "The Advantages of Having One Leg": one could see the beauty of both legs and thus God's image in man more clearly. Lacking white chalk with which to sketch, he used a piece of the rock he was sitting on and thus realized that England was "A Piece of Chalk."

One of his most famous paradoxes was that ordinary, everyday things are the strangest, most fascinating, and wondrous of all. He broke the routine form of the novel of crime detection by introducing the famous Father Brown, whose intuitions produced the solution to numerous mysteries. Chesterton was himself a sleuth of the mysteries of the ordinary, whose solution was that the common is far from commonplace if we remain always receptive to the metaphysical moment. He could turn an ordinary ride in a railway coach into a terrifying glimpse of the psychic perils of the familiar. Serving on a jury, he learns the amazing appropriateness of twelve ordinary men deciding important matters, as when Christ chose his disciples. In essay after essay, he turns the accepted notion upside down, thus making it more visible and understandable. To him, proverbs had a validity that overuse obscures; even vulgar jokes were subtle and spiritual ideas. The great task is to comprehend the trivial. For him, the path to outer space would begin at the front gate of one's own home. Given the hearthlike familiarity of his point of departure, his paradoxes often take off into the Kafka-esque, the absurd, into black humor. But typically enough, in Chesterton the absurd proves to be a domestic ceremony, and black humor ends on a coda of divine laughter.

The things that must have been most evident in the human parade Chesterton witnessed, through his youth in the late Victorian era, his manhood before and during World War I, his middle-age during the Jazz Age, and his old age during the Great Depression, were the spectacular paradoxes in human thought and behavior. He observed them daily in politics, literature, manners, mores, fads, fetishes, perversities, popular entertainment, and technological changes. This paradoxical ambience inspired nonconservative writers to undermine the foundations of Victorian attitudes with a kind of paradoxical relativism. Chesterton, the cool-headed arch-conservative, fought liberals with their own weapon. Paradox was a decadent device which he used to bury the decadents. But for him paradox was more than a weapon; if the liberal used it to destroy, or as a perverse solace amid the ruins, Chesterton used it to justify, explain, defend, and enshrine the tenets of his own doctrine, while hanging the enemies of stability by their heels. He demonstrated that paradox is the conservative's, not the revolutionary's, true province; it is the vehicle for the eternal return. His paradoxes became platitudes for certain conservatives, popularly known as Chestertonians (much as certain liberals were called Shavians).

A rugged optimist, somewhat like Browning in attitude and belief, Chesterton argued the efficacy of conservative principles, venerable institutions, ritual and convention, common sense, and Christian mores out of a vigorous, dogmatic disapproval of the prevailing skepticism and pessimism. A convert to Catholicism, he was an apologist and champion of the faith. Trust the order of things as they are, he said; everything has its proper place, proportion, and use. To be free of convention is to move slavishly from one fad to another. His notorious absent-mindedness was that of a man with his mind always on the literal things of the world. Characteristic of the true conservative, his point of view remained consistent, and he attributed his freedom of thought and imagination to this basic rigidity. For him, the exciting and important questions were the old ones.

Chesterton was a controversialist. He argued that to be profoundly international one must first be national. Socialism is slavery. Democracy is deeper than democrats understand, for what follows it is true revolution. Science, combined with hasty reform, will enslave man, and create a "panic of prohibition." Those who desire the perfection of society fail to see that perfection destroys its object. Chesterton lived in a time when technology promised a bright, if not a brave, new world, but it was one in which progress carried the germs of its own blight. He abhorred mass production and attacked technological infringements upon ordinary human liberties. In "The Pagoda of Progress" he argued that true progress was a search for a place to stop. Ever-increasing complexity in a civilization fosters a multiplicity of tortures. He noted that an old thing is disparaged the more we sense the necessity of concealing the awfulness of the new thing that replaces it. When there is no joy in work, there is no joy in leisure; the modern pleasure-seeker often destroys joy because he forces two pleasures to exist together so that they kill each other off, as when one combines good food with music or with the convenience of speed on a train. In "Sight-seeing" he declares that a mob going to see a sight is a contradiction; a sight should arrest a man accidentally; men should not arrest sights and imprison them in museums. In "On Lying in Bed" he laments that man has lost the art of doing nothing.

Chesterton was a man of culture whose erudition was clear and honest, without. He derided smug sophistication and precious intellectuality ("The Prison of Jazz," "Tennyson," "Meredith"). Only to the literary imagination is the sea infinite, for instance; Chesterton agreed with the country girl who said the sea resembled a cauliflower, a simile that expresses its boundedness. He believed that truly free men would speak in rhyme and meter. "The Slavery of Free Verse" consists in its trying to become more poetical by ignoring what distinguishes it from prose. He went to poetry to find better words than his own, not fidelity to everyday speech. In "On Literary Cliques," Chesterton observes that the clique cherishes the imperfect work, the work in progress, rather than work worthy of the world. The strenuous work of artists is to describe the indescribable; thus the original mind always tries to explain itself. But certain modern critics and cliques deify the unutterable.

Chesterton ridiculed modern thought, postures of despair and disengagement, and sentimental evasion of moral principles disguised as fearless freethinking. In "On Sentiment" he showed that antisentimentalism is a snobbish form of sentimentalism, practiced by soft realists. In "The Sentimentalism of Divorce" he declares that he can understand why certain liberals believe in divorce, but not why they ever get married in the first place. Free love is the enemy of freedom; the luxury of laxity in anything is a bribe of slavery; when the profligate has painted the town red, he cannot see any red at all. Chesterton preferred the coarse language of his ancestors to the "Evil Euphemisms" of certain realists. He declared that he was almost alone in not being a skeptic about liberty, for the free thinker is not free to think optimistically; he feels compelled to be a cynic or a pessimist. But Chesterton believed that all pessimism aspired to optimism. His own optimism was dedicated to revealing this paradox to pessimists.

THE ESSAYS OF HENRY DAVID THOREAU

Author: Henry David Thoreau (1817-1862)

First published: From 1842 to after Thoreau's death

To the nonspecialist Thoreau's significant works could be numbered on the fingers of both hands. Of these undoubtedly the first to come to mind would be Walden, his most famous book, and perhaps A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers. But almost as famous and perhaps even more influential have been several of his essays, which were written on various occasions for different purposes, and generally on rather widely ranging subjects. More than his two famous books, his essays vary in quality from the nearly banal to the profound, from the useless to the useful. To the reader genuinely interested in the life and writings of one of America's greatest and most influential writers—as well as perhaps our most outstanding true Transcendentalist—all his works are fascinating. But since many do concern closely related subjects and treat these topics in a similar manner, a selection of the works can give the heart of the essays.

Thoreau's earliest essay, possibly, is one named "The Seasons," written when he was only eleven or twelve years old.

As would be expected, it is of importance only to the close specialist. There are also in existence at least twenty-eight essays and four book reviews that Thoreau wrote while a student at Harvard. These, too, are of greater interest to the student interested in the young Harvardian than to the readers looking for the Thoreau of mature ideas and style.

His first published essay was "Natural History of Massachusetts," printed in 1842. This work does more than promise the later man. It is, in fact, the mature thinker and observer already arrived. Drawn chiefly from entries in his journals, which he had begun to keep after graduation from Harvard in 1837, it reveals his characteristics of Transcendentalism and his keen eye for observation, an eye that was to make him acclaimed by many people as one of America's best early scientists. It reveals Thoreau's pleasure in viewing the world around him and his detachment from the world of men. He believes, for example, that one does not find health in society but in the world of nature. To live and prosper, a person must stand with feet firmly planted in nature. He believes, also, that society is corrupting, is inadequate for man's spiritual needs; when considered as members of a society, especially a political organization, men are "degraded." As a scientist, Thoreau catalogues many aspects of natural phenomena in Massachusetts; he notes, for example, that 280 birds live permanently in that state or summer there or visit it passingly.

Among Thoreau's best essays is another reasonably early one, "A Winter Walk," published in 1843, the material of which was taken mainly from his journal for 1841. As was generally the case with Thoreau, this essay is lyrical and ecstatic, the lyricism being augmented by the inclusion of various bits of Thoreau's own poetry. Thematically the essay is strung on a long walk on a winter's day and the observations and meditations of the author as he progresses. Both his observations and meditations are mature, virtually as vivid and sound as those given in the later Walden. His reactions to the physical walk are immediate and sharply detailed. He likes to walk through the "powdery snow," and he feels that man should live closer to nature in order to appreciate life fully. In a Wordsworthian-pantheistic point of view, he feels that plants and animals and men, if they would conform, find in nature only a "constant nurse and friend."

Thoreau's most famous essay is "Resistance to Civil Government," published in 1849 and renamed, after Thoreau's death, "Civil Disobedience," the title by which it is known today. As is often the case, this essay grew directly from an experience by the author, this time Thoreau's one-night imprisonment for non-payment of his taxes, taxes which he claimed would go to finance the Mexican War and were therefore, in his mind, immoral. The influence of this essay has been profound and far-reaching and long-lasting. It served Gandhi as a guidebook in his campaign to free India from British rule; it also served the British Labour party in England during its early days; it offered model and hope for the European resistance against Nazi Germany, and it has aided, more recently, the struggle for civil rights by Negroes in the South.

The essay is a bristling and defiant reaffirmation of the individualism of man, of his moral obligation to restate his individualism and to act on it. Government, any government, is at best an expediency. Thoreau heartily accepts the precept "That government is best which governs least," a thesis which logically leads to the conclusion that "That government is best which governs not at all." Government, however, still exists, but it is not unchangeable: "A single man can bend it to his will." Government, in Thoreau's eyes, was far from pure and beneficent. He felt that he could not have as his government those institutions which enslaved certain races and colors. Therefore he felt compelled to resist his government. He felt that ten men—even one—could abolish slavery in America if they would allow themselves to go to prison for their belief and practice. Men of good will must unite. Every good man must constitute a majority of one to resist tyranny and evil. Democracy may not be the ultimate in systems of government, he concludes, in a ringing statement of man's political position: "There will never be a really free and enlightened State, until the State comes to recognize the individual as a higher and independent power, from which all its own power and authority are derived, and treats him accordingly."

One of Thoreau's notable essays is "A Plea for Captain John Brown," published in 1860, one of three on the same person, the other two being "After the Death of John Brown," delivered at the Concord memorial services for Brown, held the day the raider of Harpers Ferry was hanged, and "The Last Days of John Brown," written for a memorial service on July 4, 1860. The earliest essay of the three justifies the actions of Brown because generally he tried to put Thoreau's convictions into action.

"Walking," published in 1862, was taken from his journal written some ten years earlier and used as material for lectures in the early 1850's. It is an enthusiastic reaction to the joys of walking, "for absolute freedom and wildness," in which Thoreau in effect boasts that the course of progress is always westward, drawn probably from the mere fact, as has been pointed out, that around Concord the best walking country was to the southwest. Extremely lyrical, the essay sometimes surfaces into sheer nonsense, as in the statement, for example, that "Above all, we cannot afford not to live in the present. He is blessed over all other mortals who loses no moment of the passing life in remembering the past." Such comments caused a more deeply dedicated thinker, Herman Melville, to react with great scorn and frequently to satirize Thoreau's easy optimism.

"Life Without Principle," published more than a year after Thoreau's death in 1863, was likewise drawn from the journals during the author's most powerful decade, in the early 1850's. Delivered in 1854 as "Getting a Living," it is a ringing statement on the dignity and real worth of the individual, of the man. It is the voice of the self-reliant man calling all individuals to the assertion of their self-reliance so that they can live like men and live fully. Thoreau feels that most men misspend their lives, especially those who are concerned merely with getting money: "The ways by which you may get money almost without exception lead downward. To have done anything by which you earned money merely is to have been truly idle or worse." To be born wealthy is disastrous, as he says in one of his pithy statements, is rather "to be stillborn." The wise man cannot be tempted by money. He must be free, as Thoreau was convinced, feeling that his "connection with and obligation to society are still very slight and transient."

The world must be composed of individuals and must live not for the moment but for eternity. "Read not the Times. Read the Eternities." America must reform. "Even if we grant that the American has freed himself from a political tyrant, he is still the slave of an economical and moral tyrant." In other ways America has not lived up to her potential. She is not the land of the free. "What is it to be free from King George and continue to be the slaves of King Prejudice? What is it to be born free and not to live free?" The everyday affairs of life, politics, and routine, are necessary aspects of life to be sure, but they should be "unconsciously performed, like the corresponding functions of the physical body" so that the mind—the better parts of men—can rise to the greater and nobler aspects of living so that they will not discover at death that life has been wasted.

This essay is Thoreau at his best. He is characteristically the Transcendentalist, the individualist, voicing his opinion without reserve, pithily and most tellingly. Thoreau was perhaps more than other nineteenth century American writers circumscribed in his subjects for writing. Therefore his essays are repetitious. He liked to brag that he was widely traveled in Concord. But, though perhaps narrow in breadth, Thoreau's writings are shafts reaching to the essence of man's being. And a half dozen essays represent him truthfully and succinctly.

THE ESSAYS OF MAX BEERBOHM

Author: Max Beerbohm (1872-1956)

First published: The Works of Max Beerbohm, 1896; More, 1899; Yet Again, 1909; And Even Now, 1920; A Variety of Things, 1928; Mainly on the Air, 1946

Max Beerbohm was a caricaturist, a writer of informal essays, and a drama critic for twenty years. His manner was always elegant, delicate, and grave, and he wore an air of perpetual melancholy. It was said of him that as a very young man he had mastered the secret of perpetual old age. Partly his melancholy stemmed from his deep admiration of the past. He looked wistfully backward to Victorian London and deplored changes of any sort. He began to draw at an early age and drew sharp, witty caricatures that both amused and angered his subjects. Often he requested permission of his subjects before drawing them, sometimes having an interview in order to catch closely their essential characteristics. He did caricatures of the royal family that were subsequently bought up and kept out of circulation. Many of his drawings are in museums.

He could not draw other than as he felt, and during the Boer War he was sharply critical of England's role and of Rudyard Kipling's imperialistic sentiments. As an old man he confessed that he had not intended to be cruel to Kipling, one of the few people whom he alienated, to his great regret. As a drama critic he upheld standards of good drama, deploring plays that were simply commercially successful. However, he made light of his work as a drama critic, as he did of all his work.

As might be expected in one who was an expert caricaturist, his chief interest was in people, their characters and the way they lived rather than in what they preached. He believed that most people wear masks and that the most successful people are those few who are what they seem, who have become one with their masks. Thus he felt that Bernard Shaw harangued his audiences, that the best part of him was in his stage directions and his criticism. Max, of course, was always for the underdog, the victim of society. He admired greatly the music hall singers who sang songs portraying the little man, pathetic but gallant and humorous in the face of overwhelming odds. His essays are built around trivial subjects generally and are written with the quiet humor and nostalgic air of one who looks to the past and finds the present generation rather strange and events moving too rapidly.

In his first collection of essays, The Works of Max Beerbohm, there are such pieces as "Dandies and Dandies" and "Poor Romeo!" In the former the writer discusses the true dandy and of the person that attempts to be one. Max felt that Beau Brummell was the true dandy and that many men have tried but failed to reach the pureness of Brummell's art. Count D'Orsay tried to be a dandy but did not regard dandyism as a serious art and therefore fell short of the mark. Mr. Le V., a name given by Max, is shown in preparation for the serious art of being a dandy. The preparations take all morning and near noon Mr. Le V. enters his dressing room. In an interview he even tells Max what he will wear to approach the pearly gates.

"Poor Romeo!" is a wonderfully written essay on Robert Coates. It relates an interlude in Bath and tells how Coates was tricked into portraying Romeo in the most ridiculous manner by the woman he loved simply to get her revenge because of a trick he had enjoyed at her expense. Robert Coates was a real person, not a creation of Max's mind, as were T. Fenning Dodworth, Mr. Hethway, or Enoch Soames. Coates went on to act the same role in England. Max's account of the interlude is clever and polished as are most of his essays. His statement that he was for the underdog can be affirmed by this essay and by his character Enoch Soames, who did not exist in life but became real to the people who read Max's article on him.

Max's second publication of collected essays, More, contains several clever works. One, "Going Back to School," is amusing and interesting. Max tells of his school experiences and how glad he is to be finished with them. It is Max's style and manner of phrasing that keeps the reader entertained and interested. In this essay Max describes returning to school after a holiday as being something comparable to drowning; the rude sound of the first bell served to remind him he was now in school. Max desired comfort, something he felt was totally lacking in school life. Also, he felt that at Oxford all the nonsense which had been worked out of undergraduates in dreary, earlier schools was returned to them. He wonders why he should feel any pity for the present schoolboy; Max feels that the remembered unpleasantness of school makes his present complacency more enjoyable.

Max's ideas on "Hosts and Guests" is found in his work And Even Now. His views were complementary to those of Gerhart Hauptmann. It was Max's contention that people had either the desire to offer hospitality or to accept it, and it is this desire to be one or the other that divides people into the two classes: hosts and guests. His comments on the entertaining done by the Borgias is quite clever. Max says that a Roman could say that he was going to eat dinner with the Borgias, but you would never hear a Roman say that he had dined with the Borgias. Max is certain that he was born a guest and the fact that he must sometimes be the host makes him as uncomfortable as a host who is forced to act as a guest.

"Ichabod" was Max's hatbox. The essay is found in the work Yet Again. "Ichabod," as Max's traveling companion, carried a collection of labels. When Max sent the hatbox to a trunk-maker to have the lock repaired, the well-meaning man removed all the labels. The collection represented only the places Max had actually visited. The labels are discussed as are the various incidents they bring to mind. Max ends the essay with the statement that greater adventures are surely awaiting "Ichabod."

The same collection contains "Seeing People Off," an excellent study of the futility of it all. The fact that people do not really want to see you off and that you would rather they did not rings true in his example. Also, "A Pathetic Imposture" shows us the length to which newsmen go to make a simple story complicated. He even shows us how this is done by the use of diagrams.

Max's attachment to England was strong and during the war years he returned to London. During World War II he did many broadcasts, reading his own essays. At this time he came to be regarded with great affection. His quiet, elegant voice, serenely undisturbed by the war, was entirely occupied with personal matters and with upholding traditions, both large and small, and thus he contributed greatly to English morale at a difficult period. These broadcasts were later published with some essays in a collection titled Mainly on the Air. "Speed" is one of the most entertaining. Max states that today, speaking of the year 1936, you must creep into a car, crouch while in it, and squirm out of it. The old cars, Max says, were open to the elements. Air was forced into your lungs, dust filled your pores, and you were jostled about in every direction. Max felt that all this was good for you, that a good shower after such an experience made you feel like a new man. Inspiration could be created by a man running, galloping on horseback, driving a pair of horses at breakneck speed, sailing a boat, or flying by the use of natural wings. Flying in an airplane, motor-boating, or riding in a car was not inspirational and would not move writers as some more natural means could. Part of this essay was used by pedestrians in a pamphlet they published.

Several characters Max wrote about so vividly and in such detail that people believed they were real men. But they lived only in Max's imagination. Mr. Hethway and T. Fenning Dodworth, particularly the latter, gained great reputation. Dodworth was dignified but had a pungent, barbed wit. His famous phrase was "And after?" Max also made up an interview with Albert Einstein in which Einstein explained how he came to discover his theory. Max finished by vowing that he would see that the world knew of Einstein's discovery.

Often Max wrote essays about his friends. George Moore he considered an absolutely natural man. He spoke simply and if he had nothing to say he kept quiet in a blank sort of way. His expression never changed. Nevertheless, he was a fine critic, honest and modest, and his face was a delight to painters, who found it a challenge. Sir Desmond MacCarthy was a good writer and a fine talker, chiefly because his constant remarks were, "Tell me, tell me," followed by, "I see, I see." For Max, William Butler Yeats was a man apart, not really of this world. Often Max failed to get his meaning, and while Yeats's speeches were not moving, Max considered this failure to be his, not the poet's. He knew Henry Irving as a young man who even in his youth intimidated others. Max tells about his having luncheon with Irving one day. Irving asked him questions and Max began to talk nervously, unable to stop and feeling that he was making a worse impression every moment. Finally, in answer to a question about his future, Max said he thought himself called to the bar. At the very moment of saying this to Irving—who said simply, "Ha!"—he knew his statement to be so absurd that he changed his mind on the spot and knew he would never, never be called to the bar.

Max's nostalgia about the past and its manners can be found in many essays, such as the one on the top hat, in which the hat seems almost alive, responds to different moods, care and weather; or the one called "Ichabod," about the much-traveled hat box covered with labels; or the essays on the House of Commons in which Max says that in the old days speakers had true style, robust and impressive. Nowadays he feels that they have no style whatever and would do better to remain silent. Once he saw a performance in a small town of the Morris dance for May Day. He traces the history of this dance back to its origins, recalls the famous dancers Kemp and Thorn-drake, and laments that this simple survival of the past will soon be gone. Grace itself he felt had gone into decline. Modern young men, he decides, are boorish. Grace in the little affairs of life must be learned, and the modern young man does not learn easily. While he liked to see some juvenility swagger, he did believe that all the things worth doing have been done; those left undone had better be given a wide berth.

Two places Max frequented by himself: the station hotel and the law court. He often bade his friends goodbye, said he was going on a trip, and then went to the station hotel in London where he enjoyed the spacious rooms, the meals by himself, and the sight every morning of the workers rushing off on the trains. The law court he found more satisfying than the theater. He loved the paneling, the wigs, the scurrying of the clerks, and the eagerness and ominousness of it all. He never considered whether the person concerned were guilty or innocent, but what kind of person he was. He derived acute mental enjoyment from a cross-examination.

Max's real love was drawing, an art he continued to practice for his friends until his death. He had given up caricaturing some years before when he discovered that he was drawing true likenesses instead of caricatures. In one essay, "Fenestralia," he considered portraits with the subjects placed in windows. He thought the window frame was to painting as form is to literature, as the proscenium is to a play. One's imagination had entire freedom to picture what was inside the room. Also, words spoken by a person half indoors or outdoors are more impressive than words spoken entirely inside or outside.

In the hospital, during his last illness, Max pointed out to Elizabeth Jungmann, the secretary-companion who became his wife shortly before his death, how the setting sun threw a purple shadow across a portion of his room. This color and shadow he watched with pleasure and he would not allow a light to be turned on in the room so that the shadow might have a longer life. Max had an artist's eye and was ever attentive to the nuances of character and color about him.

EXILE AND THE KINGDOM

Type of work: Short stories

Author: Albert Camus (1913-1960)

Locale: North Africa, Paris, Brazil

First published in translation: 1958

When Albert Camus received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1957, there was some surprise that the award had gone to so young an author and one whose ultimate direction was still uncertain; but there were few dissenting voices. The reason is clear. Even though his meanings may not be easily grasped, Camus was obviously an important writer in the European tradition of the man of letters. As novelist, playwright, political and moral pamphleteer, and short story writer, he had from the beginning of his career addressed himself to a program of literary activity which, according to the citation of the Swedish Academy, "with clear-sighted earnestness illuminates the problems of the human conscience in our times." If his preoccupation with the larger concepts of man's fate—war, guilt, God, love, and death—on occasion clouded with abstract argument the simple fables he chose to enclose them, he nevertheless demonstrated the working of a poised and sincere intelligence in his attempt to reconcile the evidence of history with the idea of life as value. His importance to us is the imaginative treatment he gave to the political and the moral decay which underlie the special terror of our century.

Each age creates its own shapes of fantasy and terror. Roderick Usher gives place to Dorian Gray. The terrors of the Grand Guignol have their sea change in Faulkner's Jefferson or on the rocky beach at Carmel. The outcasts of Dostoevski echo in the troubled ghosts of Koestler and Silone. Our century has found its agonized image in the psychology of the irrational and its meaning in themes of guilt and expiation. Raskolnikov and Mitya, Conrad's Razumov and Lord Jim, Mann's Krull, Kafka's K., and Camus' Meursault mark the line of its succession. This literature represents our accumulation of suffering in terms of grief, guilt, and loss. But today the whole impact of disaster and doom is no further from us than the news broadcast or the headlines of our daily papers. We all have our part in the nightmare of history, and we wonder at what point we were betrayed. Somewhere in the past, in the unconscious reservoir of memory and dream, we should have prepared ourselves for this age of wars, regimented societies, and threats of mass annihilation.

Today every serious writer must commit himself in some degree to this literature of terror. He cannot transcend his world; he can only describe it. Even if he believes that we are between two great movements of civilization, he faces a world of no set values. Crime, for example, loses much of its moral significance when it becomes political and impersonal; murder may be virtuous and treachery noble. The earlier writer could take his world for granted. The characters of Dostoevski and Dickens are everywhere surrounded by a society that rested upon recognizable moral value; we measure the enormity of their guilt by the intellectual, social, religious, or domestic beliefs of the society from which they stand apart. But the modern writer has no such vista. He uses the immediate nightmare to explore the lies, perversions, brutalities, and fears which threaten man's responsibility through morality or reason, and if he is nimble enough he may reclaim the human atom from the processes of annihilation and death.

In the nihilistic world of Albert Camus, salvation is neither easy nor consoling, for his people achieve at best a sense of identity and a mere glimpse of fulfillment. As he wrote in The Rebel, those who cannot accept God or the evidence of history must live for others who, like themselves, are unable to live fully; they must live for the humiliated. This is the theme running through all his books, though it becomes more explicit in his later work, his brilliant short novel, The Fall, and the six short stories in Exile and the Kingdom.

It is clear that out of the confusion of the time Camus was able to formulate for himself a strategy of moral advantage—a series of strategies, rather, which began with the view of the absurd, carried him through the philosophy of revolt, and then uncovered the Greek ideal of measure seen behind his later literary position. These shifts in attitude and insight help to explain the fact that the total body of his writing suggests an area of greater significance than he presented in any single work. Also, they account for the complementary nature of his books and the fact that each seems to answer a question previously raised, so that The Plague may be read as an answer to The Stranger, The Fall as a response to The Plague, and all three interpreted as responses to questions raised in The Myth of Sisyphus and The Rebel.

This interrelated aspect of his work gives Exile and the Kingdom its qualities of relevance and depth. All are, in effect, parables that rely on symbolism and philosophical consideration of the outsider's plight to convey meanings implied but never clearly stated. One of the most perplexing stories is "The Adulterous Woman." The middle-aged heroine, Jane, has gone with her dull, complacent salesman husband on a business trip to North Africa. Her encounter with the Arabs and the desert awaken her to a realization of the barrenness and waste in her own life, much like this arid land which she thinks of as a strange kingdom where since earliest times men have walked in poverty and sadness but free, serving no one. She feels that this is the kingdom promised her, but unattainable. One night she attempts to come into her kingdom—to escape the slow misery of living and dying—by going out on the city wall to experience a brief sense of mystical union, almost sexual in its intensity, with the desert and the night, only to return to her hotel bedroom and weep at the sight of her stupid, sleep-dazed husband, the image of her bondage and exile.

"The Renegade" gains its effectiveness through horror and atrocity. A young missionary priest who mistakes his will to power for a martyr's zeal has gone to minister to a Bedouin tribe living in a strange city of salt. The savage tribesmen have subjected him to unspeakable cruelties. Half-crazed, his tongue torn out, he has rejected his faith to worship the monstrous fetish of his captors. In this tale in the form of a monologue the narrator proclaims that only the reign of evil, of absolute power, is without flaw. When the opportunity comes, he determines to kill another missionary who is being sent to the city. Apparently, for the sequence is never clear, the wild tribesmen seize and torture him again. In his agony he hears a voice promising forgiveness if he will die for hatred and power. He is unable to tell whether he hears God's voice or that of the other man unwilling to die at his feet. The symbolism of aridity and torment is again introduced at the end of the story; the mouth of a slave is filled with salt.

In contrast to these clouded tales, "The Guest" is comparatively simple in outline. In a remote schoolhouse on a high Algerian plateau the teacher, a young man with no sense of exile in this world of mountain and desert, is preparing to stay out a sudden snowstorm. Two travelers take refuge in the schoolhouse, a gendarme and his prisoner, an Arab murderer. Because the gendarme has other duties, the authorities have requested that the schoolteacher conduct the prisoner to the nearest village. The teacher, caught between his disgust with the crime committed and his aversion to turning a man over to the law, sets out with the prisoner, but at a place where the roads branch he turns the Arab loose to decide between the path to prison or the path to freedom. To his surprise, the Arab takes the road to prison. On his return to the schoolhouse the teacher finds a threatening message from the murderer's kin scrawled on his blackboard. Another story of restrained effect, though less successful, is "The Silent Men," which tells of a coopers' strike that has failed. Returning to the factory, the workmen preserve passive silence when their employer tries to gain their good will. The men understand their employer's dilemma and intentions but are unable to speak the word that will restore a universe of sympathy and understanding.

"The Artist at Work," the only story of French background, is a pointed satire of the artist's dilemma in our modern society. For years Gilbert Jonas, a holy innocent of the creative spirit, has followed his "star" in his painting. When he is finally discovered and becomes a great success, he pays the price in loss of privacy and increasing demands on his time. Unable to work, he takes to drink, neglects his family, and realizes that he has lost his star. At last he retreats to an attic cubbyhole which he never leaves. He is supposed to be painting his masterpiece. When he finally collapses from exhaustion, a friend climbs up to his roost and finds only an empty canvas containing a single word, almost indecipherable, which is either "solitary" or "solidary."

The theme of isolation and solidarity is repeated in "The Growing Stone." The central figure is D'Arrast, a French engineer who has gone to Brazil to build a bridge. In a native village he encounters a former ship's cook who, after a narrow escape from death at sea, has vowed to march in a religious procession with a hundred-pound stone on his head. But the native wears himself out dancing the macumba on the night before the ceremony and collapses under the weight of his burden. D'Arrast picks up the stone and carries it for his friend, not to the church, however, but to the native's hovel. There he throws the stone into the fire as a gesture of solidarity with the outcast and the poor.

These stories show Camus dominated by the spectacle of man's suffering, humiliation, and sense of solitude; they are legends of the exile's attempt to enter the kingdom which history has denied him. Camus was never glib, never irresponsible. The intelligence of the man and the integrity of the artist gave his work its air of the portentous as well as its compulsive utterance of truth. He has been called a framer of questions, but his questions are those that need to be asked if we are to understand the answers already apparent in the life of our time.

A FABLE FOR CRITICS

Type of work: Critical satire in verse

Author: James Russell Lowell (1819-1891)

First published: 1848

Lowell's A Fable for Critics appeared in 1848, three years after Poe's "The Raven" and three years before Melville's

Moby Dick. Born the same year as Melville and Whitman, Lowell was twenty-nine years old and had already gained something of a reputation as poet and anti-slavery essayist.

Writing in the age of Emerson and Hawthorne, Lowell believed that native American literature had come of age. He argues this in a section of A Fable for Critics, echoing Emerson's "American Scholar" address of eleven years before and looking ahead to Whitman's famous preface to Leaves of Grass in 1855. "Forget Europe wholly," he advised the American writer.

But when A Fable for Critics is read today — never all the way through, to be sure—it is read for its satire. The author flippantly exhibits his contemporaries: Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Dana, and many small fry. Lowell had a young man's irreverence and industry; combining both, he produced in his work a 2,100-line poem in which a few choice verbal thrusts have always delighted readers:

There comes Poe, with his raven, like Barnaby Rudge,
Three-fifths of him genius and two-fifths sheer fudge.

Of James Fenimore Cooper:

. . . the women he draws from one
model don't vary,
All sappy as maples and flat as a prairie.

More often than not, Lowell makes acute judgments, as in the quotations above. But the poem has serious defects. It is no systematized essay in verse in the manner of Pope; rather, it is rambling and digressive caricature. Unfortunately too, many of Lowell's characters have so declined in significance that his satire is lost. To modern tastes, Lowell's clattering anapestic tetrameter and his embarrassingly outrageous rhymes ("philosopher," "loss of her") prove impossible to endure, even in a poem intentionally comic.

The structure of the poem offers trouble also. Lowell chose the long way around to get at his satire. Ostensibly the poem merely describes the parade of various American writers past the not too interested personage of Phoebus Apollo. The writers are in the form of cackling fowls led by "Tityrus Griswold" (Rufus W. Griswold, an influential anthologist of the day). This rather mechanical scheme offers little excitement or sense of direction.

Lowell had precedents for his sort of lampooning. Literary ancestors of the Fable are such works as Pope's The Dunciad, Leigh Hunt's The Feast of the Poets, and Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. The greatest resemblance is to Hunt's poem. Lowell's Fable itself served as model when another Lowell, Amy, decided to produce her own Critical Fable in 1922.

Lowell wrote the "satire," as he called it, con amore (to use his term again). His high spirits are immediately evident in the title page and the introduction. The elaborate title page, ostensibly no more than an imitation of wordy, old-fashioned book format, is actually the beginning of the rhymed couplets: "Reader! walk up at once (it will soon be too late), and buy at a perfectly ruinous rate A Fable for Critics. . . ."

The rhymed introduction itself then follows, wherein a candid Lowell limits his purpose and forestalls possible censures. The poem, he avers, is a mere "trifle," full of digressions and written in "neither good verse nor bad prose." It is a jeu d'esprit whose verbal portraits are both cynical and faithful.

Lowell attached a considerably longer essay in rhyme to the second edition. Here, in the spirit of exuberance which pervades the work from beginning to end, he remarks on the mixed critical reception of the first edition.

Preliminaries over, the reader plunges into the poem proper. Lowell himself narrates throughout, but the first personage encountered is out of Greek mythology, Phoebus Apollo. Lowell, of course, here uses a favorite device of the fabulist: setting and characters of other times and other places to add ludicrousness and perspective to his satire on people of his own day.

Apollo, sitting under a laurel tree, has been reading recent poetry and bemoans its mediocrity. Feeling the need to write something himself—to mourn his Daphne—he decides that a lily is needed to set his faculties to work. One of his sycophants, a pedantic bore (“The defect in his brain was just absence of mind”), hastens to fetch it. Apollo meanwhile is “killing the time” when the first of Lowell’s real people walks up to him. This is Evert Augustus Duyckinck, editor and critic, who is pictured as a small, muttering, reputation-conscious individual. While he and Apollo exchange barbs, the procession of American authors commences. This parade makes up the bulk of the poem.

First, naturally enough, is Ralph Waldo Emerson, who by 1848 had published his two famous series of essays. It is Apollo who describes the procession itself, and all descriptions are from his mouth. Lowell’s use of the fable device thus allows him to satirize without using his own voice. Emerson has “a Greek head on right Yankee shoulders”; the Transcendentalist

. . . sits in mystery calm and intense And looks coolly around him with sharp common sense.

Two writers who “trod in Emerson’s track” then appear: William Ellery Channing, poet and Concord litterateur, and Henry David Thoreau. Both are inferior to Emerson; all they do is pick up the “windfalls” from Emerson’s tree.

Fourth and fifth in the procession are Bronson Alcott and Orestes Brownson. Alcott, the Platonic idealist and mystic, avoids the mundane, has “never a fact to perplex him or bore him.” Brownson is the New England individualist who turned from Presbyterian to Universalist to Roman Catholic. Amid the satire, Lowell-Apollo speaks commendation: Alcott is a magnificent talker; Brownson writes “transparent and forcible prose.” These two vignettes thus typify Lowell’s willingness to compliment as well as to laugh, if compliments are deserved.

Fifty lines then characterize the now-forgotten Nathaniel Parker Willis, foppish and shallow, yet delightful and witty as poet and playwright. Theodore Parker, Unitarian clergyman and writer, comes next, his doctrinal radicalism satirized as well as his erudite sermons.

Two familiar poets then appear: William Cullen Bryant and John Greenleaf Whittier. Bryant, the poet of nature, is no Wordsworth (says Apollo), but perhaps he is a James Thomson or a William Cowper. In any case, he is quiet, cool, and dignified as an iceberg. Whittier is a pacifist Quaker, but he is engaged in militant wars for human rights. In his poetry there is a major defect: “torrent of verse bursts the dams of reflection.” Whittier’s human qualities lead Apollo into a general panegyric on all poets who ever “spoke out for the dumb and the down-trodden.”

Two lesser-known writers continue the procession: Richard Henry Dana, Sr., and John Neal, journalist and novelist.

Nathaniel Hawthorne is next, one of the few writers on parade who receive unqualified approval. He is strong, earnest, graceful, good-tempered—“fully and perfectly man.”

James Fenimore Cooper fares less well, however, in twice as many lines. According to Apollo, he has created one character, the woodsman Natty Bumppo, and has done nothing but copy him ever since. Cooper’s virtue is boldness of utterance; he speaks his mind whether people like it or not.

The admirable way in which Cooper “lectures his countrymen gratis” reminds Apollo of several “truths you Americans need to be told.” The main thing is to refuse to be intimidated by England. Americans brag of their New World but do not really quite believe in it. So Americans keep looking to England for ideas and literature. Instead, they should reflect their own land and their own century.

After a quick jab at slavery by Phoebus, the conversation is interrupted by Miranda (Margaret Fuller). She is a rather obnoxious egoist, "with an I-turn-the-crank-of-the-Universe air." She inspires Apollo to give a digression on bores. Congress is full of them.

The parade now resumes with a novelist neglected today, Charles Frederick Briggs. He is amiable, if self-contradictory.

Next comes the famous vignette of Poe, "who has written some things quite the best of their kind, / But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the mind." This description is interrupted by a spirited defense of Longfellow.

Lydia Maria Child, another forgotten novelist occupying more than one hundred lines, is succeeded by Washington Irving, presented as a man of "warm heart and fine brain." Praise for Irving yields quickly to recognition of Sylvester Judd, a novelist of New England.

At this point Lowell himself enters the poem again, for the purpose of a digressive paean to the state of Massachusetts. She is the home of workingmen and industry. Here the rough new continent was tamed. Here are themes of great art and literature.

Apollo then resumes his running commentary on the parade. The vigor, fancy, and fun of Oliver Wendell Holmes receive acclaim, and then comes none other than Lowell himself, "striving Parnassus to climb."

After him appears Fitz-Greene Halleck, a minor versifier. Succeeding him are figures even more insignificant: the unnamed American counterparts to such novelists as Bulwer-Lytton, Disraeli, or Scott. Apollo amuses himself by laughing at their self-importance.

Apollo's lily-searchers, who had disappeared at the beginning of the poem, now re-enter to lead matters to a conclusion. But before ending, Apollo makes some pointed remarks about literary criticism. In the good old days when poets were visionary, free, and prophetic, there were no critics. But now the domain of art is overrun by pedantic and carping critics: "He who would write and can't write can surely review."

But no sooner does Apollo work himself into a furious rage than loquacious Miranda intrudes her opinion. Forthwith Apollo flees, as does Lowell, and the burlesque comes to its abrupt end.

THE FALL

Type of work: Novel

Author: Albert Camus (1913-1960)

Time: The 1950's

Locale: Amsterdam and Paris

First published: 1956

Principal characters:

JEAN-BAPTISTE CLAMENCE, formerly a lawyer, presently a judge-penitent

AN UNIDENTIFIED LISTENER

THE PROPRIETOR OF "MEXICO CITY," an Amsterdam bar owner

Albert Camus' death in 1960, at the early age of forty-six, was completely unexpected; it was a great shock to those who had followed his literary and philosophical development from The Myth of Sisyphus and The Stranger to Exile and the Kingdom. Camus had broken with tradition, had engaged himself in a new direction, and had shown vital and promising concepts of his new vision. His sudden death turned all his works into a huge fragment. He bequeathed to the world finished works with an unfinished vision. The spiritual wasteland of the modern world obsessed his mind. He traced the dilemma of modern man back to its absurd roots, but offered no new alternative. He died before he could express it.

Camus had intended to incorporate The Fall into his collection of short stories, Exile and the Kingdom. However, the story soon outgrew its planned length and was published as a separate novel in 1956.

In The Fall, Camus takes up the idea of The Stranger. Jean-Baptiste Clamence is an intensified Meursault. The themes of The Stranger are treated with greater lucidity and bitterness in The Fall. The idea of death, the problem of indifference and anonymity in modern life, the notion of guilt and innocence in the individual, the awareness of the absurdity of human actions and the ambiguous relativity of all traditional values haunted Camus' imagination.

In form the novel is a violent confession, a philosophical confession of a former lawyer by the name of Jean-Baptiste Clamence, now judge-penitent. His confession differs in tone and attitude, however, from those of St. Augustine and Rousseau; there are no sentimental outflows, no softness of language, and above all no feeling of pity. Clamence makes his confession, reconstructs the past with all its small incidents, and intertwines it with the present; but his confession goes beyond the personal realm and assumes the dimensions of a general confession of the modern world, a cruel and dehumanized world where empty words replace life.

Amsterdam represents the stage of this modern world; impersonal and indifferent human beings play their role as lifeless puppets in the narrow-minded, suffocating bourgeois world. Camus even ventures to compare the concentric canals of this city to Dante's circles of hell. Amsterdam, and with it all modern cities, turns into a bourgeois hell. The ugliness and forlornness of the modern city build the framework for Camus' novel.

The book opens in an Amsterdam bar called the Mexico City. Jean-Baptiste Clamence is involved in a strange dialogue, strange because he addresses an unidentified silent listener who never answers his questions or comments on his remarks. The reader is kept in a constant state of suspense; he participates actively in the development of Clamence's thinking and finds himself stimulated to conjecture on the listener's unexpressed responses. Daily for five consecutive days Clamence, now in his forties, talks with this unidentified stranger whom he had met in the Mexico City bar. The subject of this one-sided dialogue is Clamence remembering Clamence, his fall from innocence to sin and the ambiguous recovery from his fall. The judge-penitent illuminates his past experiences, clarifies the inner motives behind his actions, and imposes his feigned friendliness, his humorous sarcasm, his false humility, his black bitterness and the cruelty of his lucidity on the reader. Clamence has to feel superior in order to make his life bearable. To give up his seat to someone else in the bus, to help a blind person across the street, or to give up his theater seat so that a couple could sit together—all these incidents created in him a feeling of superiority resulting in his regarding himself as a type of superman. His sense of superiority kept him in harmony with people around him, with life in general. He had attained a certain state of happiness as a mechanical human being who could anticipate what was expected from him and live up to the pleasant image other people had of him. He lived on the surface of a life of words and gestures, but he never touched reality through the people he knew, the books he read, the places to visited, the women he possessed briefly. As a lawyer he had realized that the monotony of modern life had turned human beings into puppets, had made them completely anonymous. Disgusted with their anonymity they would commit crimes, their only means of attracting attention.

Then one evening at the Pont des Arts in Paris Clamence heard laughter behind him; he turned around but nobody was there. It was Clamence laughing at himself, a sarcastic and triumphant laughter which chilled his existence. Something broke in him; his image of himself was shattered and he became aware of his double face. He went home to escape from the laughter but he could still hear it under his window. His existence had received a dangerous blow. The same evening he watched his reflection in the mirror and it seemed to him that his smile had become double. This laughter started Clamence's fall from innocence to sin. Somehow his usual confidence in himself and his actions had been shattered. The nonexistent sarcastic laughter had suddenly made his mind lucid, a lucidity which showed him the absurdity of his own existence. The recognition of his lucidity, powerful and convincing, channeled his thinking into a different direction. He gave up his position as lawyer and became a penitent judge. Human beings pretend to be equal and innocent but nothing is more natural in them than a constant desire to judge: it makes them feel above others. Clamence left his position as lawyer because he saw the fraud in man's concepts of innocence and guilt. But he soon realized that he was still playing the same game and had only changed his part. Clamence, who had formerly felt in harmony with life and superior to everybody else, now falls to the other extreme: he constantly accuses himself, insists on his self-accusations which elevate him to a new level of superior feeling. He achieves the same satisfaction as before, only from a different, perhaps more cowardly, personal position.

Clamence practices a kind of Pascalian diversion and self-deception. He uses the power of his mind not to get to know himself but to drift away constantly from his authentic self. His desire to maintain a feeling of superiority turns into an existential necessity. Diversion carries him through the recognition of his own absurdity and provides him with moments of ephemeral satisfaction.

Clamence's diabolic laughter menaced his very existence. Once in a while it would creep up behind him and threaten him. However, not only the laughter haunted him, but also the memory of the woman who drowned herself lurks like a lion in the back of his mind. One night in November, two or three years before he heard the laughter, Clamence was crossing a bridge in Paris shortly after midnight and saw the slim figure of a woman bent over the railing. When he had crossed the bridge he heard a loud splash followed by several cries. He did not return to the bridge, informed nobody about the incident, and avoided the newspapers for several days afterwards. Here again, as always, Clamence had avoided the existential decision. He closed his ears to the immediate choice and walked home that evening the same way he always went. Clamence has only one weapon to overcome those moments of despair and failure in the past: the power to forget. Camus reverses the Proustian concept of remembrance. Proust wanted to reconstruct and revive the past; it imparted richness and happiness to the present moment. Clamence fears the impact of the past, it becomes a potential danger in the present. He remembers those moments where he failed to make the existential choice, and he has to live with the awareness that he will always miss his moment of choice. The novel ends with his expressed realization that he will always be too late—fortunately—to choose.

Camus, attacking the monotony and indifference of modern man, questioned all the usually accepted values and showed their ambiguous and often absurd nature. He revived the concept that nothing can exist without its reverse. Good and evil, innocence and sin exist side by side. Man must live with his own duplicity.

With The Fall, Camus opened the way to the nouveau roman by showing the relativity of traditionally accepted objective values. From here it is only one step to the novels of Alain Robbe-Grillet, who destroys the concreteness of the object and takes up the object before it has reached any kind of accepted connotation.

THE FAMILIAR ESSAYS OF WILLIAM HAZLITT

Author: William Hazlitt (1778-1830)

First published: The Round Table, 1817; Table Talk, 1821-1822; The Spirit of the Age, or Contemporary Portraits, 1825; The Plain Speaker, 1826; Winterslow, 1839; Sketches and Essays, 1839

William Hazlitt came to be regarded as one of the nineteenth century's most gifted essayists, but he did not arrive at this mode of expression by any systematic or logical process. As George Bernard Shaw came to writing drama only after long experience as a musical and dramatic critic and a novelist, Hazlitt discovered his true vocation only at the age of thirty-five, and only after years of trying, in turn, to become a painter, a political writer, and a philosopher. He had talent as a painter, as his portrait of Charles Lamb in the National Gallery shows, but his literary gifts were not displayed to good advantage in his writing until 1811. In that year he and his family (he had married Sarah Stoddart in 1808, and had one son by then) were clinging to an impecunious existence in London when a series of lectures helped relieve his financial worries. Through the aid of Charles Lamb, Hazlitt entered, at the age of thirty-four, a crucial apprenticeship as a reporter for the Morning Chronicle. He worked for a year in the gallery of the House of Commons. By the next year he had finished his apprenticeship and begun the career as an essayist that was to suit him so well. His books up to now, among which may be mentioned his An Essay on the Principles of Human Action, the Life of Holcroft, had brought him little fame or fortune, but in the shorter essay he found the kind of form that suited him ideally.

Hazlitt's familiar essay appeared in numerous periodicals between 1812 and his death in 1830. Many of them were reprinted in his lifetime but even in the Centenary Edition they are scattered over twenty-one volumes. Some of the major periodicals for which he wrote were Leigh Hunt's The Examiner, 1814-1817; Constable's Edinburgh Magazine, 1818; John Scott's London Magazine, 1820-1822; Colburn's New Monthly Magazine, 1822; and Lord Byron and Leigh Hunt's The Liberal, 1822. Important collections containing his familiar essays which were published during his life include The Round Table (with Leigh Hunt), 1815; Table Talk (2 volumes), 1821-22; and The Plain Speaker, 1826.

It is nearly impossible to give an accurate idea of the range of Hazlitt's interests, but literature, painting, the drama, travel, and the oddities of human behavior were chief among them. While he wrote familiar essays on subjects within all of these areas, those on literary or art topics are not ordinarily treated with those on human experience, men, manners, and customs of different countries—his favorite areas for exploration.

Like all great familiar essayists, Hazlitt had but one subject: himself. Whether writing of books, a prizefight, or the necessity of hating things, his own reaction to his material was his subject. Thus Hazlitt continues to read because of the intriguing quality of mind revealed in the essays, a strange mixture of vivacity and gloom. He said of himself in "On Depth and Superficiality": "I am not, in the ordinary acceptance of the term a good-natured man. . . ." This assessment may be taken as an understatement. Although cheerful and happy as a child, he passed through some crisis in adolescence that left him gloomy and morose. Irascibility alone is probably as dull as superficial optimism, but in Hazlitt it was coupled with an amazingly vivacious intellect, stocked with vivid recollections of a staggering number of books, penetrating in vision, and never tired of examining all aspects of existence. That such a mind should be linked with such a temperament perhaps accounts for the remarkable productions of his pen, which in their diversity, penetration, and vivacity of expression are unequaled. His unusual temperament affected several aspects of his essays: it lent a distinctive cast to his style and it made him eschew rigid, formal structure in favor of a more casual organization.

One objection to his informal essays is their lack of structure. Perhaps Hazlitt's inability to succeed as a writer of books may be traced to the same deficiency. In any case it is a rare Hazlitt essay that seems tightly structured. His famous "Merry England" will serve as an example. He suggests his thesis in the first paragraph: English merriment is deeper than that of other countries because the English are forced to overcome gloom in the attainment of it. Merriment in England is not a sort of National Constant as it is, according to Hazlitt, in Spain and other southern nations; it is "that sort of intermittent, fitful, irregular gaiety." The paragraphs that follow, however, seem determined by whatever aspects of English life moved Hazlitt to speak, not by any conscious attempt to support his generalization logically. From this development, Hazlitt's basic writing scheme may be suggested. After stating a purpose or a case for investigation, he built his essay not by the use of a point-by-point argument or even by the careful organization of evidence but by a spirited but unmethodical piling up of examples. When the pile grew great enough, he simply stopped writing. He was saved from this structural embarrassment when his subject naturally lent form to his writing. "The Fight," perhaps his most famous familiar essay, is an account of his journey to Hungerford in Berkshire to see a prizefight involving Neate and Hickman. The chronological nature of the experience which involved several clearly separate stages in addition to the fight itself, led Hazlitt to structure the essay in a somewhat relaxed chronological order and so produce one of his few tightly knit essays.

This flaw has hardly been fatal, however. One is hardly conscious of Hazlitt's structural peregrinations in his best essays for two intimately connected reasons: his style and his attitude toward his readers. His style was the mirror of the man: restless, impetuous, virile. In "On Reading Old Books" he revealed several of his ideas on style; he called true eloquence "a man pouring out his mind on paper." He disliked the refined, polished, balanced style of Dr. Johnson or Junius. His stylistic mentor, he says, was Burke, whose "style was forked and playful as lightning, crested like the serpent." Like his mentor, Hazlitt admired warmth of expression, and there is a definite degree of emotion in all his writings. He is rarely gay and never asks us to weep; but sorrow, joy, and anger in subdued forms do lend warmth to his essays, as in this frank expression of emotion from "On the Spirit of Obligations."

In all these pretended demonstrations of an overanxiety for our welfare, we may detect a great deal of spite and ill-nature lurking under the disguise of a friendly and officious zeal. It is wonderful how much love of mischief and rankling spleen lies at the bottom of the human heart, and how a constant supply of gall seems as necessary to the health and activity of the mind as of the body.

Hazlitt's style is also distinguished by the feeling of sincerity it establishes. The language is that of a cultured man of wide experience; he uses many quotations and allusions to writers from ancient Greece to those of his own day. Above all, Hazlitt manages nearly always to avoid the common pitfalls of the familiar essayist: glib superficiality and pompous sentimentality. He was able to move on a safe course by means of his hard, bright intellect which helped create an attractive, sincere style.

In his relationship with his audience, Hazlitt neither condescends nor is overly familiar. He is frank and engaging, but never whispers "dear reader" in our ear. The "I" of the familiar essays belongs to a well-read, well-traveled student of life who expresses his beliefs boldly. Perhaps a quotation from "On the Ignorance of the Learned" will give some idea of the frankness of Hazlitt's expression and the nature of his attitude toward his audience:

Women have often more of what is called good sense than men. They have fewer pretensions; are less implicated in theories; and judge objects more from their immediate and involuntary impression on the mind, and, therefore, more truly and naturally. They cannot reason wrong; for they do not reason at all. They do not think or speak by rule; and they have in general more eloquence and wit, as well as sense, on that account. By their wit, sense, and eloquence together, they generally contrive to govern their husbands.

It may be, as Geoffrey Keynes expressed it, that Hazlitt's personality was as prickly as a quilled porcupine, giving pointed sharpness to everything he wrote. But neither Hazlitt's prickliness nor his lack of modern structural ideals seriously obstructs our appreciation of the products of a most remarkable mind that was honest, inquisitive, sensitive, and keen.

THE FAMILY OF PASCUAL DUARTE

Author: Camilio José Cela (1916-)

Time: c. 1880 to 1922

Locale: A small village near Almendralejo, in the province of Badajoz, Spain

First published: 1942

PASCUAL DUARTE, a Spanish peasant condemned for murder

ESTABAN DUARTE DINIZ, his father, a drunkard

PASCUAL'S MOTHER, unnamed, whom Pascual murders

ROSARIO, his sister, who turns bad

SEÑOR RAFAEL, the lover of Pascual's mother

DON JESÚS GONZALEZ DE LA RIVA, a landowner killed by Pascual

SEÑORA ENGRACIA, a midwife

DON CONRADO, a prison warden

Camilio José Cela is sometimes acclaimed as the finest living novelist of Spain and a master of Castilian prose. His reputation in the English-speaking world rests on this novel, first published in 1942, and The Hive, published in 1948.

The novel is presented as if it were the memoirs—the confession, really—of Pascual Duarte, who in 1936-1937, just after the outbreak of the Civil War, awaits execution for the murder of Don Jesús Gonzalez de la Riva, who owned an estate in Pascual's poor village near Almendralejo. The memoirs recount the story of Pascual's life from childhood to his murder of his mother on the night of Friday, February 10, 1922. The novel does not narrate the murder of Don Jesús. The memoirs were instructed to be sent, with a letter, to one of Don Jesús' friends, who left instructions in his will that they were to be destroyed. Somehow, they found their way to a pharmacy shop, where the "Transcriber," who arranged and censored them, found them. All this information, along with two letters elicited by the "Transcriber" from a chaplain and a guard who witnessed Pascual's execution, are presented as documents authenticating the story.

Pascual writes of his impoverished childhood as the son of a drunkard who died of rabies the night after Pascual's mother bore her idiot child, Mario. His mother, probably to get money, had an affair with Señor Rafael, and there is a vivid account of the Sunday when Mario, in a fit reminiscent of his rabid father, bit Señor Rafael, who kicked him on the scars where an ear should have been. Mario's ears had been bitten off by a hog. Pascual's mother laughed with Señor Rafael over the incident, and not until Pascual's sister Rosario returned home was the child picked up from the floor. When Señor Rafael left, Pascual's mother licked Mario's wound all the night, like a dog licking one of her litter after delivery. Mario died six years later, given the horrid extreme unction of drowning in an oil vat. Pascual's mother failed to shed a tear over the death of her son. Pascual states that if he were to date the beginning of his hatred for his mother from the time of Mario's death, he would not be far off in his calculation. This note of squalid horror and profound hatred sets the tone of the novel.

On the day of Mario's funeral, Pascual impregnated Lola, and they were married. When they were returning from the honeymoon, Pascual stopped at a tavern and cut a man in a knife fight. Lola, having gone on toward home, was jolted from the mare and aborted. Pascual, enraged, killed the mare with his knife. Their second child died of an evil wind when it was eleven months old. Pestered by Lola and his mother, Pascual left the village with a half-formed idea of going to America. Realizing finally he could not afford passage, he returned after two years to find Lola pregnant. Paco Lopez, nicknamed "Stretch," the villain who was Rosario's lover and who had tried to pick a fight with Pascual over that matter, had ruined Lola. She died after Pascual made her tell him the name of her unborn child's father. When Stretch returned to town looking for Rosario, Pascual killed him, almost by accident, on an impulse as haphazard as the murder of the Arab in Albert Camus' The Stranger. He was sent to prison but released for good conduct after three years.

When he returned to his village, Rosario arranged for him to marry Esperanza. They lived with Pascual's mother, who goaded Pascual and his wife. Esperanza urged Pascual to leave, but either through cowardice or lack of decision, Pascual continued to put off their departure. In a violent scene, in which his mother bit off his left nipple, he cut her throat. He says her blood tasted like that of a lamb.

Pascual is not capable of the high rhetoric of Quentin Compson in The Sound and the Fury, or of the hero of The Stranger, published in the same year. His language is stark, studded with an occasional sharp, homely simile, and he resorts to proverbs for philosophical expression. However, Cela's protagonist may fruitfully be compared with Camus' Meursault and Faulkner's Quentin. Like Quentin, Pascual is enraged at his sister's defection, and like Caddy, Rosario ran away from home with the valuables of the house. In Rosario's care for Mario we see from an outside viewpoint a relationship like that of Caddy and Benjy, which Faulkner portrays from within.

But Cela never brings Freudian psychology into the foreground, as Faulkner does. When Pascual's mother rips off his vestigial nipple, for example, we are left with the brutal fact and no commentary. Like Meursault, Pascual speaks as a condemned prisoner, involved in the murder of his mother. In both cases it is not the mother's death for which the protagonist is tried. The placing of Meursault's mother's funeral at the beginning of The Stranger, and Pascual's mother's murder at the end of his memoirs, emphasizes the events as central to their works.

The principal differences between Camus' and Cela's narrators are their religion and their modes of narration. Pascual frequently interrupts his confession to tell of events at prison and of his increasing anguish and penitence. He wants to be saved. He calls himself a stranger, but not Camus' stranger in a universe of indifference. Some time after Lola's abortion, Chispa, Pascual's dog, had three still-born pups. One day, because she has the look of a father confessor while gazing at him, Pascual shot the dog. This was his first irrational act of violence, and its blood—together with the "thorn" which Stretch put in his side, provoking him about his relations with Rosario—and perhaps the six drops of blood on Mario's grave, the outcome of Pascual's conquest of Lola, give Pascual a background and history of revenge and love and death which in some way account for his actions. They constitute a morality such that Pascual is purified "in the blood of a lamb," his mother's blood. Opposed to this morality is the Christian morality which he finally appears to have learned as he writes in prison. The theme of the confession is the purification by blood of a morbid familial hatred, and the theme of the "frame," the story of Pascual's repentance in prison, is an attempt to overlay this theme with Christian salvation.

There are hints, however, that Pascual is not totally sincere in his repentance.

The "Transcriber" points out in his postscript that Pascual wrote the transmittal letter, which accompanied the manuscript, well before he had finished his narration. He gave the letter to a prison guard, instructing him to send it along with the manuscript to the friend of Don Jesús on the day of execution. In the letter Pascual says he has stopped writing, and is sending the story in order to keep from burning it in moments of sadness and despair. Both of these statements are obviously untrue. There is also a muddle concerning chronology and dates. Pascual says he married Lola on December 12, a Wednesday. The only Wednesday which fell on December 12, and which is anywhere near the proper time, is in 1917; but this date is three years later than the marriage could have been solemnized according to the details of time sequence in the narration. The fact that it was a Wednesday, however, is confirmed by the additional fact that the third day of the honeymoon was a Saturday. In prison, Pascual had the habit of fasting on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and the guard who wrote to the "Transcriber" said Monday was a fast day for Pascual because his mother had been killed on that day. But Pascual tells us he killed his mother on Friday night. This kind of confusion reminds us of the mixed-up chronology of Ford Madox Ford's The Good Soldier. In neither case would the confusion be noticed except for the fact that both novels make so much of the order of events and the sequence of time. As a result, in Cela's novel as in Ford's, we begin generally to doubt the veracity of the narrator. Here the novel differs from The Stranger, for Camus offered no frame of memoirs, but a narration as if in the mind of the prisoner himself. Cela has removed the reader a step further from the actual events and has thus admitted a new source of possible untrustworthiness. When we learn from the letters of the guard and the chaplain that Pascual died badly, we may doubt whether his Christianization succeeded in supplanting the blood morality of the hero. Perhaps, in the end, Pascual really is as estranged as Camus' hero and comes closest to salvation as he screams for life at his execution for the murder of Don Jesús.

THE FATHERS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Allen Tate (1899-)

Time: 1860-1861

Locale: Northern Virginia, and Georgetown

First published: 1938

Principal characters:

LACY GORE BUCHAN, the narrator

MAJOR LEWIS BUCHAN, his father

SEMMES BUCHAN, his older brother, killed by George Posey

SUSAN BUCHAN POSEY, his sister

GEORGE POSEY, his brother-in-law

JANE POSEY, George's sister, loved by Lacy and Semmes

YELLOW JIM, George's mulatto half brother

Allen Tate had the misfortune to have The Fathers published two years after Gone with the Wind appeared, with the result that his novel soon became a literary derelict bobbing in the backwash of Margaret Mitchell's overwhelming popular success. Consequently the reappearance of Mr. Tate's book in a slightly revised version twenty-two years later was an event of considerable importance. For The Fathers, as Gone with the Wind does not, provides an occasion for defining the idea of the South and for critical reflection on the moral significance Mr. Tate was able to extract from his social scene and his historical perspective. That the novel failed to evoke any such response is shown by the reviews written at the time.

Reading these reviews today is an illuminating experience, as much for what they do not say as for what they do. The critics were on the whole sympathetic toward the book and generous in their comments, but one takes away the impression that many had not read it carefully and almost none understood the writer's intention. A number saw it only as a moving story of one family's tragic collapse during the Civil War; certainly this reading testifies to the richness of the narrative if to nothing else. Others thought that Mr. Tate was dramatizing within a family unit the fatal clash of two social orders, the traditional society of the South symbolized by Major Buchan and the industrial society of the North represented by George Posey, the major's son-in-law. This conflict was viewed in all its dramatic tensions and implications, but with a feeling on the part of the reviewers that Mr. Tate had failed to prove the superiority of the Buchans' ancestral code over George Posey's anti-traditional conduct. It is possible to read The Fathers in this way, just as one can read much of Faulkner in a similar fashion, but to do so is to miss the point, so to speak, of a novel remarkable for its realistic detail, thematic extensions of symbolic reference, moral intensity, and passionate, historical sense of life.

Briefly, The Fathers presents a philosophical view of society and history within a framework of particular events. It is only natural that these events should center upon the Civil War, for to the Southern writer concerned with the life or culture of his region the war is the image of violence dividing its past and present. It is no longer enough to know what that conflict did; it is also necessary to know what it meant. For this purpose the Civil War provides a vast controlling image which gives meaning to the facts of the regional experience, not only to the structure of Southern society but also to the code of morality on which it was based.

Before The Fathers appeared, Mr. Tate had already defined his position on the South in a series of essays written between 1930 and 1936. In one of these, "Religion and the Old South," he outlined his theory of history in terms of the Long View and the Short View. Within the perspective of the latter, all history reduces to a variety and confusion of images out of which it is possible for us to make choices in reconstructing the scene or the period. The opposed view sees history as idea or concept, not as an account of the particular lives of particular men in a contemporaneous setting that often bewildered them, but as a record of events without accident or contingency or personal involvement and thus the world view, the destroyer of tradition.

Mr. Tate's own choice between these two processes of historical vision and thinking is as apparent in his fiction as in his poetry. The reviewers who found no real meaning in his novel were looking at history as an abstract concept of principles and causes. The Fathers incorporates the Short View.

The novel is spacious in outline, as any work must be which attempts to contain within its limits the picture of a whole society, and beautifully selective in attention to the detail with which people and places are described, habits of speech and manners are recorded, and the impressions made by events upon the mind of the narrator are carefully noted. Mr. Tate achieves his organizational effect, the configuration of theme and structure, by his skillful management of a special point of view. The person telling the story is Lacy Buchan, who as an old man is looking back on events that had happened almost a half century before. As a story retrieved in memory, the novel moves simultaneously on two levels: one the plane of action conveying with all immediacy the impact of events upon the consciousness of a young boy whose reactions to experience are direct and sensuous; the other the plane of reflection on which the man, now old, looks back on those happenings and contemplates meanings unperceived at the time by the boy he was. The ease with which Mr. Tate moves from past to present and back, setting up a relevant interplay between some event and its significance in retrospect, all the while causing the narrative to expand, its values to join and grow into one another, becomes one of the major triumphs of the novel. What is presented is a deep concern with historical processes and moral issues, but it is all done simply, without resort to the self-conscious or the portentous in association or image. The older Lacy reflects that only in memory and symbol can knowledge of the past be preserved, never in the feelings of the time.

Through all of Lacy Buchan's reflections runs the question of evil, but the problems of sin, responsibility, and guilt remain shadowy and unresolved. He wonders why life cannot change without entangling many lives, why the innocent, for example, lose their innocence and become violent or evil, thus causing change. He reflects that just as man needs to recognize the innate nature of evil in human nature, there is also need to face that same evil, symbolized by darkness and imaged by man alone.

The image at the center of The Fathers is the family, the social unit which, with all its widespread connections of kinship, was the foundation of Southern society; and the story tells how the Buchan family of Fairfax County, Virginia, is weakened and disrupted by the fierce energies of George Posey, the son-in-law for whom all life, because he cannot recognize, or submit to, the authority that tradition imposes, becomes impulse and motion. In later years Lacy always thinks of him as a horseman galloping over an abyss, a man of courage and generosity and charm, but doomed because his reckless and irresponsible deeds menaced himself as well as family unity and social order.

Lacy reflects that the Poseys possessed more refinement than the Buchans but were less civilized. This difference is emphasized at the beginning of the novel when Major Buchan, at the time of his wife's funeral, plays the role of the gracious host and not the bereaved husband; he is merely upholding the accepted code of good manners. In much the same way he leaves his place in his wife's funeral procession to take the hand of Mrs. Buchan's colored maid and draw her, immediately behind the coffin, into the line of mourners. George Posey, on the other hand, orders his horse saddled and rides away, unable to face the idea of death. Another trait which he displays is a heartless disregard for others, as when he sells his mulatto half brother in order to buy a blood mare, an act which involves the Buchans and Poseys in a family catastrophe even more devastating than the disunion caused by the Civil War. Before the end of the novel he has destroyed the Buchans' agrarian economy, killed his brother-in-law Semmes, driven his wife mad, brought about his sister's ruin, and caused his father-in-law's death.

The point to emphasize in connection with George Posey is this: he is neither a villain by nature nor a symbol of Northern capitalism assaulting Southern tradition. He stands for that element in Southern life which was wild and undisciplined from the beginning, just as Semmes Buchan's weakness and John Langdon's violence were a part of the tradition as well. In Mr. Tate's view, apparently, the old order was already corrupted from within before the Civil War destroyed it from without. (This is Faulkner's belief as well.) Whether that way of life truly satisfied the needs of the men who created it is a matter of relative unimportance. What is important is the fact that the traditional order established sanctions and defined virtues and obligations by which for a time men could assume the social and moral responsibilities of their humanity; it set up a concept of truth which made the human effort seem worth while. Major Buchan recognizes these sanctions and obligations and acts accordingly, but George Posey does not; therefore he corrupts or destroys all who come in contact with him.

This is the meaning of the episode in which Lacy Buchan, semi-delirious with fever, imagines that he and his dead grandfather are sitting on a pile of fence rails while the old man retells the myth of Jason and Medea. The scene is poetically conceived and morally instructive. Jason's fate, the old man says, was to secure the Golden Fleece or attempt some impossible feat, at the same time becoming involved with the humanity of others whom in the end he betrayed not through his intention but through his nature. The old man says of George Posey that he never really intends to commit evil; his flaw is the lack of will to do good. Thus the only expectancy possible for him is loneliness and the grave.

The Fathers is a novel in which the private life of the family and the public life of action converge upon a decisive moment in history, the outbreak of the Civil War. Its importance as fiction is its power to illuminate, through realistic detail and symbolic extension, the meaning of the past and the shape of the future.

Critique:

Samuel Johnson is credited with saying that "A book should teach us to enjoy life or to endure it." J. R. R. Tolkien's trilogy The Lord of the Rings teaches both. It also fits the dictum of another writer, Robert Louis Stevenson: "And this is the particular triumph of the artist—not to be true merely, but to be lovable; not simply to convince, but to enchant." Tolkien has been compared with Lodovico Ariosto and with Edmund Spenser. Indeed, he is in the mainstream of the writers of epic and romance from the days of Homer. His work is deeply rooted in the great literature of the past and seems likely itself to be a hardy survivor resistant to time. In The Fellowship of the Ring, the first volume of The Lord of the Rings, Celeborn the Elf King (no doubt speaking for his author) warns against despising the lore that has survived from distant years; for old wives' tales may be the repositories of needful wisdom. Although The Lord of the Rings is advertised as a trilogy, with each volume bearing a different title, it is really a single, continuous romance. The author is in complete control of his copious material. He has created a consistent world with a sharply realized geography, even furnishing maps; he has worked out a many-centuried time scheme, summarizing the chronology in an appendix to the third volume, The Return of the King. (The second volume is The Two Towers.) With fertile inventiveness Tolkien has poured out an amazing number of well-drawn characters and adventures; and his memory of the persons, places, and events of his creation is almost incredible. If there are any loose ends in the three volumes, they are so minor as to be negligible. The book has been pronounced an allegory; with equal positiveness it has been pronounced not an allegory. At any rate, it is a gigantic myth of the struggle between good and evil. The author first presented his invented creatures, the hobbits or halflings, in an early book, The Hobbit, to which The Lord of the Rings is a sequel, but a sequel with significant differences. Hobbits are small, furry-footed humanoids with a delight in simple pleasures and a dislike of the uncomfortable responsibilities of heroism. They share the world with men, wizards, elves, dwarfs, trolls, orcs, and other creatures. Although many of these creatures are not the usual figures of the contemporary novel, the thoughtful reader can find applications to inhabitants and events of the current world, which has its share of traitors, time-servers, and malice-driven demi-devils, and is not completely destitute of men of good will and heroes. Of the three volumes, The Fellowship of the Ring has the widest variation in tone: it begins with comedy and domestic comfort, then moves into high adventure, peril, and sorrow. Occasional verses appear in the pages, but the quality of Tolkien's poetry is in both his prose and his verse.

The Story:

Bilbo Baggins, most adventurous hobbit of the Shire, planned to celebrate his hundred-and-eleventh birthday. His old friend Gandalf the Grey, a wizard with special control over fire, tried to restrain him from using his magic ring to vanish at the end of the party. Gandalf was disturbed, for he suspected the ring of being the One Ring forged by Sauron, the Dark Lord, in the volcanic fires of Mount Doom. This Ring gave long life, but corrupted its user. Even Bilbo, who had gained it without losing pity, had begun to show signs of its evil influence. On his departure, however, after his spectacular vanishing, he left his property, reluctantly including the Ring, to his nephew Frodo. Gandalf warned Frodo of its dangers and advised that he take it from the Shire.

Frodo left the Shire accompanied by his loyal servant Sam Gamgee and two of his cousins, Merry and Pippin. Pursued by fearful Black Riders, they narrowly escaped destruction in the Old Forest, but they were rescued by jovial, earthy Tom Bombadil, who proved to be immune to the Ring's power. He sent them on their way refreshed.

At Bree they met a mysterious ranger called Strider and found a letter from Gandalf urging them to go to Rivendell with Strider, whose real name was Aragorn. On their fourth night out of Bree they were attacked by Black Riders. In terror Frodo put on the Ring and became invisible to his friends but visible and vulnerable to the Riders, Sauron's Ring-wraiths. Their leader stabbed Frodo with a weapon that broke off in the wound and melted. Aragorn drove them off with torches, and the company hastened toward Rivendell. Glorfindel, an elf, met them and put Frodo on his horse. At the Ford near Rivendell, the Riders tried to intercept him but were thwarted by a flood.

Frodo recovered consciousness to find Gandalf with him and to learn that Elrond of Rivendell had been treating his fearful wound for days. In Rivendell Frodo found Bilbo and met Elrond, his daughter Arwen Evenstar, and others, including Glóin, an elderly dwarf who had formerly accompanied Bilbo. Elrond called a Council to discuss the Ring. At the Council, aside from Elrond's eleven subjects, were Legolas, a wood elf; Glóin and his son Gimli; Gandalf; the five hobbits; Aragorn and a noble gray-eyed warrior, Boromir of Gondor. Elrond recounted the history of the Rings of Power made by elvensmiths in the Second Age and of Sauron's secret forging of a Ring to rule and bind all the rest. In that age Sauron had been overthrown by an alliance of men and elves, and Isildur had cut off the Dark Lord's finger and taken the Ring. Later it had slipped from his finger and betrayed him to the orcs. Years later it had been found in the river by Deagol, a hobbit whose kinsman Smeagol had murdered him for it and fled underground, becoming the repulsive Gollum. Bilbo had found it underground. Pitying the murderous Gollum, he had not killed him but had merely used the Ring to escape. Sauron, though defeated, had not been destroyed. He had gathered an evil host in Mordor and was seeking the Ring to make himself ruler of the world. Gandalf told of the treachery of Saruman the White, leader of the wizards, who had imprisoned Gandalf. Gandalf had escaped with the help of Gwaihir, King of the Eagles.

The Council decided to send the Ring to Mordor to unmake it in the fires of Mount Doom, the only heat which could destroy it. Frodo reluctantly volunteered to remain the Ring-bearer. Eight others were chosen to complete the Fellowship of the Ring: Gandalf, Aragorn, Boromir, Gimli, Legolas, Sam, Merry, and Pippin. Aragorn's broken sword, Andúril, was reforged by the elves. Bilbo gave Frodo his elven sword Sting and a mail-coat of mithril, a precious light metal harder than steel. Frodo wore it under his weather-stained clothes.

The travelers passed through cold barren country and tried to cross over the Misty Mountains, but a blizzard drove them back and they were attacked by wolves. Gandalf drove away the wolves with magic fire and led the company into the Caverns of Moria, the ancient dwarf kingdom. He told them of Durin, the dwarf king, and his people who delved so deeply for Mithril that they roused a terrible being that destroyed them. Bilbo's old companion Balin had led a company of dwarfs from the Lonely Mountains to retake Moria. The travelers found Balin's tomb and signs of a terrible battle, also a blood-stained, tattered book from which Gandalf was able to reconstruct the fortunes of Balin's people to the beginning of their last battle.

A drum far below signaled an attack by orcs and trolls. The Fellowship repelled the first attack, but Frodo was struck down by a spear thrust. His mithril-coat saved him. When they were forced to retreat, Gandalf remained to hold a stone door. Something opposed his will fiercely, and the door was shattered. They hastened to a narrow stone bridge across an abyss. A monstrous fire demon appeared. Gandalf opposed him and destroyed the bridge, but was dragged into the cleft by the falling monster. Heavy-hearted, the Fellowship followed Aragorn to Lothlórien, home of high elves.

Lothlórien was a haven more wonderful than Rivendell. The ageless beauty of Queen Galadriel charmed them all, especially Gimli, in spite of ancient enmity between elves and dwarfs. Boromir alone was uneasy in her presence. On their departure she gave them precious gifts, and the elves supplied them with boats and provisions to continue their journey by water down the Anduin River. They soon learned they were being followed by Gollum, once owner of the Ring, now apparently Sauron's spy. They were again attacked by orcs, led by a Ring-wraith on a flying mount like a pterodactyl. Legolas gained respite for them by killing the mount with an arrow. After this escape, the evil of the Ring corrupted Boromir, who attempted to take it from Frodo. In order to escape him, Frodo put on the Ring and vanished. Boromir returned sadly to the company in a penitent mood. They scattered to look for Frodo.

Alone and invisible, Frodo tried to decide on the right course of action. Suddenly he was aware of an evil Eye searching for him, and he was paralyzed with terror; then an inner voice commanded him to take off the Ring. He regained control of himself and removed it. A groping shadow seemed to pass over the mountain and to fade away. Frodo then decided to take an elven boat and continue his perilous journey alone; but Sam anticipated his decision, discovered him, and begged to be allowed to go along. Frodo accepted Sam's loyal company, and they set out together for Mordor. The Fellowship of the Ring was broken.

FICCIONES

Type of work: Short stories
Author: Jorge Luis Borges (1899-)
First published: 1945

Only recently have American publishers begun to come to terms with what Vance Bourjailly has called "the lost books of Latin America." An Argentinian belatedly recognized as one of the great writers of the Hispanic world, admired in Europe since the early 1950's, Jorge Luis Borges has appeared hitherto in English only on very rare occasions in the pages of little magazines or anthologies. Since 1961, however, when he shared the Prix Formentor with Samuel Beckett, his English and American reputations have been steadily growing, as witnessed in 1962 by the publication in the United States of two books: Ficciones, a translation of short stories that Borges published first in one volume in Spanish in 1945; and Labyrinths, a translation of selections from five volumes, including Ficciones, of his short stories, parables, and essays.

There has been, of course, no criticism of Borges to speak of in English. Most French, German, and Latin American critics meanwhile find themselves falling back feebly on comparisons of his work with Kafka's, consequently involving themselves unnecessarily in the old so-called problem. As Eliseo Vivas has remarked, however, the Kafka "problem" arises from the confused demands made by his readers and not from any unusual difficulty inherent in Kafka's works. The same might very well be said of Borges, whose works so much, on a superficial level, resemble Kafka's: their apparent difficulty disappears as soon as one can simplify himself to the point of appreciating the significance of mere "plot." Borges once claimed, indeed, that the basic devices of all fantastic literature were only four in number: the work within a work, the intrusion of dream upon reality, the voyage in time, and the double. These devices become for Borges, as for Kafka, both technique and theme, form and content.

The most important technique-theme in Ficciones is the device of the work within a work, which Borges uses, although with considerable variation, in more than half of the seventeen stories in the volume. Such stories as "The Approach to Al-Mu'tasim," "Pierre Menard, Author of Don Quixote," and "An Examination of the Work of Herbert Quain," for example, actually take the form of literary criticisms or appreciations. In all three of these stories references to well-known writers in footnotes and text supply a counterpoint of presumptive reality to the basic fantasy of the rest of the text, a fantasy that in turn is directed, by the accumulation of circumstantial detail, at proving not only the existence but also the literary worth of unwritten works by authors who do not exist. Borges believes, in fact, that no writer can be original, that writing is essentially the manipulation of archetypal counters, that literary achievement must lie then more in the outlining of possible directions for these manipulations than in the actual production of a work. The nonexistent works therefore described within his own works attain, from the mere circumstantiality of Borges' sustained allusions to them, a level of reality, a solidity worthy perhaps only of masterpieces. This solidity reflects inevitably, in turn upon Borges' own works, giving them the fanciful strength and substance of so many Baroque monuments. There is no need for things as ephemeral as "characters."

An inheritor of Hispanic tradition, Borges is quite at home with the Baroque, and it has been demonstrated that his style is in effect a modern version of the Latinized Baroque stil coupé. He writes, that is, with a kind of jagged preciousness which the translators of Ficciones have often been at perhaps unwarranted pains to make smooth, a preciousness which, closely examined, reveals links not only with the Spanish of Quevedo but also with the English of Browne, Gibbon, Poe, and Chesterton. Nor does Borges deny these influences, holding as he does that there is no such thing as originality and that his use of obvious sources can only make those sources themselves, in the light of the new context he gives them, richer.

Particularly devoted to Chesterton, Borges has given the creator of Father Brown a role in Hispanic literary history that far surpasses any he might have played hitherto in English, by basing works like "The Garden of Forking Paths," "The Form of the Sword," "Theme of Traitor and Hero," "Death and the Compass," and "The Sect of the Phoenix," for example, upon the particular conventions so skillfully employed in Chesterton's detective stories. All five of these fictions center around the solution of a problem: in "The Garden of the Forking Paths," perhaps the most striking of the group, one finds the solution to a puzzle in military history also supplying the solution to an inverted puzzle in crime, while "The Form of the Sword" and "Theme of the Traitor and Hero" provide intricate problems of curiously reversed identity. "Death and the Compass" stands as almost a parody of the classic detective form. "The Sect of the Phoenix" establishes an atmosphere of conspiracy that is dissipated, suddenly and surprisingly, only in the last sentence.

The image of the labyrinth, that archetype of all puzzles and problems, occurs again and again in Ficciones, as if it represented in some ultimate form the ideal of Borges' art. In "Tlön, Uqbar, Orbis Tertius," "The Babylon Lottery," and "The Library of Babel," one finds Borges constructing whole societies upon the basis of labyrinthine principles, erecting complete social designs out of chance, choice, trial and error. If these societies seem to represent Borges' vision of man in relation to himself, however, stories like "Funes, the Memorious," "The Secret Miracle," and "The South" give us Borges' vision of man in relation to the only ultimate gauge he has of the universe outside himself—time. The heroes of all three stories triumph over time, achieving an immortality by the supreme exercise of those faculties that would mark them out ordinarily as being mortally human: memory and the imagination. In his short lifetime, Funes lives the imaginative life of thousands of other men, while Hladik and Dahlmann, the heroes of "The Secret Miracle" and "The South," bestow upon themselves the power both to postpone fatality and to welcome it in the end, as a part of an aesthetic order they themselves have created. They are the human mind.

It is memory and imagination, as well, that make Jorge Borges a great writer. He has, as someone has remarked, read all the books, with everything he read feeding the Minotaur of his mind. Like Vladimir Nabokov, with whom his attitudes, theories, and practices have a great deal in common, he was compelled to wait a long time for some sort of adequate literary recognition, perhaps because he, too, is so unabashedly an intellectual. The present need is adequate translation which will make available for English-speaking readers all the works of this master in their language, a language to whose literature he has shown such a dazzling devotion.

THE FIELD OF VISION

Author: Wright Morris (1910-)

Time: Christmas, 1956

Locale: Mexico City, Mexico, and Lone Tree, Nebraska

First published: 1956

Principal characters:

GORDON BOYD, a middle-aged writer

WALTER J. McKEE, Boyd's boyhood friend, a cattle breeder
LOIS McKEE, Walter's wife, once in love with Boyd
TOM SCANLON, Lois' ninety-year-old father
DR. LEOPOLD LEHMANN, Austrian amateur psychologist, Boyd's friend
GORDON McKEE, McKee's grandson
PAULA KAHLER, a male transvestite, Lehmann's patient

In The Territory Ahead, a critical book, Wright Morris discusses a particularly American dilemma: the writer's nostalgic immersion to the point of immolation in an overflowing reservoir of raw material. In most of the nine novels before The Field of Vision, Morris processed fragments of his own material, searching for a conception that would enable him to achieve the kind of control and coherence he saw in F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby.

In a deliberate act of rediscovery, he took a fresh look at recognizable American artifacts, archetypal American experiences—the young romantic's nomadic wandering away from and nostalgic return to the home place—and presented some of the most authentic Americana of the 1940's. Like Faulkner, he explored his own special province, the Nebraska plains where the fertile prairie grass fades into the arid regions. His vision was seriocomic, and his style made imaginative use of Midwestern speech patterns. The Field of Vision is Morris' first major attempt to get the fragments of his raw material into focus, to compress into expressive metaphors his conception of American Land, Dream, and Character.

If both the author and the artist hero of his early novels have become immersed in a nostalgia, unsettled by nausea, and thus need some distance from Lone Tree, Nebraska, what better vantage point than the Mexico City bull ring? An external experience has no significance, neither in life nor in literature, Morris believes, until by a deliberate act of consciousness it becomes an internal event. Morris' arrangement of this event is skillfully crafted.

Quite by chance, Gordon Boyd, a failed bohemian writer, encounters Walter J. McKee, his boyhood friend, in the lobby of a hotel in Mexico City. To shock them, he takes the folks from back home to the bullfight. Seating his characters at the ring, Morris confines the present action to the duration of the bullfight; but in memory, forty years of the past are conjured up. He enters the minds of five of the characters: Boyd; McKee; his wife Lois; Tom Scanlon, Lois' father; and Dr. Lehmann, Boyd's analyst. Using the third-person point of view, Morris focuses certain external events through each of these characters one after the other in a sequence which he repeats five times. Some common focal point, seen from contrasting angles, provides transition from one character's mind to another's. Morris does not go into the minds of two other characters: Paula Kahler, who is traveling with Boyd and Lehmann; and little Gordon, McKee's grandson. Each of the personae provides Morris with a different perspective from which to view the American character.

In the excitement of the accidental reunion and of the bullfight, the characters are charged with the past and the immediate present. The phases of the bullfight and the presence of the others stimulate each character to recall an event in the past in such a way that it is possible for him to experience a shock of recognition in the present. The bullfight ritual, with its artistic, spiritual, and brutally physical dimensions, and the technique of shifting points of view provide Morris with a controlling framework that enables him to shuttle back and forth, weaving a tapestry of collective consciousness in which time present and time past form a design. Thus, the reader witnesses a double ceremony. As the torero and his bull move toward the moment of truth, each character comes closer to the horns of his private dilemma. To make the moment of truth possible, the torero must risk being gored; the human mind confronting itself runs a similar risk.

But there is a contrast between the action in the ring and the events enacted in the theater of the mind. The events of the past are simple and cliché; Morris manipulates the clichés of our mass culture and language as a witty and humorous function of style working toward insight. McKee, Lois, and Boyd share (though each in the isolation of his own mind) the incident on the front porch in Lone Tree when Boyd kissed Lois, McKee's fiancée, and swept her off her feet. Neither Gordon Boyd nor McKee knows that Lois got up that night from her cot on the back porch and, sleepwalking, unlatched the screen to admit her dream lover, Boyd; in the midst of her dream, the cot collapsed. The hero's failure to appear in the flesh persuaded Lois to marry McKee, but she named her first-born Gordon, who named his own son Gordon.

In another act of audacity, Boyd attempted to "walk on water" at the sand pit outside town; until Boyd went down, McKee believed the hero would succeed. He witnessed a similar bungled act of audacity when Boyd ran onto the field to get a foul ball autographed by Ty Cobb; Boyd dropped the ball but ripped a pocket from Cobb's pants. In the present, parallel audacious gestures are made: for instance, a Mexican boy climbs into the ring to make the archetypal amateur confrontation with the bull that has just gored the professional.

In their childhood, Boyd was the hero and McKee was his major witness. He responded to the promise of greatness in Boyd. As opposites, Boyd and McKee are attracted to each other. They illustrate a dichotomy in the American character, two dimensions of the American dream: the man of action and the dreamer, the artist and the businessman, the power of fiction and the authority of fact. At Lone Tree the land itself, fertile to the east and sterile to the west, exhibits these contrasts.

Through the hero-witness relationship, Morris depicts an element in the American character which frustrates our attempt to realize the dream in a land of promise: the audacity that bewitches rather than transforms both the doer and his observer. To accomplish his limited goals, McKee, like Sancho Panza, must believe that Boyd (Don Quixote) is capable of success somewhere in the realm of possibilities. But in Ceremony in Lone Tree, McKee will escape captivity in the hero-witness relationship, though to no great purpose.

In his youthful enthusiasm, McKee extended this relationship to include Lois, whose own response added a sexual dimension. When Boyd failed to follow up the kiss, Lois (Dulcinea) saw that his foolishness would not end in wisdom. Concluding that most males are hopeless, her father included, she began to suppress her emotions. Ironically, Boyd now regards her as a typical example of the frigid Midwestern housewife. In Mexico, she almost bolts from her situation with a tourist, but he also is a man of mere gestures.

In the American experience, gesture is not often enough followed by the consummate act. Audacious Columbus, too, walked on water, but reached the wrong shore; Americans have domesticated a continent but are homeless. The audacious frontier hero survives in men like Boyd: the boy who once attempted the impossible has become the middle-aged clown who becalms a raging bull by squirting Pepsi Cola into its mouth. With that gesture, Boyd touches bottom. Aware that each of the adults has failed in his own way, ways McKee's grandson may imitate, Boyd makes a desperate attempt to pass the hero's charge on to his namesake, little Gordon. Flinging the boy's phony coonskin cap into the bull ring where the beast lies slain by a professional, Boyd lets the boy down into the ring to retrieve his cap and to take the risk that may transform the amateur into the disciplined man.

Observing the hero-witness relationship between Tom Scanlon and little Gordon, Boyd gets perspective on himself. The old man tells the boy tales of a bygone era of audacity. A fossilized victim of the past, Scanlon is reminded by the gored torero's cry for water of the pioneer trek his father led across the arid plains. His father, Tim, lying on a bed in a back room of the Lone Tree Hotel, so bemused Tom with stories of the great age of adventure that Tom now believes, in his senility, that it was he who went through the inferno of the desert and witnessed the cannibalism of the survivors upon those who perished. The witness has become the hero and both are defunct. Trapped himself in Ty Cobb's pocket, which he still carries as a talisman, Boyd knows that the spirit represented by such emblems of the past, including Gordon's coonskin cap, must be repeatedly resurrected in acts of transformation.

A different reflection of each character is offered by every other in the crazy house of mirrors that only Morris, with the complicity of the reader, can focus. As the link between the reader and the characters, Dr. Lehmann, an amateur student of life, is able to view at some distance the triangular Boyd-McKee-Lois relationship. McKee and Lois can see the similarity of the bull ring to the porch, the sandpit, the ball park, and the stage where Boyd's play, depicting those symbolic moments of the past, was performed: but while reality imposes correspondences upon the mind, keeping it moving over the surface of things, man must will the achievement of insights and concepts. Thus, Lehmann seeks connections. He interprets Boyd's dilemma in terms of Paula Kahler's. Having tasted the ashes of success, Boyd tries to make a success of failure—a typical American enterprise. Unable to cope with human nature, Paula changed her own, from male to female, from a crippling compassion for people to a safer sympathy for insects and animals. Lehmann discerns the way a self-ventriloquism deceives us in our realization of the dummy in ourselves.

Morris demonstrates Lucifer's perception: "The mind is its own place, and in itself/ Can make a Heav'n of Hell, a Hell of Heav'n." Thus, at the bull ring, McKee and Lois are able to see only what they brought with them from Nebraska. The human dilemma is posed in this way: just as no two people see the same bullfight, despite its element of artistic order, no two characters share the same field of vision. Though they may arrive at similar moments of insight, people communicate in terms of clichés, while the real drama, when it occurs, is an almost unbroken soliloquy. To each character, all the others appear to be mad Hamlets.

These missed connections are at once pathetic, because they foster lives of quiet desperation, and comic, because most of the characters are fools who persist in their folly to a dead end. Morris merely juxtaposes the elements that make perception possible, and while the characters themselves usually miss the connection, the reader is in a position to make it. Morris' art is resolved in the response of the reader, but it is as inaccessible to the inattentive reader as the moment of perception is to the purblind character. Lehmann, however, knows that the accidents and coincidences of a life essentially without design can be patterned by a conscious act of imagination; and he sees the pathos of the human inability to realize those rare moments of truth, those epiphanies. He sees, as does Boyd less clearly, that in such structured experiences man transcends impermanence (as in the bullfight ritual) and enters, if only momentarily, the realm of permanence.

FIESTA IN NOVEMBER

Type of work: Novel

Author: Eduardo Mallea (1903-)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: The mid-1930's

Locale: Buenos Aires, Argentina

First published: 1936

Principal characters:

EUGENIA RAGUE, society leader born in Eng.^l and

GEORGE RAGUE, her wealthy husband

MARTA, their bored daughter

BRENDA, their younger daughter

SEÑOR RAÍCES, an Argentine financier

LINTAS, an artist

AN UNNAMED POET, a political victim

Critique:

Keeping several balls in the air at a time is a trick for a juggler. Manipulating several stories simultaneously was the feat of one of Argentina's most brilliant authors, Eduardo Mallea. Educated in a British school in Buenos Aires where he studied English and English literature, he was distracted from the medical profession of his father into that of literature. After his frivolous Stories for a Frantic Englishwoman and other volumes more like essays than fiction came a new style beginning with Fiesta in November, classified as "contrapuntal dialogue," that presented a number of characters, each with his own problems. Woven through Fiesta in November are references to the execution of García Lorca in Spain, in August, 1936. It exemplified such suppression of thought as the young Argentines of the novel anticipated and feared in their homeland. Mallea has been criticized for backing away from narration and substituting psychological analyses or philosophical reflections with the logical steps to a conclusion often omitted. This tendency can be observed throughout Fiesta in November, which contains two plots interrupting each other, never being obviously connected.

The Story:

The book opens with the underlying plot in italics. A young unnamed poet was writing on a scrap of paper a poem on love. The time was eleven o'clock at night. Suddenly a violent, protracted rapping sounded on the door. As he went to answer the pounding he took with him a piece of bread. Opening the door, he was confronted by the leader of a patrol of armed men in dirty uniforms. The leader stated that they had come for him.

The main story begins at eight o'clock on a warm springlike evening in November. Eugenia Rague had come down the stairs for a final inspection of the setting for her fiesta. English by birth, but Argentine by adoption, she dominated her aristocratic surroundings as Cardinal Wolsey, whose portrait adorned her salon, had dominated his. There passed through her head the memory of the lack of respect shown her by Lord Burglay and Lady Gower during her visit to London. But now she had to concentrate on her guests about to arrive.

Others in the house were reacting differently to the hot evening. In another room, her husband, George, was trying to concentrate on acquiring culture through a phonograph record, but he kept thinking of how he could persuade Señor Raíces, after dinner, to sign a profitable stock purchase. Should delays result, he might lose everything. Intruding into these thoughts came those of his treadmill life, his wife's incessant pressure, and his own desire to relax and perhaps to dream. The arrival of the butler with the afternoon mail interrupted and infuriated him. Then it was time for him to prepare for the party. Marta, the older daughter, lay naked on her bed, wondering why she had spurned a high-born lover.

At nine, the lights were turned on, the orchestra tuned up, and the first guests arrived, the elite of Argentine society. Their conversation was frivolous: the latest scandalous behavior of some politician, the proposal to exterminate the unimportant lower class. The reception, with its empty conversation and the broken phrases from the more serious exchange of ideas revealed the waste of these people's lives.

Meanwhile Marta made her entrance, prepared for a boring and perhaps detestable evening among unexciting people she had fully comprehended several years earlier. Several young men brought her drinks, and her father welcomed her assistance in his social duties. When Raíces appeared, Rague gave the signal to proceed to the dining room.

In perplexity the poet questioned the armed men, asking what they could possibly want with him.

At the reception the painter, Lintas, rushed in, late as usual, but in time for the chilled consomme. As he drank it, he became attracted to Marta. Her sudden smile showed her reaction to him, but a pseudo-philosophic discussion prevented any words. Lintas noticed her distraught expression when her mother mentioned the fact that Brenda was not there. Only Marta knew of the appeal from Brenda to come immediately to give her assistance. While dismissing her curiosity about the identity of the man across the table from her, she tried to imagine what help her sister could need.

(At this point, Mallea devotes considerable space to the inner thoughts of his main characters, passages shot through by allusions to Ruskin, Pater, Hardy, and others.)

After the meal, dancing began in the garden. Lintas found himself dancing with Marta as though they were enemies. Later, more friendly, they discussed some of his paintings. Then she remembered Brenda and without a word of explanation she left.

Meanwhile the leader of the patrol began to lose patience. His men glared at the young man who was wasting their time. They prepared to march their prisoner away.

Marta's flight took her to a shabby house and into a stench-filled room where she found Brenda recovering from an abortion. Brenda needed her sister's help to conceal her situation from her parents and to supply additional money for the operation, which had cost more than the previous one. Marta left the house and headed for home.

At the fiesta no one had noticed Marta's absence. Rague and Raíces were discussing stock, and Raíces was trying to explain why he did not want to rush into the transaction. Eugenia Rague had maneuvered Lintas into visiting her art gallery to pass judgment on some new purchases. Amid a group of interested guests he pronounced them fakes. Lintas knew that he had created a conflict because Eugenia would have preferred a comfortable lie to the unpleasant truth. Marta, returning as Lintas was leaving the fiesta, offered to take him home.

Through the door, the poet saw a fighting cock belonging to a neighbor. He tried to imagine what was going to happen to him. He was suddenly frightened.

In the car, Marta felt impelled to talk. She protested against the sterility of the civilized universe and the difficulty people find in trying to communicate. When they reached his home, he invited her in. The screams of a neighboring woman started him on the story of his life. Poverty had engendered in him a hatred for people like her. He told her of a gang of ruffians who had beaten up an old bookseller because he was foreign and was selling "subversive books." It was his widow who had screamed. This atrocity, making him feel for the first time involved in mankind, had increased his loathing for the governing class that permitted such crimes to go unpunished. They continued their discussion during a walk at dawn through the woods. As she left, they realized that neither had convinced the other of their beliefs.

The prisoner asked for permission to get his hat. What he really wanted was time.

Marta hated to go home. Brenda would be in a troubled sleep; her father would be snoring, and her mother would be sneaking down to the kitchen for a snack. Marta knew that in other parts of the world vigils more painful than hers were going on. She now realized that her trouble was a hatred of herself because of an unsatisfied yearning for something. Suddenly the thought came to her that she, who had always been served, ought to serve others. She paused at a church, but it offered no promise of relief. She stopped next at a coffee shop. Though sensing herself out of place among the customers, eventually she began to feel a comprehension of them and a oneness with them all. She went home.

In her room she took stock of herself. She felt a resemblance to her country with its variety and abundance. Before she fell asleep she decided that a true change from the horrors of life must come from the tormented people themselves.

The final pages complete the subplot whose parts have been inserted. The poet's cousin had already been arrested and shot, and his family had been denied permission to bury him. The poet joined the patrol, protesting, but the only reply was rifle butts in his face. When they reached a deserted house and an open space, he tried to run. The patrol fired after him. He fell to the ground and blood soaked the piece of bread he dropped. One of the men turned over the body to make sure the poet was dead. The patrol, leaving him lying on the ground, walked away with feelings of loathing for one another.

THE FIFTH QUEEN

Author: Ford Madox Ford (1873-1939)

Time: 1539-1542

Locale: England and France

First published: The Fifth Queen, 1906; Privy Seal, 1907; The Fifth Queen Crowned, 1908

Principal characters:

HENRY VIII, King of England
 PRINCESS MARY (later Mary I), his daughter
 ANNE OF CLEVES, his fourth wife
 KATHARINE HOWARD, his fifth wife
 THE DUKE OF NORFOLK, her uncle
 THOMAS CROMWELL, Lord Privy Seal
 THOMAS CULPEPPER, Katharine Howard's cousin
 STEPHEN GARDINER, Bishop of Winchester
 THROCKMORTON, one of Cromwell's spies
 NICHOLAS UDAL, Latin tutor to the Princess Mary THOMAS CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury
 LASCALES, Cranmer's spy

The Fifth Queen is a full-bodied historical novel, written in the grand Victorian manner, of the brief and tragic marriage of Katharine Howard to Henry VIII. Many will remember Henry's first wife, Katharine of Aragon, because of Shakespeare, and Anne Boleyn, his second, because she was the mother of Queen Elizabeth I. But the others—Jane Seymour, Anne of Cleves, Katharine Howard, and Katharine Parr—are only dim ghosts flickering through the twilight of history. Moreover, the reign of Henry VIII has not been a favorite with historical novelists, for it is overshadowed by the greater age of Elizabeth which offers so much more to an imaginative writer. Also, the period of Henry is much more difficult for a modern reader to understand; it was not the high Renaissance of Elizabeth's time but, again, a twilight between the Middle Ages that were dying and the new age that was struggling to be born.

The story opens in the bitter winter of 1539, as the barges of the great officers of the Crown sweep up the river toward Greenwich in the wake of the king's barge. The new queen, Anne of Cleves, has landed in England, and already the rumor is that the king has said she resembles a pig studded with cloves and that her body stinks so vilely that no man can endure it. The inoffensive Jane Seymour had died two years before, having given Henry his long-desired son, the sickly Prince Edward; and the Cleves alliance was the next move in the complicated political chess game. It would present a strong Protestant front against France and the Empire. On the success of this alliance the Protestant faction at Court had staked their political futures—and their heads; and now the whole scheme was about to be wrecked upon the king's dislike for his new queen. It was no wonder that the Chancellor of the Augmentations, standing in the stern of Cromwell's barge, shivered with more than the winter wind.

To the court, as it lay in the palace at Greenwich, comes the heroine of the novel, Katharine Howard, in the charge of her cousin, Thomas Culpepper, to seek the protection of her uncle, the Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England and the victor of Flodden Field. She is the daughter of poverty-stricken Lord Edmund Howard, a younger son of the ducal family, whose house, far in the north in Lincolnshire, had been burned in one of the all too frequent local uprisings. By chance she is injured in a riot, outside the palace, between Lutherans and Catholics; by chance she meets the king and attracts his attention. She is appointed one of the ladies in waiting to Princess Mary, an appointment that will inevitably bring her into further contact with Henry. From that moment her life becomes a part of English history, with the headsman's block on Tower Hill standing grimly only two short years away.

The Fifth Queen is in the tradition of Shakespeare's historical plays. In most novels of this type, the main characters are the author's inventions, while the figures from actual history appear in the background to give color and verisimilitude. But here all the characters are real figures from history, even down to the Magister Nicholas Udal, author of the almost forgotten play, Ralph Roister Doister. So it is with Shakespeare's histories. Hence, a reader familiar with the history of the period is aware of much dramatic irony as the story moves along: Bishop Latimer, for instance, exhorting to repentance a friar who is to be burned for heresy. When the sinister figure of Cromwell appears, we know that the axe is waiting even for him.

Thomas Cromwell, the Lord Privy Seal, dominates the larger part of the book as he had dominated Henry for years. Hated by the old nobility because of his low birth—he was the son of a brewer—and by the Catholics because of his destruction of the monasteries, he represents the "new men" whom the Tudors brought forward to do their work for them. The few noble families that had survived the Wars of the Roses could not be trusted; they looked back to a feudal past wherein their ancestors had set up and pulled down kings. But Cromwell, who had risen to power through his betrayal of Wolsey, looked to the future: to an absolute monarchy in which the king's word would be supreme. With his treachery, his network of spies throughout England, he is a revolting figure; yet readers cannot help admiring his vision of a realm set free from a renewal of the anarchy of the Wars of the Roses. He favors the Protestant cause less from doctrinal than from political reasons; he is politically astute enough to sense that the new Protestantism will offer a firmer base for an absolute monarchy than the old Catholicism. He served Henry by treachery and cruelty, but he served him well. Yet so horrifying a man is he that the reader rejoices in his downfall.

Among the characters of the second rank there stands out the figure of Princess Mary—the future “Bloody Mary” of history books. Ford gives an unusually brilliant picture of her: a girl so bitten to the soul by her mother's divorce and her own subsequent proclamation as a bastard that she is now only a rigid figure of hate. To good Catholics, she is almost a saint; to her father, she is a frozen block against which even his imperious will is shattered. And to any reader who may be interested in her reign, little more than a decade in the future, this portrait gives an illuminating psychological insight into the causes that made her the ruler that she was to become.

But above all, there is the figure of Henry VIII, this giant of a man whose vast shadow stretches over the whole story. As depicted by Ford, he resembles nothing so much as a half-tamed wild animal, at one moment pathetically docile, at the next, tearing into pieces those whom he had seemed to love. He is haunted by the fear of damnation for his persecution of the old faith, yet he cannot return to it. In the final dramatic scene between him and his fifth wife, she tells him what he is: a man who blows hot in the morning and cold at night, a straw tossed by every conflicting wind. For all his absolute power and his cruelty, he is a pathetic and tragic man.

And there is Katharine, who has been called lewd, deceitful, grasping, pitiable in her frailty. She had only a brief moment in history, and historians seem to agree that she was “probably” guilty of the crimes of unchastity charged against her. Ford gives us a very different interpretation. His Katharine Howard is a girl too honest, too deeply religious, for the world in which she had to live. She sees men as only all white or all black; she sincerely believes that the old faith can be restored. Indeed, her brief reign did mark the return to power of the reactionary group, a momentary reversal of the triumphant march of Protestantism. But she is betrayed by everyone; even her uncle Norfolk, a hater of the new age, betrays her. And so Henry, who deeply loved her but who could never stay of one mind, sent her to the block on Tower Hill.

The real protagonists of this novel are, however, not Henry VIII and his queen; they are the old Catholicism of the Middle Ages and the new Protestantism of the Renaissance. The novel is set on one of those great dividing lines of history; and Henry himself has a foot, in its great square-toed shoe, on either side of it. He was half Catholic, half Protestant; he turned away from Latin because it reminded him of the old language of the Mass that he had destroyed, yet he wanted to be head of the English Church. The hands of the clock could be briefly stopped, but they could not be turned back. As Katharine is bluntly told, there is the unescapable fact that too many people in England have by now grown rich from the spoils of the Church and that these men will never give up the lands and goods that they have obtained. Even her uncle, the Duke of Norfolk, head of the Catholic party and of the old nobility, wears in his hat a jewel taken from a chalice in the Abbey of Risings.

The new nobility, come up under the Tudors, is founded on wealth stolen from the Church. Here is a hard economic fact, against which theology and even Katharine's faith will be shattered.

Katharine, "mazed," as she says, by the reading of old books, moves toward her tragic end because she expects men to be better than they can be. Her world is not peopled by heroic figures from classical antiquity. Yet in the end it is she who triumphs, and Henry, who sends her to execution, who is defeated.

As was said earlier, this is a long, elaborate historical novel in the good old Victorian tradition. It has an immensely complicated plot—intrigue is piled up intrigue, incident upon incident, and hardly a character in the story can be trusted. Each is utterly false, thinking only of himself, endlessly shifting sides, betraying and being betrayed. But at least these are full-blooded people, not the hollow men who flit, twittering like bats, through most contemporary novels—"these unfortunates," as Dante calls them, "who never were alive." The style fits the book. We are at one moment in the glare of torches and in the presence of the enormous scarlet king; at the next, plunged into the darkness of a corridor of one of these vast palaces. The warhorses, sheathed in iron, solemnly prance; the state barges slide up and down the Thames; Norfolk's tucket is blown in a triple convulsion of sound. It was a magnificent and a terrible world, and Ford makes it live again in all of its terror and splendor.

IL FILOSTRATO

Type of work: Poetry

Author: Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-1375)

Type of plot: Medieval romance

Time of plot: c. 1200 B.C.

Locale: The battle of Troy

First transcribed: c. 1335-1340

Principal characters:

PRIAMO, King of Troy TROILO and HECTOR, his sons
PANDARO, Troilo's friend
GRISEIDA, his cousin
CALCHAS, her father
DIOMEDE, a Greek commander

Critique:

Boccaccio took the episode of the faithless Briseida from Benoît and fashioned it into a metrical romance, Il Filostrato. Through his own imaginative genius, Boccaccio was able to take what had been but a minor incident in the story of the Trojan War and make it the center of the action. Virtually the entire story is Boccaccio's own, and consequently it is to Boccaccio that Chaucer is indebted for his Troilus and Criseyde. Though Il Filostrato contains none of the psychological portraiture of Chaucer's work, it has great literary merit and is probably superior to Chaucer's work in its directness and passionate intensity.

The Story:

When Troy was besieged by Greeks who had come to avenge the rape of Queen Helen by Paris, son of Priamo, Calchas, a Trojan priest, foresaw the fall of Troy and fled to the Greeks, leaving behind his widowed daughter, Griseida. When the Trojan people heard of Calchas' treachery, they assembled to burn her house, but they were stopped by Hector, who said she could remain in Troy.

Some days later Troilo happened to see Griseida at a religious festival and, overcome with her exquisite beauty, he immediately fell in love with her. In order to keep his love secret, however, he made remarks about the stupidity of love. In private he would praise Griseida's beauty and his love for her. Soon he began to fight fiercely against the Greeks in hopes that his feats would be pleasing to her, but she showed no signs of recognizing his love. With each day his pining for her grew worse until he could not eat or sleep, but spent his time imploring Love to tell Griseida of his pain.

Pandaro found Troilo in this condition and asked what had caused his grief. Pledging Pandaro to secrecy, Troilo told of his unrequited love for Griseida. Pandaro, agreeing that Griseida was worthy of such love, assured Troilo that he would, with his cunning, find a way to win the girl for him.

Pandaro left Troilo and went immediately to Griseida's house, to tell her that she was greatly loved by a noble and virtuous man of Troy. After considerable teasing Pandaro revealed Troilo's name to her. Though she considered Troilo worthy, Griseida still grieved for her dead husband, and she told Pandaro that Troilo's love would pass. Pandaro persisted in telling her of Troilo's miserable state, and at last she was convinced.

After Pandaro had accomplished his mission, he returned to Troilo and told him of his success. Troilo was overcome with joy. After praising Venus, he went with Pandaro to behold Griseida's beauty.

For a time Troilo was satisfied with the knowledge that Griseida acknowledged his love, but as his passion increased he desired more than brief glimpses of her. His grief soon returned. When he told Pandaro of his frustration, his friend suggested that he write a letter which Pandaro would take to Griseida.

The heartrending letter was written and carried to Griseida. Again she was hesitant, fearing that if she answered the letter she would appear immodest. Again Pandaro convinced her, and she wrote a letter telling Troilo that she desired to meet him; but once more her better judgment restrained her. Pandaro returned to Griseida after delivering the response and told her that mere words were not sufficient. After some argument he assured her that her reputation would not be injured, as the matter would be kept secret.

When Griseida consented to meet Troilo in a secret room in her house, Pandaro cautioned Troilo to be prudent. The young lover went to Griseida's house. Upon meeting the two lovers embraced and after a few words went to her bed chamber where they passed the evening in physical delight.

A few days later the two lovers had another opportunity to be together. Troilo again met her in the secret chamber, and once more they made love. They cursed the morning which ended their meeting and planned to meet again when they could.

The consummation of his love completely changed Troilo. He became even more fierce as soldier, and he continually praised Love and the happy state of those who share its bounties.

Meanwhile, after some savage fighting, the Greeks had taken many of the best Trojan warriors prisoners. Priamo was granted a truce, however, and an exchange of prisoners took place. Calchas, hearing of this exchange, asked the Greeks to give him one of the Trojan warriors to exchange for his daughter Griseida. He was given the mighty Antenor.

During the negotiations Troilo heard that Griseida would be exchanged, and, heartbroken that he might lose her, swooned. When he recovered, without revealing the cause of his consternation, he returned to his palace. There he remained, desolate and sick, reviling Fortune for permitting such a loss to occur.

Eventually he summoned Pandaro, who consoled him by saying that Griseida was not the only beautiful woman in Troy and that a new love would drive away the memories of the old one. Troilo, failing to respond to Pandaro's words, wished only for death. At last Pandaro suggested that Troilo ravish his love from the Greeks, a plan to which Troilo agreed, provided Griseida would consent.

That night Troilo visited Griseida and the two bemoaned their fate. Griseida suggested that the war might end soon and she could return, or, at the least, they could see each other during the truces. Troilo, not convinced, suggested that they run away. Fearing the loss of her honor, Griseida rejected this proposal. She told Troilo to wait patiently for her return, which she would arrange within ten days.

After a tearful farewell, Griseida was delivered to Diomedes in exchange for Antenor. Troilo passed the following days lamenting his loss until, at the suggestion of Pandaro, he went with his friend to a feast in order to make the time pass more quickly.

In the Greek camp, meanwhile, Diomedes had discovered Griseida weeping. Upon learning the cause of her sorrow, he convinced her that Troy would fall and her love for Troilo was unwise. Eventually Griseida was overcome by his arguments and his suit of love, and her feeling for Troilo lessened.

On the tenth day Troilo and Pandaro went to the city gate. There they waited expectantly for Griseida's return, but she did not appear. For the next six days Troilo hopefully waited at the gate. Soon he began to lose his strength and became sickly. Then, in a dream, he saw Griseida being ravished by a wild boar that he believed represented Diomedes. Overcome by the vision, Troilo attempted to kill himself, but he was stopped by Pandaro, who told him to verify the dream by writing to his love. He wrote as Pandaro had suggested, requesting that she return or quell his fears, but he received no answer.

For a time he vented his anger in battle. Then he received an answer from Griseida, reaffirming her love. Troilo, still believing that she was being held in the Greek camp against her will, sent numerous messages to which she responded favorably. During a battle, however, a Trojan soldier wounded Diomedes and took from him a brooch which Troilo identified as a gift he had given Griseida. Feeling now that his suspicion had been true, he sought out Diomedes in battle and the two fought fiercely, but neither was able to overcome the other. One day, after Troilo had killed many Greeks, Achilles slew Troilo and thus ended the ill-conceived love between Troilo and Griseida.

THE FLIES

Author: Mariano Azuela (1873-1952)

Time: April, 1915

Locale: Mexico

First published: 1918

Principal characters:

MARTA REYES-TÉLLEZ, a refugee

MATILDE, her eldest daughter

ROSITA, her younger daughter

RUBÉN, her son

QUINONES, a schoolmate of Rubén

DONACIANO RIOS, a prosecuting attorney

RODOLFO BOCANEGRA, a politician

NEFTALÍ SANCHO PEREDO DE LA GARZA, a poet

DON SINFOROSO, an ex-colonel of the Federal Army
 SEÑOR RUBALCABA, a schoolmaster GENERAL MALACARA,
 MORALITOS, ■ government clerk
 THE DOCTOR
 THE DORADOS, troops of Villa's bodyguard FRANCISCO ("PANCHO") VILLA, General of the Northern Division of the Revolutionary Army

During the Mexican Revolution, Mariano Azuela served in the medical corps of Francisco "Pancho" Villa's army. In this peripheral position he had an opportunity to observe the effects of the war upon every type of person. After Villa's defeat in 1915, Dr. Azuela escaped to El Paso, where he recorded recollections of the Revolution in poignant but frequently humorous sketches and novels. Los de Abajo (The Underdogs) is considered his masterpiece. Las Moscas (The Flies), a much shorter work written two years after The Underdogs, shows less biting criticism, less dismal skepticism, and more good-natured understanding of the author's troubled people.

Dr. Azuela joined Villa's forces with the hope of replacing the octogenarian dictator, Don Porfirio Diaz, with the young idealist, Francisco Madero, whom he believed to be the savior of Mexico. But Madero proved to be a tragic disappointment. His mismanagement, poor judgment, and ineffectual personality could not establish the looked-for democratic government based upon brotherly love and mutual trust. Those principles which had attracted Dr. Azuela to the Revolution were trampled asunder fifteen months after Madero, backed by Villa and others, entered Mexico City. Then General Victoriano Huerta seized the government and President Madero was shot. The next five years were filled with bloody battles in which the various leaders of the Revolution, including Villa, fought for supremacy. Villa reached his peak of power in the winter of 1914, when he and his generals occupied Mexico City and outraged the citizens with their lurid conduct. A powerful and well-regarded general, Alvaro Obregon, disillusioned with Villa, pronounced Governor Carranza of Coahuila "First Chief of the Revolution" and drove Villa's forces out of the city. Villa retreated with his army to Irapuato and then to Sonora, where he was completely defeated the following summer.

Dr. Azuela's story begins in a railway station in Mexico City as multitudes of panic-stricken citizens who had thrown their lot with Villa are now trying to escape the city before Carranza's ferocious Indian troops arrive to take over the government. The station is full of puffing trains ready to carry the fugitives to safety. Among them, Marta Reyes-Téllez, the widow of a government employee of long standing, is trying to find her children and secure a place for herself in one of the coaches. She frantically seeks help from Señor Rios and General Malacara, whom she believes to be influential. The missing children are finally discovered in a hospital car where their mother and would-be friends join them.

The Doctor in charge regards the pompous family sourly but is unable to keep them out. Throughout the night and following day the Doctor remains the one sensible and calm person among the cowards and opportunists who are revealed to the reader in brief descriptive passages and in their conversations. It is easy to imagine that the Doctor of The Flies is Dr. Azuela himself, sketching a remarkable gallery of characters drawn from his personal experience after the fall of Pancho Villa.

The Reyes-Téllez family forms the central focus of the action in The Flies, for their presence serves as a unifying element in this episodic work. They are the first people singled out of the crowd in the railway station and the last to act before the story ends. Perhaps, too, they are the most totally repugnant of a mob of unsavory characters, for they alone have not a trace of intelligence or good humor about them. Marta, the mother, has obviously sacrificed her virtue for security among the political butchers and bandits, as Rubén, the ne'er-do-well son, intimates when he calls attention to the resemblance between his sister Rosita and the governor. No wonder, Rubén comments cynically, the governor had been good to the family.

In Irapuato, Rubén chases down an old acquaintance familiar with members of the new government who may be able to secure the family once more. Rubén betrays the fellow into the hands of the police without a second thought the moment betrayal appears to be to his advantage.

Matilde is a silly, shallow girl who reveals her true nature when her pet canary is killed in the confusion of escape; her reaction is an example of adolescent emotional experimentation. She savors her grief by indulging in screams of profound agony of which not even she knew she was capable.

Rosita, sin's seed, follows her mother's example. At a very young age she is using her body to attract men in high places, hoping to be able to use them to her family's advantage.

The crass materialism of the Reyes-Télez women surpasses all humanity in the closing pages of the book. They push Rubén off the train as it leaves Irapuato carrying them to safety. The foolish boy is deserted with worthless Villa currency and instructions to find a place for the family in the new regime by using Quiñones, the very friend whom Rubén had betrayed.

Dr. Azuela's gallery may contain too many characters to be a completely successful one in so few pages. However, if many individuals are static types, such as the Doctor, Rubén, and his family, others are charming caricatures.

The action proceeds through fourteen short chapters, each complete within itself and containing the revelation of at least one individual. The characters are associated by accident. Panic flings them together and fear keeps them together; but in spite of the seriousness of their life or death situation and their moral degeneracy, Dr. Azuela has endowed many of them with delightful eccentricities which produce a comic effect. In some cases this effect is achieved by the old device of using ironic names and then playing with the meaning. General Malacara (bad-face, or unpleasant-look), for example, is ridiculed by the ironic placing of his name directly after a description of his unfailingly good-natured smile. The humor in this word play is not lost in translation to the fortunate reader who understands the Spanish name.

A tribute to Dr. Azuela's ability to create a pathetic character is the portrait of Don Sinforoso, the arrogant, boastful ex-federal colonel. In public he threatens to kill an impudent young soldier, but when fate brings him face to face with the boy alone, he is caught literally with his pants down, and reveals himself as a blustery old coward. His days of glory long behind him, he cuts a foolish figure in his efforts to recapture the power and dash of his youth. His name, Sinforoso, is significant; "sin" meaning "without," and "foroso" sounding enough like the Spanish "fuerzo" meaning "strength" or "power" to suggest the Spanish equivalent of "Mr. Powerless," humorous in view of his boastful, militant surface personality, and ironic when contrasted with his inner nature.

Another character, although a minor one, deserves mention as an example of Dr. Azuela's technique of telling a story through character revelation. Chapter XI is ostensibly devoted to a council of war, held among Señor Rios, Colonel Sinforoso, the General, and Señor Rubalcaba, the schoolmaster. Señor Rubalcaba's personal thoughts during the council become increasingly more and more important, indicating the impossibility of disinterested group concern. A decision must be made as to whether the crowd should wait for General Villa at Irapuato or run to safety at once to some place farther from the capital. In the midst of exaggerated and heated debate, the schoolmaster absently meditates upon the loss of his love, Aurora, meaning "dawn." Again the name is played upon. It is not so easy to cast off the comfortable habit of a woman's company, he muses, particularly since his potbelly and attacks of gout make the likelihood of replacing her very remote. Here the decision being made, which is said to be of inestimable importance, is actually nothing more than the framework in which the author's real concern, that of satirizing the self-centered interests of the common Mexican during the Revolution, may be realized.

An outstanding comic character is Moralitos (little morals), a bloated, grotesque little monkey who runs about the car, flushed and wide-eyed with excitement, spreading rumors of certain destruction, and stepping on everybody. True to the indication of character suggested in his name, Moralitos is a great moralizer. Early in the book his ironic, ranting protestations of sincerity, honesty, and loyalty to the cause on behalf of the refugees provokes an apology from the Doctor which explains the theme of the novel. Speaking of the crowd, the flies that buzz frantically about the sources of power and wealth in the capital, he admits that they are no worse than they have to be. They are models of virtue when their bodily needs are satisfied; they are not to be blamed if their morality is inspired by their bellies.

The precarious existence of these people is threatened by every rumor. They have played amateur politics through three regimes and are in the process of throwing in with whoever wins control of the government. Their problem is one of timing. They must turn their allegiance at just the right moment in order to fall in line for the best position in the new government. They are nervous, insincere people who twitch and fawn before every face on the political horizon, but with the possible exception of the Reyes-Téllez family they are not evil.

The message of The Flies is a bitter one which reflects Dr. Azuela's personal disillusionment with the war. The story mirrors a fundamental irony of glorious causes, the great dichotomy between political ideology and social reality. Each man sees the Revolution through eyes of self-interest and acts accordingly. However, although the human animal may be unable to rise above his hunger pang, he is not a total loss. The author seems to understand and sympathize with human weakness; he points to faults, but he does not blame.

Dr. Azuela's prose style in The Flies is journalistic in its direct simplicity. He relates the events in the station, on the train, and in Irapuato as they occur, in plain language suitable to his characters. The choppy, fragmentary dialogue is well suited to suggest the jerky movement of the train and the nervousness of the fugitives. While the author's language is not poetic in general, there is a central metaphor which runs through the work, enriching and unifying it. That image appears as a brief glimpse of a cock with flaming plumage, his head held high, his wings outstretched, perched upon a dunghill. A clear picture of pride and arrogance supported by a "dunghill" of past offenses, this representation in animal form is flashed in the train window to indicate the false pride rampant within the hospital car. Carrying out the image in explaining her family's incredible and unfounded snobbery, Matilde refers to her family's plumes which can cross a bog and never show a spot.

The final chapter presents an abrupt change. The town of Irapuato has been evacuated and the now familiar hospital car of assorted fools has departed. Pancho Villa's official train arrives a moment later, almost exactly twenty-four hours after the story began. He is no longer the man in power. Silence now, not madly cheering throngs, greets him. The sun, says Dr. Azuela, died forever with Villa's retreat. The night murmurs that Mexico is saved; but on the horizon the moon looks down, laughing.

The latest swarm of flies is now buzzing about Carranza. So it goes—a new government, a new swarm.

THE FLIES

Type of work: Drama

Author: Jean-Paul Sartre (1905-)

Time: Could be interpreted as World War period

Locale: Argos (could be interpreted as applying to France)

First presented: 1943

Principal characters:

ORESTES, Agamemnon's son and heir to the throne of Argos

ELECTRA, his sister

CLYTEMNESTRA, his mother

AEGISTHEUS, ruler of Argos after killing Agamemnon

THE PEDAGOGUE, Orestes' tutor

ZEUS, King of the Gods

THE ERINYES, the Furies

The Flies, the first play by Jean-Paul Sartre to be presented to the public, was well received when it was acted in occupied Paris. If one bears in mind that it is concerned with the problem of liberty, and that many of its references must have been pointedly topical in 1943, the interest it aroused is scarcely surprising. On the other hand, although The Flies has lost some of the immediacy of its appeal, the problem of liberty is not, of course, exclusive to any single age; and this play is still popular and frequently staged.

For Sartre, it is nonsense to speak of a universal human nature; only the situations in which man may find himself can be universal. Indeed, all of his theater involves a character moving toward a choice or decision in relation or in opposition to a given situation. The success of Sartre's theater—for it is principally through this medium that his name has become famous throughout the world—resides at least in part in his leaving his principal character or characters a considerable amount of freedom to develop in the course of the action. Moreover, he has successfully created situations which an audience will frequently find familiar.

The Flies is a play in three acts. In the first act, Sartre apparently concentrates on creating an atmosphere and on setting the situation. He achieves both of these aims in striking fashion.

When the play opens, it is fifteen years to the day since the slaying of Agamemnon. Orestes, Agamemnon's son, arrives in Argos with his tutor. He travels under another name, for Aegistheus, who has ruled in Argos since killing Agamemnon, had ordered him killed while he was still a young child. Orestes, however, had been saved, and brought up by wealthy Athenians. Curiosity alone can justify his visit to Argos, for his mother, Clytemnestra, now shares the throne with Aegistheus. His sister Electra is still in Argos.

It will be readily apparent that the theme of the exiled son returning to his native city is, to say the least, conventional. Yet Sartre enriches this basic situation incomparably. Orestes, when he arrives, has not come seeking vengeance: he is a tourist. Young, rich, handsome, and well-educated, he is free of obligations or commitments, light as air, and apparently reasonably happy to be so.

He finds a city in which the atmosphere is leaden and oppressive; he receives no answer to his requests for directions, and the first person to address a word to him is an idiot. It is as though a conspiracy exists to exclude him from the affairs of the city. In fact, the people of Argos are so involved with their own problem that they are quite incapable of seeing beyond it: they have assumed a burden of collective guilt. Fifteen years before, they had done nothing to prevent Agamemnon's death; instead of admitting their responsibility, they have wrapped themselves up in remorse. This uniform pattern of behavior suits Zeus, who steps on and off stage throughout the play, since it holds Aegistheus' subjects in check and leaves little scope for personal initiative. The presence of Zeus adds an uncanny element to the atmosphere in Argos. A sinister, persistent presence is that of swarms of flies, sent by the gods to plague the populace as a constant reminder of their guilt. Death seems to be curiously intermingled with life in this city of frightened people. Repentance has even been institutionalized: once a year, on the anniversary of Agamemnon's death, the "day of the dead" is announced, while, as an old woman tells Zeus, mourning cloth is the costume of Argos. Guilt and remorse, from being a wave of feeling that struck the city, has become a whole way of life, fostered by Zeus and by Aegistheus, that stifles any initiative and promotes only submissive credulity. One cannot help thinking of a similar attitude that the Germans occupying France and the Petain government did everything to encourage during World War II.

One person in Argos remains independent and defiant. Electra, though treated as a slave by her mother and Aegistheus, is rebellious. Contemptuous of the general fear and superstition, she lets it be known to Orestes, who has not as yet revealed his true identity, that she lives only for the day when her brother will come to seek vengeance. At the same time Electra is a pathetic and occasionally childlike figure. At one moment she vilifies Jupiter with all her might; at the next she betrays her longing for warmth and affection in the questions she asks about other cities of Greece. When Orestes asks her if she had ever thought of fleeing, she can only answer that she lacks courage to do so because she would be afraid on the roads by herself. Perhaps because of her sex, or her youth, or simply the long isolation from thinking people, Electra too has a fixed attitude: a thirst for vengeance which does not ring true or confident when set alongside her gentleness in other respects.

As was foreseeable, Orestes becomes sufficiently curious about the city, or sufficiently interested in the plight of his sister to decide to remain a little longer in Argos.

At the beginning of the second act, the scene changes from Argos to a mountain slope outside the city. Here the people are gathered to be present at the rites attending the "day of the dead" and the release of the dead from the underworld. For it has been made known that a rock on the mountainside conceals the entrance to the underworld. Once a year, this rock is rolled back, and dead acquaintances of the people of Argos come back to torture the city's conscience. On this occasion, Aegistheus arrives late for the ceremonies, which he himself had instituted. The solid, impenetrable fear of the crowd begins to give way to blind panic, as they feel quite helpless without some leadership in the presence of the dead. After Aegistheus appears and the stone is rolled back, the crowd, men, women and even children, beg for pity and ask forgiveness for being alive.

Into this uncanny, grotesque, hysterical atmosphere steps Electra. Fired by what Orestes has told her about happy, sun-bathed towns elsewhere in Greece, she tells the crowd to throw off its burden of guilt. At first she is granted a hearing, for a brief time the assembled people listen hopefully. But she is no match for Zeus. Displaying his divine powers, he sends the stone that was supposed to bar the entrance to the underworld crashing against the steps of the temple built on the mountainside. Awed, the crowd turns against Electra.

In this sclerotic society, whose organization has, for fifteen years, been hardened from above, no change from inside seems possible. It is significant that it is through contact with Orestes that Electra becomes enterprising enough to attempt a change. But Electra's only arm was words, and her effort, though noble, seems inevitably futile. It is to a considerable extent through Electra that Orestes becomes fully involved in the affairs of Argos and commits himself to a course of action. He reveals his identity to her. Electra, bewildered by the disproportion between her expectations and the Orestes she sees before her, cannot at first conceal her disappointment. The change is not sudden, but now, more than ever, Orestes is conscious of his weightlessness in Argos or elsewhere. Bitterly regretful, he says that he barely exists, for he is ignorant of the deep passions of living men and women. He affirms that he wishes to belong fully to the town, that he wishes to draw it to him. Still unsure of himself, however, he tries to appeal to a higher authority. Zeus, lurking in the background, is only too glad to suggest that Orestes continue in the path of humility. At this, Orestes rebels; he realizes that he must commit himself, that it is he who must make a decision, and that, in the circumstances, there is only one course which can be followed.

It is significant that while Sartre dwells on the importance of Orestes' decision to kill Aegistheus and Clytemnestra—for this is his decision—he does not make any attempt to exploit fully the dramatic potential inherent in the confrontation between Orestes and his father's murderer. The decision is in fact followed at a very short interval by the act. On the other hand, by means of a scene in which Jupiter warns Aegistheus of the danger to his life, Sartre lays bare the workings of the latter's mind. Aegistheus too, though a ruler, is a victim of the image he has created for himself. Motivated by a love of order, all his actions have tended in that direction. Now, old and weary, the prey to some of the fears and superstitions for which he was himself responsible, he looks forward gladly to death; however, the thought that Orestes knows himself to be free can rouse him to indignation, for this freedom constitutes a threat to order.

Orestes' decision to commit himself by killing Aegistheus and Clytemnestra represents an idea at the very center of Sartre's philosophic reflection. In choosing, he in effect defines himself. Since his existence is represented only by the sum of his actions, he begins to exist in the fullest sense when he involves himself, and not before. Being the only person responsible for his action and its consequences, Orestes cannot appeal to any higher authority for justification or excuse. Orestes tells Zeus that he is the king of the gods but not the king of men. But in forging his identity, in falling back upon himself, Orestes is cutting himself off from other men. Free, Orestes becomes: this is his grandeur; yet, alone in the world, with his identity to create, he is condemned to be free.

Electra does not have the strength to follow Orestes. It is as though, in slaying Clytemnestra and Aegistheus, Orestes had taken away her one reason for living, her desire for vengeance. Zeus does not have much trouble in winning her over to the side of those who spend their lives in atonement. At the end of the play, Electra has become credulous, tractable, repentant.

The conclusion to the play does pose problems. In a speech to the people of Argos, Orestes claims that he has killed for their sake, to free them. He has taken over their burden of guilt, and they need no longer be afraid. Orestes leaves the city, pursued by the Erinyes, who will forever follow him. Sartre offers no explanation of where Orestes is going, or of what is to become of Argos. If he had, it is unlikely that one could have spoken of The Flies as an existentialist drama, which in fact it is. In posing the central question of engagement, this drama seems to prefigure virtually all of Sartre's postwar fiction.

Ruth Suckow is a regional writer by the double achievement of her Iowa stories and her critical thinking about regionalism itself. The two come together in The Folks to transcend literally and metaphorically the borders of one state and present a detailed record of one family which in its aspects of saga and allegory stands for all families. The novel presents with honesty and realism the virtues and vices of small-town America.

Ruth Suckow's neat scheme of father, mother, two girls, and two boys gives her the six parts of the novel, arranged in alternating long and short lengths. Each of the short parts is lyrical in tone, presenting a static but attractive picture of small-town and family life in the first and third parts, and a more somber view of American life in the fifth part, which, however, achieves a minor resolution of faith in the country as a whole in its conclusion. The alternating longer sections deal with the specific problems of the provincial boy, the provincial girl, and finally of the transformation of the Fergusons into "the folks." The novel explores the fullest meaning of that term by facing up to the difficulties of small-town existence in early twentieth century America, and it makes its point by using the four children to show four different problems, leaving Fred and Annie Ferguson to re-achieve small-town tranquility if they can at the close of the book. That Ruth Suckow convinces us they can and do achieve it is the triumph of the novel and its special relevance today.

The one problem in the structure of the novel stems from the careful balancing of old and young "folks" and of Belmond and the U.S.A. The first and last parts show how Annie and Fred begin as Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson and end as "the folks." To this end we follow not their lives but those of the four children in the four intervening parts. Each story fades away at the conclusion of the section as the child breaks away from home. None of the parts has as satisfactory an ending as that of "the folks," but each of the four stories contains ideas that could be developed into a full novel for each child. Such a technical problem is impossible to solve within the limits even of a long novel like The Folks unless one is prepared, as in the case of William Faulkner, to add a note about their careers as an epilogue. This device seems unnecessary here, for the merit of Ruth Suckow's handling of the family is that it is realistic. Every family has its rise and fall; the happiest are those growing clans which do have their own "home place" and "folks" to return to when they must.

Part I, "The Old Folks," opens early on the morning of a fine September day, the shimmering Indian summer atmosphere that fascinated Henry James and Katherine Mansfield and seemed to hold true among the best families anywhere in the calm that preceded World War I. But Ruth Suckow, like Henry James and Katherine Mansfield, can sense that trouble is brewing. The Presbyterian Fergusons must support their dwindling church and their ailing "old folks." The interaction of family and town is most obvious in Part III, "The Loveliest Time of the Year," a description of Dorothy's marriage to Jesse, the incredibly handsome boy from out of town. The lyricism of the first part is again present, but a note of stern realism is now creeping in: the young folks begin well but end badly.

The deceptively small concerns of daily living and the restrained style, concealing as they do at first glance the human implications of the accumulated events, are probably the reasons for dismissing The Folks as a regional Midwest novel. In fact, its setting is America from Greenwich Village to Los Angeles, and its cast is composed of Americans from many walks of life, from several different racial stocks, and over a spectrum of generations from Western pioneer to newly arrived immigrant.

The historical spectrum is analyzed in the story of Carl; the geographical and social scope is covered in the stories of Dorothy and Margaret; the racial picture is completed by Benjamin, nicknamed Bunny.

In Part V, "The Youngest," Fred and Annie Ferguson have seen all their children leave home and are now awaiting the return of Benjamin from college for the summer vacation. Aunt Ella and Uncle Ben Gardner, the salt of the earth or the provincial of the provincials, have retired from the Ferguson farm and live miserably in town. Benjamin arrives with a Charlotte Bukowska, whose parents were European peasants, as Ben and Ella are peasants in America. But Charlotte is also the new immigrant, as the Fergusons were years before.

The overwhelming problem of small-town life in America may be summarized from this novel as the decision whether to stay in the town of one's birth and eventually to turn into "the old folks," or to go out into the world. In The Folks, Carl and Margaret make their departures from the Ferguson nest but eventually return to make their peace with Belmond. Their crises come early in their lives. The crisis in the life of "the folks" comes in late middle-age, after the departure of Benjamin with Charlotte.

In a passionate scene with Fred, Annie reproaches him for all the failures concealed beneath the Belmond façade of "the fortunate Fergusons"; none of the four children has married modestly and settled quietly in Belmond, as Fred and Annie did. What is wrong with the children, with their parents? Then Annie realizes she has always been a stranger in Belmond, in the Ferguson clan, and when Fred announces his retirement from the bank the two decide to leave Belmond for a trip West in order to escape the harsh Iowa winter.

The time is the 1930's, or possibly the late 1920's, when hard times are beginning to be felt: the small-town aristocracy has collapsed in decadence; the young have fled to the city or gone West. When the Fergusons leave the bank, the church, the home place, and Belmond, it looks as if the town will collapse. But during their journey all the Fergusons find is discontent and restlessness in Annie's sister Louie, in old Mrs. Spencer, once a neighbor in Belmond, and most of all in "the great Iowa winter picnic," a gathering of exiles that causes "the folks" to reject the false and superficial pleasures of California and return to Belmond. The news from home is bad; the rival bank has failed and its president, Belmond's first citizen, has fled town. Worse is at hand when they get back. But this is where they belong, and they have their home to come back to. With the reunion of Belmond and the Fergusons, and the reconciliation of Fred and Annie to each other, they have become "the old folks" and their house the "home place" of the Fergusons. The story of the Belmond Fergusons ends in the tranquillity with which it began.

For both Carl and Margaret this resolution is particularly necessary, though each uses it in different ways. Part II, "The Good Son," covers about fifteen years in the life of Carl, the oldest of the younger Fergusons; he and Margaret, the older daughter, are treated at much fuller length than are Dorothy and Ben, the younger children, and the experiences of Carl and Margaret together summarize the life of the young provincial.

Part IV, "The Other Girl," is the longest in the novel and probably the autobiographical core of the whole book. Margaret is the provincial girl in full revolt, as is generally the situation of the girl on whom the small-town mores bear severely. It is a familiar situation, from Anne of Green Gables to The Rainbow, from Olive Schreiner to Doris Lessing, and Margaret eventually fights herself free of "the folks." The second chapter of Part IV, titled "Basement Apartment," describes Margaret's life and acquaintances in Greenwich Village, an animated and witty portrait of un-Belmond-like characters who, it turns out, are all in flight from a Belmond of their own. When Margaret's own rebellion ends, the way is clear for a younger generation to occupy easily the positions she fought for.

The merits of both staying in Belmond and leaving it are thus shown to be complementary, as they were in Ruth Suckow's life. The chief virtue of The Folks is that it shows how this struggle to achieve harmony takes place in the old as well as the young, and that both are right.

FOLKWAYS

Type of work: Political, sociological, and anthropological theory

Author: William Graham Sumner (1840-1910)

First published: 1907

Folkways, written by a professor of political and social science at Yale University, was one of the powerfully influential books on American thought during the first decade of the twentieth century. The book was an effort to soften the impact of and to justify the implications of Darwinian laissez faire philosophy. As such it was essentially conservative and ran against the growing tide of social and political agitation thrusting toward reform. Because it seemed to be so widely and deeply based on comparative anthropology and sociology, it appeared irrefutable. Consequently its prestige was immense.

Although apparently clear-headed and based on reality, the book often hides its head in mysticism. Pushing the theory that the community cannot bear any responsibility for the acts or welfare of individuals—that in the world of nature red in tooth and fang each individual must shift for himself or founder—Sumner insists that the origins of the community mind or soul or being, whichever one may call it, are shrouded in impene-trable mystery. These origins he calls folkways as a variant of mores.

He assumes that primitive man's first purpose in life is to live. The petty and individual acts of each person flow together eventually into patterns that then themselves exert controlling influence upon subsequent acts of various individuals in a group. These folkways, or mores, grow unconsciously, and because they are not purposeful and knowledgeable creations of man, they are largely unalterable. Only the upper layers are subject to change, and change comes slowly. Primitive societies are so constituted as to discourage innovation, variation, and development. In such societies prestige and political control rest with the elders who, having learned customs from their elders, in their turn enforce conformity and throttle liberty of action.

This suppression of change is commendable because the system works. The gradual development of improved folkways results from individual struggle for existence in the Darwinian sense, and the most effective struggle is that of "antagonistic cooperation," in which competition and combination alternate for a slow thrust forward. Failure to recognize this fact leads to various "socialistic fallacies."

Sumner's conservative philosophy is made clear. The folkways that have existed and worked are their own rationale and justification. They are "right" and they are "true." Because they are both correct and valid they are not subject to examination and verification. Individual "rights" are those rules imposed upon members of the "in-group" to make the society viable and peaceful. Therefore Sumner concludes, in a philosophy running counter to one of the great American political tenets, there is no such thing as "natural" or "God-given" or "absolute" rights.

Folkways exist on two levels, like two ocean currents running in the same direction but at different velocities. The lower consists of the masses of people. They are the real bearers of folkways. The people are suggestible, easily influenced and controlled by the mores. They never change their customs. The classes are the upper and faster current. It is they who produce variations and account for whatever progress is made in the folkways. It is a fallacy to conclude that there is any mystical or occult wisdom residing in either class. The masses are not wise merely because they are the majority. Both classes must co-operate for their mutual good. But neither has a superior right to control society.

But inequality is both natural and beneficial. Masses of equal men can never progress beyond the stage of savagery. Sumner disagrees completely with the eighteenth century belief in the Noble Savage and the bliss of the state of Nature. On the contrary, men in a natural state would be equal, static in their society, and would ultimately be enslaved. Masses of men if they are not to be scattered and made weak and finally destroyed must be allowed opportunities to achieve their societal coherence by means of organization, leadership, and discipline.

All civilized societies have at least three levels. At the lowest is a dead weight of ignorance, disease, poverty, and crime. Above it is the "middle section," which interacts with the political institutions of a democracy such as the church, the press and public libraries, and reacts to them. This section of people partially controls the folkways because leaders in a democracy must cater to these people's tastes. This section would in fact rule the society if it were organized independently, but it never is. Education of the masses contains an error in thinking. The process of education is long and involved. It is not democratic because it assumes lack of equality between teacher and persons taught.

Therefore it works out only in the extension of popular interests and the establishment of popular prejudices.

Folkways are practically unchangeable by revolution. Forms of government may change on the top. A monarchy can be changed into a republic, but not the folk mind and practices. Levels of society are turned upside down and permanently altered. The folk return eventually to their ways. The folk recognize that some people must be aristocrats, a ruling class or classes. These aristocrats are those in any society that are distinguished. Their lives, habits, and leadership give direction to all movements and progression. The folk, recognizing this fact, repudiate the old eighteenth century notions of their perfectibility and laugh at the philosophers who preached such nonsense. These people recognize that they are incapable of thinking, that it is only the elite in any group who think and account for any progress made.

One example of progress is the institution of slavery. It was begun by leaders when they recognized that it was more humanitarian to enslave their war victims than to kill them. Slavery was good, for it taught steady labor to the slave, relieved the owner of hard work, and brought the slave into the "in-group" for which he worked. Slavery also demonstrated the human characteristic of the strong desiring to dominate the weak. Slavery in primitive societies was the one way in which the Darwinian thesis of the survival of the fittest was effected.

Though physical bondage may be eliminated, "slavery," at least as a point of reference never can be. There are certain burdens of life from which man can never free himself. Political institutions may control, direct, and redistribute these burdens, but bondage to the human conditions of life can never be abolished.

Thus it is with life in general. Various forces work to control and direct our ways of life, moving glacier-like and slowly, altering imperceptibly or not at all. All are controlled by the sheer weight of the mass on which the surface rests. It is perhaps unfair to say that life is the best that could be, but it must be said that whatever ways of life we have are the only ones that exist.

It is perhaps easy to see why Sumner's Folkways had a great impact on the thinking of early twentieth century America. It is direct, honest, candid, and strengthened by an overwhelming display of facts. But the facts are often used as springboards to hasty and illogical conclusions. Often the conclusions are unwarrantable. Further there is a slyness, an insinuation about Sumner's style of presentation. Often it is the reader who is invited to draw inferences that are only hinted at in the text. Finally, there was an articulation of social and political philosophy that was appealing to many Americans: that which rationalized and justified exploitation of the weak, that resisted the thrusts of social amelioration, that which gave cause for a re-echoing of the poet Alexander Pope that whatever is, is right.

FONTAMARA

Author: Ignazio Silone (1900-)

Time: 1930

Locale: Fontamara, a village in southern Italy

First published: 1933

Principal characters:

BERARDO VIOLA, the leader of the Fontamaran peasants, martyred by Fascists

ELVIRA LA TINTORA, Berardo's sweetheart

THE PROMOTER, the unnamed Fascist governor of the region

PEPPINO GORIANO, the "Hero of Porta Pia," a reporter of national decay

THE UNKNOWN HAND, a revolutionary and the organizer of the peasants

THE NARRATOR, an unnamed peasant,

HIS WIFE, and

HIS SON, refugees from Fontamara

Although Fontamara has merit as a first novel, it is best regarded as the background for Ignazio Silone's great novel of 1937, Bread and Wine. Silone was able to move from a thesis novel to a novel of character, from a novel resembling a political tract to one encompassing broader human concerns. Fontamara reveals Silone's political concerns, and at times the novel seems but a cry; but it affords him neither a philosophical, a social, nor an artistic solution to his problem and the problem of Italy under Fascism. The book ends on the unanswered question of future action possible for the terrorized peasants, but in Bread and Wine the answer is to be found in the strength of the humanity and the truth of the heart of the hero and those who come under his influence. In Fontamara, Berardo Viola is sacrificed, murdered by the Fascists. Pietro Spina, in Bread and Wine, also disappears, ascending to the mountains in an obvious Christlike manner, the message he leaves behind is clear and powerful. Pietro combines Berardo and the Unknown Hand, both the humanity and the revolutionary force, and in doing so he becomes more compellingly human than either character in this earlier work.

The setting for both books is similar. Fontamara is a town in southern Italy that up to the point of the story has remained unchanged for centuries. Its poverty and its exploitation have seemed to be eternal and almost the natural condition of its inhabitants. The villagers have accepted poverty as a way of life, their only pleasure and dream being the little land they own or the possibility of escape to America. As the story opens the naturalness of this condition has vanished. The drying up of Lake Fucino has left the district arid and the course of the small stream that gives water to the peasants' land has been changed. With the disruption of nature, the peasants begin to protest. Silone, in his concern for the natural and physical truths of life that are linked to the soil, has a way of reducing the most complex political and social issues to what is elemental in them. He makes revolution seem the natural solution for these peasants who are plunged from a life of hardship to one of despair. At the beginning of the novel the electricity has been shut off in the village. The search for light in this dark world of Fascism and personal greed leads the peasants along the road of social revolution.

The story of the town and its destruction is told by three narrators, a nameless peasant, his wife, and his son. They represent the Italy of the past, the present, and the future, and they tell the story of Fontamara to Silone in Switzerland. Their point of view and the simplicity with which it is revealed are very important to the overall effect of the book. They record but cannot remedy. Often they seem to be straw figures who simply transmit Silone's political polemic. And yet in their narration there is the hint of the strength of being able to survive and overcome that political tyranny and social injustice which Silone explores more fully in Bread and Wine. Their narrative is characterized by touches of wry humor and unconscious irony stemming from their lack of sense in a world gone mad. They are among the peasants who are constantly being duped by the townspeople. For example, they are told that the Promoter, that nameless mechanistic bricklayer of the new society, is to have three-fourths of the stream water and that they are to have three-fourths of what is left. Hearing of this division they think the arrangement gives half the water to each side. Yet they are stoically objective as they talk about themselves in retrospect, and their gullibility does not ridicule them as much as it shows the decay and corruption of those exploiting them.

As they recount their struggle, it soon becomes clear that, for Silone, Fontamara has become a microcosm for the Fascist takeover of all of Italy: first the lack of lights, then the diverting of the stream, then the curfew, the necessity for papers, the forbidding of free speech, and finally, in one chilling scene, the entry of the blackshirts while the men of the village are away and the rape of all the women left behind. All Italy has been raped and the indignation the book would like to arouse in the citizenry is very much like that of the wronged husbands. As a microcosm, the issues are perhaps a little too simply defined. Although one feels uncomfortable about reducing all fascist control to the level of changing the courses of streams and the payment of more chickens to the exploiters, one can still see the movement toward a symbolism that is more religious and more universal in Bread and Wine.

In a book where the issues seem more important than their human embodiment, the village of Fontamara appears as the real hero. Because no characters are fully developed, it is what Fontamara stands for that really seems to count. The town is raped, not the women. When the sacristan hangs himself from the bellrope in the church, one does not feel that a man has died as much as one feels that the religious faith of the town has gone. When Peppino Goriano, the "Hero of Porta Pia", the local boy who had gone to Rome and returned a broken man, speaks, he does not chronicle the development of a human being as much as the social and political change in Italy as a whole. He seems no more real than the "Unknown Hand" who is an idealistic cross between a student and a worker, and yet it is Peppino who is the teller of the human condition. In this novel one sign of the artistic immaturity is the fact that he seems more a witness than a participant.

Although the village seems to be the real hero, there is an attempt to make ■ hero out of Berardo Viola. Ultimately, however, he is more martyr than hero. He plays a role in the revolutionary scheme of things of which he is not very much aware. Berardo is the natural leader of the village, a physical giant who is the epitome of the wise peasant who sees things simply and thus, in Silone's terms, clearly and well. There is some attempt to trace a development in his character as he is led beyond himself to full commitment in the peasants' cause. At the beginning of the novel he is bitter and morose, having sold his land to go to America but because of restrictions unable to leave the country. As a peasant without land he feels he is the lowest man in the village and his marriage with Elvira la Tintora, a dyer, seems an impossibility to him. This personal need for property is something Silone intimates he must overcome. Through most of the book, however, Berardo refuses to accept his position as leader of the peasants because he feels the need for personal survival. With the son of the old man who narrates most of the story, Berardo goes to Rome in quest of money. There he meets all the perversions and corruptions that Peppino Goriano has spoken of. Robbed by men who pretend to help him and unable to find work, he begins to starve. He meets the Unknown Hand, who feeds him and is arrested with him. In jail Berardo undergoes a great transformation. The Unknown Hand makes a revolutionary of him in night-long conversations and Berardo confesses to the police that he is the Unknown Hand so that the real one can go free. He has learned that Elvira has died and her death seems to prompt in him the expression of freedom through responsibility for others that the reader saw operating in him from the beginning of the story. Because he does not die for himself but for another, his new testament is spread all over Italy. With the help of the Unknown Hand the peasants of Fontamara begin a newspaper, indicating that their concern for only what affects them individually has been widened into a communal concern. The book ends with them in a state of awareness but with no solution. This is shown in their search for a name for their paper. They reject titles such as "Truth" or "Justice" and finally settle on "What Must We Do?"

The scene in which the writing of the newspaper takes place is a good one to illustrate why this novel escapes being merely a political tract with a sentimental optimism. What keeps the book from being so is the control achieved by the point of view of the narration and the broad humor that is present even in the most emotional of circumstances. This scene could easily have become a sentimental eulogy over Berardo. Instead we are told about the problem and debate caused by the peasants' uncertainty about whether Berardo Viola should be spelled with one or two l's. Silone stands outside the debate and exercises some control over his material. Knowing what the peasant is like, he never makes the mistake of seeing him as a depersonalized proletariat, and usually he avoids oversentimentalizing him as well. Although the novel has not achieved fully developed characters, it begins to move from politics to humanity. This concern, which is also the concern of André Malraux in France at this time and whose Man's Fate bears very interesting parallels, especially in the jail scenes, with Fontamara, is what makes Silone's first novel worth reading. The more mature and artistic statement of this concern are qualities that make Silone's next novel, Bread and Wine, one of the great novels of the twentieth century.

A FOOL'S ERRAND

Type of work: Novel

Author: Albion W. Tourgée (1838-1905)

Type of plot: Polemical realism

Time of plot: 1865-1877

Locale: Rockford County in a Southern state

First published: 1879

Principal characters:

COMFORT SERVOSSE (THE "FOOL"), a Yankee ex-soldier

METTA SERVOSSE, his wife

LILY SERVOSSE, their only child

NATHANIEL HYMAN, the county attorney

JERRY HUNT, an old Negro church leader

MELVILLE GURNEY, a former Klan member and the suitor of Lily

Critique:

With stilted dialogue, melodramatic scenes, and chapter-long interruptions for commentary by the author, this novel of Reconstruction days in the South lacks the literary value of craft. But vivid descriptions of Klan violence and a sternly impassioned central character, the "Fool," help to sustain interest. The chief value of the book is its interest as social history:

the viewpoint of a Northern lawyer and Civil War veteran who tries unsuccessfully to make the South his home, befriending the freedmen and alienating the defeated and angry whites. Only gradually does Comfort Servosse come to a full and discouraging understanding of the Southern mind. He pessimistically foresees no reuniting of the nation for generations. Even to the extent of ■ French name, the protagonist Servosse is Tourgée himself, whose own life paralleled many of the experiences recounted.

The Story:

In 1861, Comfort Servosse went off to the Civil War as a volunteer. This, in retrospect, was his first action as an idealistic "fool." At twenty-seven, he gave up a thriving Michigan law practice and a comfortable home. He considered it his duty to help fight against the wrong of slavery.

When the war ended he was a colonel. He came back home to his wife Metta and daughter Lily. His war exertions had worn him out. Seeking a genial climate and not wanting to rebuild his law practice, he decided to move to the South and begin life afresh. Now that slavery was destroyed, the South was sure to flourish and become the pleasantest part of the country.

He bought the Warrington estate, a place Servosse had admired while stationed nearby. It was dilapidated, and the six hundred acres of land were worn out; but the price was cheap.

Located six miles from Verdenton, a small town, Warrington proved both ■ challenge and reward. The Servosses made extensive repairs. They found the countryside charming. The people seemed congenial. For Thanksgiving dinner they invited six Northern girls who taught at a new colored school. The county judge, Squire Hyman, paid a visit soon thereafter and gave friendly notice that local residents disapproved of the teachers. Colonel Servosse sarcastically replied that his dinner guests were his own affair. The Verdenton newspaper labeled him a fanatical abolitionist.

Undaunted, Servosse established a Sunday school for the Negroes. He also cut up most of his estate into ten- and twenty-acre plots to sell to Negroes, so that they could become self-sufficient property owners. The Servosses hoped the foolish prejudice of the townspeople would pass.

One summer day an outdoor political meeting took place. There was a debate over the right of Negroes to testify in court. Servosse attended only out of curiosity, but the people saw him and forced him to speak. His ideas were not secret, but he had never before intruded them on anyone. Now he publicly told the Southerners to give political rights to literate, property-owning Negroes before the nation lost its patience. It was a bold and unpopular opinion.

Riding home, he encountered old Jerry Hunt, a Negro, who warned him that some angry white men were planning to ambush and whip him because of his speech. Servosse turned the tables on the conspirators, one of whom was injured. He reached home safely.

The next day three Negroes were accused of murdering the injured man, Savage, even though his body had not been found. They were indicted by Judge Hyman and threatened with lynching. But Servosse stood up and said that Savage was alive and at Warrington. The charges were dropped. Soon thereafter Squire Hyman, a bit more open-minded than his neighbors, called on Servosse to talk. He admitted that perhaps the North had not really been vindictive. The war had occurred because neither side had understood the other.

But such talk was useless. Servosse's speech marked him as an abolitionist and agitator. Negroes were beaten. After Servosse received an illiterate threatening letter, he bought arms and ammunition for his family and his Negro tenants and watched the town grow more hostile.

Christmas, 1866, came and went. At a Negro prayer meeting the Servosses observed Jerry Hunt undergoing a mystical experience.

Meanwhile the child Lily was growing and displaying marked intelligence. But it seemed for the young girl that no local friendships, except with Negroes, could ever be established.

Servosse lent support to the local Union League. He saw it as a training school in political responsibility for the freedmen. To his neighbors it was a league of carpetbaggers and Negroes united against the defeated Southern whites.

A constitutional convention was soon to meet. Servosse was unaware that people considered him the leader of local Unionist sentiment. Attending the meeting of Unionists to nominate delegates, he found himself chosen. He issued a frank statement of his principles, and from that day he was ostracized in the region where he had hoped to make his home. The first point on his statement said: "Equal civil and political rights to all men."

Immediately Servosse received letters from the radical Republicans in the Senate. They demanded speedy reconstruction of the state government under the freed Negroes and the Southern Unionists. Servosse argued that this measure would only keep the nation further divided because the government would be incompetent and the former white leaders would again rebel. But the "Wise Men" of the Senate got their way. Servosse viewed the future with great dismay.

In the winter of 1868-1869 his prediction of unrest was fulfilled. Bob Martin, a Negro, came to Warrington one day and told of a visitation the night before by thirty black-gowned horsemen. They had whipped Martin, abused his wife and daughter, and killed his infant. Local law officers said nothing could be done about the Klan. Letters to the colonel told of Klan atrocities all over the state; local incidents continued.

Now the white residents of the county, attempting to regain political control, held a mass meeting at the courthouse. John Walters, one of the outspoken Unionists of the county, attended the meeting to take notes. He did not return home. The next morning his body was found in a courthouse office. Later a Negro servant told Servosse that the men who had threatened Walters and then killed him were respectable citizens of the community. News of this crime was all that Uncle Jerry Hunt could take. At a Negro prayer meeting he suddenly stopped the service, told the details of the crime, and named the kidnapers. The following Saturday several hundred Klansmen lynched him on the courthouse lawn. Again, the mob was made up of respectable citizens.

When Servosse wrote a letter asking for federal intervention in the terror-ridden county, his request was denied; the principle of states rights and local government had to be maintained. The reign of terror went on. The Klan was the law, and through it the Old South now triumphed. Meanwhile the North deluded itself, thinking Reconstruction was complete and effective.

As the years passed Lily Servosse grew to womanhood. Melville Gurney, the son of a Confederate general, was torn between Lily and his father's stern principles. One day, while her father was in another part of the county with District Attorney Denton, a warning message came to Lily. The Klan was to intercept Judge Denton on his way home and burn him to death on a railroad trestle. Riding desperately to warn the two men, Lily happened upon a Klan rendezvous at a crossroads. In hurrying away she encountered one of their lookouts and fired a shot at him. It was Melville Gurney.

After warning her father and the judge, she returned home with them. Melville's friend Burleson came along also, and publicly repudiated the Klan, making it easier for Melville to do the same, and thus hopefully to win Lily. For Melville had recognized Lily and had covered for her while she escaped. Burleson's defection was the first of many. The Klan was no longer necessary. The state legislatures issued general pardons for all their heinous crimes.

By 1877 the feeble Reconstruction governments had thus fallen completely into the hands of the old secessionists. It was as Comfort Servosse had predicted. Looking back over the years, he began to understand, if not approve of, the Southern point of view. He saw the Southern genius for leadership reassert itself. He had had his fill of politics. With his neighbors once again running things to their satisfaction, they became more friendly. Reversal to the old status quo of the years before the war had been inevitable.

Melville Gurney, pursuing his courtship, won Colonel Servosse's approval of this. Because Melville's father remained opposed, Lily refused Gurney until his father should approve. Mr. Gurney was on the verge of relenting when Comfort Servosse decided to close up Warrington. Lily would go North to study, and the colonel would attend to other business affairs. Melville Gurney followed her north.

One day Colonel Servosse visited Dr. Martin, the retired president of his college. For the last time he surveyed his difficult years in the South. The struggle between North and South had only just begun, he told Dr. Martin sadly, and it had been a fool's errand to try to rebuild the South in the image of the North. Just as matters were before the war, the South would soon dominate and control the nation. Her people were united and they were born rulers. Like the Israelites, the Negroes needed a prophet to arise and bring them out of slavery. The nation would have to educate the Negro and the poor white, and the power of states rights would have to be crushed. All would be the work of generations.

Colonel Servosse returned briefly to Warrington after a year, intending a brief stay before taking up a managerial post in Central America. He died at Warrington of yellow fever. Before his death he wrote his own epitaph and called himself a "Fool."

FRANNY AND ZOOEY

Type of work: Novel

Author: J. D. Salinger (1919-)

Time: November, 1955

Locale: Principally New York City

First published: 1961

Principal characters:

FRANNY GLASS, a sensitive college English-major and actress

LANE COUTELL, her pseudo-intellectual boyfriend

ZOOEY GLASS, her brother, an abrasive television actor

BUDDY GLASS, her oldest brother, a writer

BESSIE GLASS, her compassionate mother

Franny and Zooey is J. D. Salinger's third book, coming ten years after his novel of adolescence, The Catcher in the Rye, was received with acclaim, and eight years after Nine Stories further demonstrated his compassion for the sensitive and disturbed, his fine sense of satiric humor, his penchant for discursive first-person narration, and his growing interest in spiritual salvation in the modern world. The two episodes presented are parts of a larger design still in its developing stage; and the characters named in the title are sister and brother, members of a family with whom Salinger has dealt for some time, both before and after his notable success and pursuit of privacy combined to make him one of the most celebrated of contemporary American writers.

Franny and Zooey are the children of Les and Bessie Gallagher Glass, former vaudevillians (Jewish and Irish, respectively) and long-time residents of Manhattan. Franny is a college girl and Zooey is a successful television actor of twenty-five; together they are the youngest children of a family that once numbered five boys and two girls. Like the rest (most of whom were child quiz program performers), they are prodigies. More than that, she is beautiful and he is saved from being dazzlingly handsome only by a slightly protruding ear. Despite these advantages, Zooey has an ulcer, Franny has an incipient nervous breakdown, and both have a sense of profound dissatisfaction with the world, with men, and with themselves. Franny's difficulties, which are the more severe, form the central concern of the book. They are set forth first as we see her arrival for an Ivy League football game and what proves to be a disastrous and abortive weekend. Her date, Lane Coutell, epitomizes the self-centered pseudo-intellectual qualities which have caused her to become hypersensitive to those around her, to withdraw from drama and allied activities, and to seek grace and sustenance in the "Jesus Prayer" (from a devotional book called The Way of a Pilgrim) consisting of the phrase, "Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me." But it is ineffectual as she repeats it at the end of the segment bearing her name, while recovering from a fainting spell in the restaurant to which Lane had taken her for lunch.

The Zooey section, set on the following Monday in November of 1955 in the Glasses' New York apartment, begins to reveal the fundamental causes of both breakdown and ulcer. The early education of Franny and Zooey had been supervised by the eldest children: Seymour, a Ph.D. in his teens who had committed suicide in 1948 at the age of thirty-one, and Buddy, a self-alleged neurotic serving as writer-in-residence at a girls' junior college and as narrator of the "Zooey" section. It had been a program designed to inculcate religious and philosophical knowledge before that of the other disciplines conventionally studied by children. The texts were not only the Testaments but also the Upanishads, the Diamond Sutra, the writings of Zen and Mahayana Buddhism, of Laotse and Sri Ramakrishna, of Eckhart and Kierkegaard. Zooey tells Franny, that their training had turned them into freaks at an early age, with their standards freakish as well—like the Tattooed Lady who wanted everyone else to look like her. Franny's discontent is objectified in her cry that she is sick and tired of ego—always ego—her own and everyone's. As she sees its manifestations in Lane Coutell and her professors, so Zooey sees them in his television associates. Exhorting her, and then telephoning her (on Buddy's telephone in Seymour's old room) with his voice disguised as Buddy's, he tries to show her detachment is the one thing that matters in religious affairs. Finally, as he restores some measure of her self-confidence and emphasizes the need to give love to others, she achieves a kind of peace resembling the satori of Zen and drifts into sleep.

The first section of Salinger's book is much the better done of the two. Here he is in control of his material and presents it economically. The second section, however—even granting that it is spoken in the voice of Buddy Glass, brother of the principals, and intimately concerned with their problems—is by contrast prolix and diffuse, at its worst arch and even cute. It demonstrates the consequences of forgetting Henry James's dictum often repeated to himself: dramatize, always dramatize. And when Buddy Glass does render action, it takes the form of conversation—between Zooey and Franny or Zooey and his mother—as in a sixty-eight page passage (surely the longest in modern literature set in a bathroom) between the latter two. Henry James's great contemporary, Joseph Conrad, wrote that the novelist's primary task was above all to make his reader see. As if striving doubly hard for concrete visual effects in what he argues is not a mystical story or even one mystifying in a religious sense, Salinger includes much description, but it is description which often, unhappily, takes the form of a lengthy catalogue of the contents of the bathroom medicine chest, Bessie Glass's kimono pockets, the furnishings of the living room, or the aphorisms inscribed on the inside of the door of Buddy's room—two pages' worth being quoted in the text. This looseness of form is also seen in the use of a long footnote and two letters (the letter being, like the diary excerpt, a favorite Salinger device), one of which covers twelve pages.

Early in "Zooey," Buddy writes that the work is not so much a story as a homemade movie in prose, and that Bessie, Zooey, and Franny have advised against making it public. One wishes their misgivings had led the author to edit or reshoot some of his "footage." The long letter which Zooey rereads is described by its sender, Buddy, as being seemingly unending, self-indulgent, opinionated, repetitious, patronizing, even embarrassing. It is also, he adds, surfeited with affection. All of the latter comment—and much of the former—applies to "Zooey."

This novel is the strongest—one might almost say obsessive—embodiment thus far of Salinger's interest in the individual's quest for spiritual advancement. What the work needs, unrealized in Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters and Seymour, An Introduction, is assimilation of the impact upon his particular sensibility of this subject matter to an extent which will again make possible the subtle control and command that mark his best work in The Catcher in the Rye and several of the tales in Nine Stories.

FREE FALL

Type of work: Novel

Author: William Golding (1911-)

Time: The 1920's to World War II

Locale: England and a German prison camp

First published: 1959

Principal characters:

SAMMY MOUNTJOY, the narrator, an artist
 BEATRICE IFOR, a young woman whom he seduced
 NICK SHALES, a science teacher
 MISS ROWENA PRINGLE, a Bible teacher JOHNNY SPRAGGE and PHILIP ARNOLD, Sammy's schoolfellows

V. S. Pritchett has called William Golding the most promising of English novelists. Frank Kermode thinks him the most significant figure in the English novel since the 1920's. Philip Toynbee has announced that he is a writer to be examined with scrupulous interest and respect and one to be criticized only on the highest level. Mr. Golding himself has said that he sees little point at all in writing novels unless he can do something that he did not think he could do or which nobody else has tried before.

Under the circumstances anything that this writer attempts is likely to be viewed with sharper attention than most reviewers give the average novel. This was the case in English literary circles in the autumn of 1959, when Free Fall was published. Few novels of recent years have received a better advance press or have been awaited with keener anticipation. There was considerable disappointment, therefore, and some surprise when the word out of England was that the novel did not live up to the expectations that the previous performances of Golding gave critics and readers every right to expect. The book's reception in this country early in 1960 turned out to be considerably less severe. Generally, American critics praised the writer for his vigor of imagination and expert technical control in a work of considerable moral implication and symbolic proportion.

The response to Golding's novel on this side of the Atlantic poses an interesting problem: are Americans better conditioned to novels of existential themes, moral ambiguity, prophetic vision, philosophical weight, experimental structures, and a style richly textured by imagery and metaphor? This question is asked not to provoke a controversy but to suggest that Golding stands closer to William Faulkner or Robert Penn Warren or Saul Bellow, say, than to the tradition of the English novel. Like these writers, he is apocalyptic rather than social in his effects, and he exhibits in his fiction a central theme which he has been extending and elaborating from book to book until the whole pattern is beginning to take shape at last. His subject is immense: the Fall and the bitter fruits of lost innocence. Each of his books has been in effect a point of reference where these great coordinates intersect with hairline precision on the graph of man's fate. For this reason Free Fall cannot be discussed, as many critics tried to do, apart from Mr. Golding's larger design. The novel is a continuation—almost a culmination—of everything that he had written before.

William Golding had published three novels before Free Fall appeared. Of these, the best known is Lord of the Flies, a savagely ironic fable which reversed the subject matter and theme of R. M. Ballantyne's nineteenth century success, The Coral Island. In Ballantyne's romantic story a group of young English castaways exhibit the most admirable traits of the public school tradition—courage, quickness of imagination, teamwork, pluck, and passionate sympathy. Golding's account is exactly the opposite. His youngsters, survivors of a plane crash while being evacuated during an atomic war, quickly revert to the ruthless law of the jungle. The story is not only an account of the way in which man returns to his primitive state when the restraints of civilization are removed; it is also an extended metaphor of the Garden and man's fall from his state of innocence and unsought grace. The Inheritors is another excursion into the primitive and a period removed in time. This novel deals with the last of "the people," a tribe of Neanderthal men, wiped out by "the others" who have invaded their hunting ground. These "others" are the human clan, already marked as homo sapiens by their powers of reason and therefore conscious of their propensity for evil. In these novels sin and guilt are shown as inherent in the nature of man.

The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin—its English title was Pincher Martin—is a story of fallen man brought to judgment. Christopher Martin is a naval officer engaged in a grim struggle for survival after his ship has been sunk by a submarine in the North Atlantic. His refuge is a solitary rock in the ocean waste. His struggle is twofold: between extinction and survival on the one hand, salvation and damnation on the other. For in the course of his wretched life Christopher (the Christ-bearer) has become Pincher, the liar, the thief, the impenitent. His experience on the rock shows that in his struggle to survive—metaphorically, to be saved—reason and intelligence are not enough.

These three novels examine the human condition under as many different lights. The isolation of each case by space or by time is deliberate, for in them Golding's chief concern is not the relationship of man to man but man to himself and to the presence of evil as inseparable from the human consciousness and will. Lord of the Flies deals with the absence of innocence, The Inheritors with man's relationship of guilt to the pre-human past, The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin with his relation to the life to come. In addition, each of these novels relies upon a "gimmick"—the term is Mr. Golding's—for its final effect. At the end of each there is a surprising reversal of the point of view or the introduction of an unexpected metaphor in the light of which everything that has gone before must be reviewed and reinterpreted. In Lord of the Flies the boys are rescued as the result of undergrowth set afire during a murderous manhunt, a situation which a British officer fails to understand in its true light, seeing it only as a childish game. The Inheritors ends with a switch from the point of view of "the people" to that of "the others," the guilty destroyers of innocence. In The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin the gimmick is the discovery that the dead man is still wearing his sea boots when his body washes ashore: his struggle for survival has been only a fleeting series of images in a drowning man's mind.

The position of these three points on the graph point inevitably to the fourth, the theme of man's relationship to man developed in Free Fall. The opening paragraphs, rich in imagery, set the tone, images intended to reveal the contrast between the rationalistic world of "statistical probability" and the world of sin, remorse, and salvation suggested by the ecclesiastical purple and white, the shepherd's crook, the beam of divine light falling like fire, the pentecostal vision. These meanings may not be clear at the start, for their true significance cannot be interpreted until after the narrator has undergone a transforming experience in a Nazi prison camp and emerges into the light of day once more. But in the light of Mr. Golding's conclusion they give harmony and proportion to the novel as Sammy Mountjoy reviews the course of his life and tries to determine the point at which he fell, the occasion of that decision, freely made, which cost him his freedom.

The story is told in a series of flashbacks, brilliantly presented, in which Sammy Mountjoy, a successful artist, traces his life from its beginning in an anarchic Kentish slum to his moment of revelation. Chronology is distorted but never arbitrarily or with self-indulgence, for the events of Sammy's life are not important in the order in which they happened but only as their meaning is disclosed. He never knew a father and his mother was a drunken prostitute. A tainted priest rescued him from the sordid surroundings of his childhood after he had desecrated a church altar. His school-day friends were Johnny Spragge and Philip Arnold. (Johnny, he realizes years later, was a young tough protected by his own hard innocence, but Philip was evil because he acted out of reasoned cunning, not healthy instinct.) Like another youthful Samuel, Sammy mistook his vocation, found his spiritual parents in Nick Shales, a science teacher, and a Bible teacher, Miss Rowena Pringle (whom he rejected), studied art, seduced his first love, abandoned her and married another, was a member of the Communist Party for a time, went off to war and in a German prison camp came near betraying a plot to escape. At the end of each episode he asks himself if this is the point at which he lost his freedom, fell from grace. The answer is always a flat no.

He finally realizes that the point of his fall was not in his childhood, for young Sammy Mountjoy had no choice; but by the time he seduced Beatrice he had already given himself to guilt. The knowledge he seeks comes to him in a scene of shocking power after a Gestapo psychologist has threatened him with torture and ordered him locked in a dark cell to soften him up for betrayal. There he undergoes agonies of terror because his imagination transforms a harmless object left on the floor into a dismembered sex organ—symbol of his own carnality—and he finds in his terror his own severance from the world of moral reality and responsibility. Released from the lightless cell, he goes out into the world of men, with the ironic apology of a Nazi official, the statement that the psychologist does not know about people, ringing in his ears.

He is then able to realize that the moment of his fall came when he decided to possess Beatrice Ifor, thus abandoning his concern for others and using them for his own selfish ends. Dante had found in the image of Beatrice an illuminative vision of the possible in man. Sammy Mountjoy had made his Beatrice the object of his lust. A further revelation comes when Sammy visits the mental institution where Beatrice is a patient and learns that he can never know whether he caused her madness or whether, as the doctor suggests, he may have given her an extra period of sanity before her mind clouded over. All he knows is that the girl is both Beatrice, the spiritual vision he denied, and Miss Ifor, the creature shaped by his selfishness and pride. Given the chance to live by his vision, he had chosen a world of calculation and force. That was his moment of error, not the deed itself but the failure to recognize the relation of man to man—not to be viewed as an irrelevance but as the forge in which change and value are shaped to some good or evil design.

Golding makes no concessions to his readers. Free Fall is a powerful fable of the duality of man, impressive in spite of the flaw to which criticism has already pointed. For Sammy Mountjoy is both protagonist and commentator, and in his sin of despair he denies what the novel itself affirms, the gift of mercy and grace to the undeserving. Although not perfectly achieved as a whole, Free Fall is nevertheless tremendously moving and meaningful in its parts. A partial failure by William Golding can be more illuminating and instructive than many a writer's best.

FREEDOM OR DEATH

Author: Nikos Kazantzakis (1885-1957)

Time: 1889

Locale: Megalokastro (now Neraklion), Crete

First published: 1956

Principal characters:

CAPTAIN MICHALES, "Captain Wildboar," the principal rebel

CAPTAIN POLYXIGIS, a rival Cretan

NURI BEY, a Turk, Michales' "blood brother"

EMINÉ, a Circassian girl, Nuri Bey's wife

THE PASHA OF MEGALOKASTRO, the leader of the Turks

THE METROPOLITAN OF MEGALOKASTRO, the Greek religious leader

KOSMAS, the son of Michales' brother Kosta

NOËMI (CHRYSLA), Kosmas' wife

SEFAKAS, Michales' father

MANUSAKAS, one of Michales' brothers

TITYROS, another brother

KATERINA, Michales' wife

THRASAKI, Michales' son

RENIO, his daughter

VANGELIO, Tityros' wife

DIAMANDES, Vangelio's brother

Cretans and Turks stride through this book like giants; but the Cretans are the heroes—wild, hard-drinking, desperately loving, freedom-dedicated men, fighting to the death against their Turkish oppressors.

Above all the characters in the book towers the figure of Captain Michales; he bows to no one and has regard for no one once he becomes convinced that he must die for Crete. His daughter is a stranger to him; his wife cannot call him back from the mountains where he fights his last battle; the Metropolitan cannot move him, and God Himself—if He is not for Crete—is no god to Michales. There is only one moment in his history when Michales is diverted from his dedication to Crete. While defending a monastery against the Turkish invaders, he hears that a woman who has fatally fascinated him, Eminé, has been captured by the Turks. With a small band of fighters he leaves the monastery and rescues her; but knowing how her charm might keep him from his military duties, he refuses to look at her. Nevertheless, he has erred, and he pays for his deed.

When Michales makes a last stand with seven other inspired Cretan rebels against a horde of Turks after all the other Cretans have accepted the order to lay down their arms, his action is understandable after the reader has seen proof of Michales' fantastic devotion to freedom and to death. For years the Cretan motto has been "Freedom or Death!" Even the city bells bear these names; and the old grandfather, Sefakas, injures himself mortally while painting these words on the walls in Megalokastro. But on the last day of his life, as he waits for the attack that he knows will mean death to himself and his companions, Michales—believing that revolt and death are always worth while, even though not sufficient in the present case for victory—shouts his patriotic slogan. As he charges the enemy, holding aloft the severed head of his nephew Kosmas, he roars out the first two words of his war cry. Death itself, as his brain is exploded by a bullet, ends the sentence.

Another Greek, Aristotle, long ago defined the tragic hero as one who, better than most, nevertheless meets an inevitable end because of the fatal consequences of some moral flaw. The power of tragedy derives from the relentless building of the drama toward that last moment of defeat; the audience pities the hero and shares the fear of being mortal and therefore liable to error and to death. In following the course of Michales' last months, this peculiar Greek power of tragedy makes itself known in comparatively modern terms. Perhaps one can say that Michales' tragic flaw is his devotion to Eminé, Nuri Bey's wife. But there is greater evidence to show that if Michales has a flaw, it is the flaw of extreme and irrational nationalistic fervor—in all probability a flaw common to many outstanding men of the times. The grandfather, Sefakas, approaching death, questions several Greek fighters about the purpose of their existence. Captain Mandakas, the first man questioned, shows a glass jar in which he preserves the ears of Turks he has killed. Old Sefakas asks whether that was what he was born for—to kill. Mandakas has to scratch his head and think before he can reply that he was fighting for freedom.

In defense of these men for whom rebellion against the Turks seems to be the primary business of life, the novel says, in effect, that for Cretans at the time resistance was the only honorable course; in fact, the history of these families is the history of heroic rebels. References are made in the story to uprisings in 1854, 1866, and 1878; the revolt with which the story is concerned occurs in 1889. Between these periods of major revolt were sporadic incidents, murder, and retaliation for murder, events which strengthened the hatred on both sides.

Captain Michales' principle failing at the outset of this novel is his need for periodic drinking bouts, during which time the resentment in him would usually result in some violent act which would antagonize the Turks. Among the Turks only Nuri Bey wins any sympathy from Michales, and that is the result of a sentimental childhood attraction and a mutual regard for manliness. As a sign of their respect for each other as fighters, Michales and Nuri have cut their arms, mixed their blood, and drunk it to become blood brothers. Nevertheless, Nuri is uneasy in Michales' company, and to win his friend's enthusiasm he persuades his wife Eminé to sing for them. When Nuri's wife sings, Michales is enraptured.

Another Cretan fighter, Captain Polyxigis, meeting Eminé accidentally, is also irresistibly drawn by her animal sensuality, and Eminé, as lustful for men as Polyxigis is for her, finally bids him become her lover.

From this point on, Michales and Polyxigis are comrades in arms, but private rivals. Nuri Bey, having lost his wife's respect in a test of strength with Michales, is further and irretrievably handicapped in the competition for Eminé's favors when a knife blow from Manusakas, whom Nuri has mortally wounded, deprives him of his manhood. The murder of his brother, Manusakas, so maddens Michales that he waits his chance to revenge that death by killing Nuri; but when he finally confronts the Turk, he refuses to kill anyone so weakened. Nuri, wishing death in combat, has to be satisfied with suicide. Polyxigis is therefore free to take Eminé as his wife, and he tries to Christianize her.

Friction between the Cretans and the Turks comes closer to mass conflict when Thodoros, Manusakas' son, murders Nuri Bey's nephew and escapes to the mountains to fight from there. Michales organizes the Cretans as the Turks make sweeping forays through the Christian quarters of the city, smashing into houses and killing the occupants. It is during one of the battles that follow, while in defense of the monastery Christ the Lord, that Michales leaves his post to rescue Eminé. He blames himself for the subsequent loss of the monastery, and his desire to fight to the death has something of self-punishment behind it. Nevertheless, there is a majestic sweep to the novel as Michales, alone of all the Cretan captains, fights the Turks in the mountains and waits for death.

The novel achieves additional weight by working into the story of Michales' revolt the related stories of Tityros, his brother, and Kosmas, his nephew. Tityros, a physically weak schoolmaster, poisons his wife's brother in order to win dominance in his house. His wife, Vangelio, who loves her brother but not her husband, commits suicide. These two deaths liberate Tityros so that he becomes an aggressive Cretan, physically strong, and a teacher of rebellion. Kosmas, who has studied abroad, returns to Crete with a Jewess as his wife. In the most sensitive scenes of this sometimes brutal book, Kazantzakis shows the wary and alien reception given this woman, Noëmi, by Kosmas' mother and sister. Noëmi's miscarriage, while Kosmas is away fighting, is said to be the result of a visitation by the ghost of Kosmas' father.

After the death of Sefakas, Kosmas is sent to the mountains to make a last appeal to Michales to give up the futile fight against the Turks. But the sight of Michales' death-inviting battle with the Turks so inspires the youth that despite wife, mother, and those who have urged him to discourage Michales, he joins in the fighting. He is beheaded just before Michales receives a bullet through his brain.

As a representation of a violent period in Cretan history, and as a tragic and epic drama of a Cretan fighter, Freedom or Death is an unusually effective novel.

THE FRONTIER IN AMERICAN HISTORY

Type of work: History

Author: Frederick Jackson Turner (1861-1932)

First published: 1920

July 12, 1893, is the best known date in American historiography, as distinct from the best known date in American history, July 4, 1776. Yet both saw Declarations of Independence. The scene in 1893 was the annual meeting of the fledgling American Historical Association, held in Chicago to coincide with the Columbia Exposition. The exposition celebrated the four hundredth anniversary of Christopher Columbus; it horribly depressed an Easterner, Henry Adams, but it so excited a Wisconsin native, Hamlin Garland, that he resolved to return from New York and settle in the booming Middle Western city. Another man from Wisconsin got up to deliver a paper before the American Historical Association, and by proposing "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" he read American historians their Declaration of Independence and permanently altered the study of American history in schools and colleges.

Frederick Jackson Turner was the speaker; his paper was often reprinted, but it was not until 1920 that he put together the first full statement of his theory on the frontier by republishing his original paper with twelve supporting articles in The Frontier in American History; the second and consequent part of his theory, The Significance of Sections in American History, was published in the year he died. His 1893 paper was preceded by his doctoral dissertation on the fur trade in Wisconsin and two articles on history and American history which show the development of his theory of the frontier. Two events precipitated his paper: first, the work of the Italian economist, Achille Loria, with its twin suggestions of free land as the key to changes in human society, and of America as the best colony in which to test this thesis, came to Turner's notice in the late 1880's and influenced his 1892 paper on "Problems in American History"; second, the superintendent of the 1890 census had recently announced that insufficient free land existed in the United States for the frontier to feature in the census reports as it had done since the first census in 1790. Turner dramatized his paper by opening with this statement; in effect he was directing his co-workers away from political and diplomatic history, insisting that, no matter what happened in European capitals, American history was made in the hinterland where the westward movement had been the most important historical phenomenon for Americans, and thus opening up the vast frontier of local history to historians in whatever state they might be located. The dramatic setting and occasion for Turner's paper was not at once appreciated, but it played its part in spreading his ideas rapidly.

The initial paper on "The Significance of the Frontier" was constructed in two parts, with an introduction. The first paragraph asserts that American history is the gradual settlement of the West, and this is followed by four paragraphs defining the frontier as a moving belt between settled and free land; it moved because of the force behind it, and because of the environment into which it moved its chief characteristic is a process of reversion to savagery followed by a slow recovery of civilization which, because its chief influences have been indigenous, cannot be an imitation of European life and must therefore be American. If the frontier is the maker of Americans, and they are the makers of their history, then the frontier holds the key to that history.

The first part of the paper presents in rapid survey the different kinds of frontier in American history and the modes of advance from the time when it began as the frontier of Europe on the Atlantic seaboard in the early seventeenth century to its near completion in the 1880's. The changes are determined by the different geographical boundaries or barriers to the westward advance—Indians, farm land, salt supplies, and the like. Here Turner draws several vivid sketches of the succession of different types of settlers who followed one another in any one settlement or who could be imaginatively plotted as a series of different kinds of frontier belts such as hunting, trading, nomadic, grazing, farming, financing. These stretched back eastward from the most advanced settlement at any given point in American history.

The second part of the paper is a provocative summary of changes enforced by the frontier experience on the regions to the east and in Europe, from whence the frontier impulse came. First, Turner proposes that the frontier is the real melting-pot of immigrant nationalities and without it the United States would in 1890 resemble those nations of Europe. The next point is the success of the frontier. Although its rate of advance changed, it never faltered, and its increasing distance westward made Americans less dependent on England. Third, the power of the federal government stems from that granted Congress by the Constitution to dispose of the public domain and thus exert Federal sway inside the state; without the frontier the Federal government would have had little to legislate and less money. Fourth, the products of the frontier first determined the development of the national economy, maintaining a rural dominance over increasing industrialization in the East. Fifth, the egalitarianism of the frontier kept the States democratic. Last, in struggles with the economic, religious, and educational power of the East, the West came to have a character of its own, which determined that the distinction of the states would always be a duality of national and sectional interests.

Although the reputation of this paper credits it with causing a revolution in American historiography, it would be truer to say that it was so completely in accord with the predilections of American historians in later decades that it both anticipated and supported the predominant social or economic interpretation of American history which came to be preferred to the dynastic, the succession of Presidents. It helped to make possible a wholly economic explanation of the causes of the Civil War, for instance, and it had the effect of determining Turner's life work. The Frontier in American History coped with his first task: to establish the historical outlines of his moving frontier and then to consider the unique character of post-frontier society, the residuum he called "The West." Turner's was first of all a new problem in historiography: how to explain that an uninhabited area could affect an inhabited area, a problem unknown in European historiography. He used the term "frontier" as the crossover point between the two areas and since it was always moving westward, however irregularly, he conceived it imaginatively as altering the physical shape of the inhabited area behind it by leaving successive belts of post-frontier societies, each of which was a "West" and together formed "the West."

Before analyzing his "West" he outlined the westward or moving frontier from Massachusetts to the "Old West" to the "Middle West," where he expanded his outline to closer study of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys. "The Significance of the Mississippi Valley in American History" both completes the moving of the frontier as far as Turner took it and allows him to introduce "The Problem of the West," "Dominant Forces in Western Life," "Contributions of the West to American Democracy," "The West and American Ideals," "Middle Western Democracy"; this discussion leads him to the large claim that the West is democratic and that "democracy" is another name for "West." Thus the whole meaning of American history is summed up in "the West." At this point Turner becomes not a narrative historian but a social historian determined to explore "forces," "ideals," and "significances."

In his social history Turner tends to conclude his work with perorations about the virtue of American democracy and that of the West in producing it, thus showing himself a loyal son of the Middle Border. "The Significance of the Mississippi Valley in American History" concludes that the valley realized the American ideal of democracy and constitutes the heartland of America almost an independent nation which has shed its light on the surrounding feebleness of the South, the East, and the Far West. Turner developed these ideas during his long tenure at Harvard and modified them when he took up residence at the Huntington Library in San Marino, California; in turn, they led him to his pioneer work on sections in American history and life. His methods are summarized in his presidential address to the American Historical Association in 1910, "Social Forces in American History," the twelfth chapter of The Frontier in American History in which he reads statistics of American growth since 1890 as evidence of the force behind the frontier turning to new fields in the development of industrial and federal power. Turner summons his fellow historians to continue the work he began nearly two decades before by using statistics available from other disciplines, as he did in using the census bulletin in 1893. His embracing view forecasts the development of American studies, and the discipline he hinted at is given meaning by his insistence that the duty of the historian is to engage himself in the life of his nation by continually reinterpreting the immediate past in terms of the present, as he himself had done in Chicago in 1893.

Turner's concluding chapter "Middle Western Pioneer Democracy," presents his belief that pioneer life gave Americans a chance for a true democracy, personal freedom, and a free society for the individual.

 QUINQUANA and FLORZINHA DOS REIS, spinster sisters of an old Ilhéan family
 DONA ARMINDA, Nacib Saad's neighbor, a widow

According to Gilberto Freyre, the internationally respected Brazilian historian and social philosopher, Jorge Amado is perhaps the only Brazilian writer of any importance allied with the Communist Party. Winner of a Stalin Prize and a former resident of Communist Czechoslovakia, this great novelist has served as a Communist representative in the Brazilian government. Reputedly disenchanted by the events of 1956, however, Jorge Amado has never been a mere "red intellectual"; and in Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon, his peculiarly robust, humane, pure kind of "Marxist" thought lies deeply buried in an even more humane, more robust, purer art.

The setting of the novel, for example, is perfectly suited to a retelling of that myth by which Karl Marx organized his vision of history. In the middle 1920's of this century the Brazilian provinces were still suffering under the political, social, and economic dominance of the coroneis. These "colonels," who ran unchallenged the local organization of both major political parties, who dictated at whim all manners and morals and who possessed and held, often by violence, the huge estates that supplied the money upon which all provincial life depended, were the direct administrators of what can only be recognized as a feudal society. Like the planters and cattle barons of North America, they ruled vast territories through a complicated system of allegiances built upon favors, kinship, and the naked use of power. In the country around Ilhéus, a seacoast town in the province of Bahia, the grip of the colonels, given sinews by a boom in the international market for cacao, had remained anachronistically strong. What Amado's novel is basically concerned with, then, is the breaking of that grip and the change from a feudal order, as represented by these colonels, to a new bourgeois order, as represented by Mundinho Falcão, a rich, energetic, progress-minded young man from Rio.

Unlike most of the colonels, who are self-made men, Falcão is the son of an illustrious family whose influence extends easily upward into the highest reaches of the national government. He has exiled himself from the high life of Rio de Janeiro for three reasons: to make his own fortune, to forget a girl, and to accomplish needed social reforms. As the book opens, however, one of the colonels has just murdered his wife and her lover; and if the fact that she had a lover at all reveals some cracks in the old order, the further implication that the colonel will get off scot-free under the unwritten law indicates that, for the time being at least, it still survives as an effective force.

Meanwhile, Nacib Saad, a fat, gentle Brazilian from Syria and the owner of the Vesuvius Bar, has just lost his cook, whose appetizers and tidbits had largely accounted for his considerable success. Fortunately for him however, a continuing drought in the backlands has brought a steady stream of homeless migrants to Ilhéus looking for work; and just as Nacib is becoming desperate, he discovers among them Gabriela, whose scent of cloves and cinnamon-colored skin enhance equal talents for cooking food and making love. As a girl of the people, Gabriela represents a way of life that is both older and more essentially Brazilian than any of the ways represented by either the colonels or Mundinho Falcão. She embodies the idea of convivência—of varied and mingling races and classes mutually dissolving and living together in harmony and absolute democracy—that is at once a Brazilian tradition and a Brazilian ideal.

While Mundinho Falcão deliberately operates upon the body of society, re-channeling its old systems into new ones, Gabriela unconsciously operates upon its soul. Every man in town adores her and few of the women, surprisingly enough, are jealous. When election time arrives, the colonels find their influence whittled away to the vanishing point; and in a last attempt to save their ascendancy, the more reactionary of them attempt to arrange the assassination of a powerful political chief who has defected to Falcão. The killing fails, of course, and Falcão's forces of reform are swept into office, not without his privately acknowledging, however, that even this reform is only temporary and must lead to changes even greater. The nature of the changes still to come, one sees, resides in the musky clove and dusky cinnamon of the beautiful mulatto.

Nacib Saad's attempt to transform Gabriela into a married, respectably shod, and housebroken little bourgeoise merely ends in the discovery that her love is as naturally democratic as her ancestry: she has slept with any man in Ilhéus lucky enough to be handsome. As her husband, of course, poor Nacib is shocked, but not for long. Gabriela still loves him and he learns, too, in the course of a short estrangement disastrous for the business of the Vesuvius Bar, that he likewise still loves her. Wild and free, this mulatto girl is as unregimentable as she is desirable, as indomitable as she is beautiful. At the novel's end she finds herself, though no longer his unhappy wife, once again established as Nacib's happy cook and mistress. All other factions, too, the colonels' and Falcão's, are reunited in freedom to celebrate new prosperity and progress for Ilhéus, and the colonel who had shot his wife is sent, as testimony to a new reign of law, to prison.

Here is Amado's version of Marxist myth. It is Marx, however, with a considerable difference. Brazil, the writer seems to have recognized, is not a nineteenth century Germany or England; neither is it a twentieth century Russia or Czechoslovakia. If Brazil needs a revolution, says Amado—and even conservatives like Gilberto Freyre agree that it does—let it be not a puritanical affair, with brigades of workers shouldering picks and marching under banners, but rather a revolution à la Rabelais, with freedom and harmony as its goals, and Fay ce que voudras as its motto. What Amado wants, in the end, is social changes that will confer upon everyone the freedom of a Gabriela; and it is his passionate desire for this freedom that makes Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon so superior to the blind exigencies of any party line. In fable and atmosphere the novel is a work of robust humanity, sensuous purity, and ultimate universality.

A GENERAL INTRODUCTION TO PSYCHOANALYSIS

Type of work: Psychological treatise
Author: Sigmund Freud (1856-1939)
First published: 1920

A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis, which could more properly be entitled Introductory Lectures in Psychoanalysis, remains, probably, the most widely used and popular means of introducing Freud's ideas of the psyche. Given during World War I, these lectures embody the results of Freud's analytical research between 1895 and 1910, when the basic groundwork was set forth for his revolutionary ideas about the role of the unconscious and the power of sexuality in the life of the mind. Several other introductory surveys were done by Freud in later years, but these lectures of 1920 remain the most concise and useful of the Freudian surveys. And though a veritable army of Freudians have explicated the Viennese pioneer, none replaces the mentor himself, for not only is he the natural choice as a guide, but also he is an excellent stylist, the power of whose mind speaks in every paragraph, even in translation. Freud reproduces his own quest for meaning in these lectures, involving the reader in what is, among other things, one of the greatest detective stories ever written. Another device, skillfully employed here as elsewhere in Freud's work, is to proceed by frequent recourse to dialogue between Freud and an imaginery, quasi-hostile critic. Through this rhetorical procedure, the reader is half convinced even before he fully experiences the reasoning Freud uses to persuade his imaginary antagonist.

The first four of these lectures present Freud's analysis of the psychology of errors as a simple means of introducing what was at that time an extraordinary subject. The slip of the tongue or pen, misreading, forgetting, or mislaying things often is not due to chance, but comes from something contrary to our rational intention, slipping out and distorting speech or action. From the device of the errors that often are not what they appear, Freud turns for the next ten lectures to dreams. Like the errors of pen and speech, this is a subject that we have all experienced. (Freud is concerned to stress that his subject is not abnormal psychology, for we are all subject to this analysis.) Patients spoke of dreams so often Freud began to delve into this area of investigation. This was another radical idea, for the reading of dreams was tantamount to gipsy soothsaying. The dream must be interpreted, for the manifest dream content always condenses, displaces, or elaborates the latent content, and replaces feelings with visual images. In interpretation, the analyst ignores surface confusion and waits for the central theme to emerge from the dreamer's retelling. In our sleep we regress; the conscious mind idles at its customary control; we return to something like the womb. The dreamer knows the meaning of the dream, but generally he does not know that he knows. (Freud maintains that all the manifest or surface content of the dream comes from experience of the previous waking day.) We must interpret because the dreamer fears the censor or dreads reality, making him distort and condense. So all dream material is symbolic. If we know the dreamer and his environment thoroughly, interpretation is simple. But it is unclear to Freud at this time why certain elements are symbolic and others are not. It is clear, however, that the overwhelming number of dream symbols are sexual. (As Freud notes in his introduction, the greatest resistance to his work came because of his insistence upon the importance of sexuality in the formation of character. It is certainly true that in late nineteenth century Europe and America, when Freud worked, he could hardly exaggerate the harm done to the psyche by the repressive conventions of that time.) In dreams we find the male organ represented by all pointed or elongated objects, fish and snakes, anything sharp, or a weapon. All hollows, apertures, and jewels represent the female organ. Birth is associated with water, and erection and intercourse with flying. Freud notes that we can find all these associations in folklore, legend, and jokes, and in our daytime fantasies as well as in our night dreams. So important is this material, he briefly suggests, that all our conscious language, and thus rational thought, comes from the libido, or sexual hunger. Answering critics (as he always does), Freud says we must not apply these symbolic readings mechanically; dreams require a sensitive and intelligent interpreter. And all dreams are not primarily sexual, though he insists that the oddest, most anxiety-ridden ones invariably are. The material in dreams is primitive in that it comes out of the childhood of the dreamer, and perhaps the childhood of the race. (Here Freud briefly suggests an idea that his quondam colleague, Carl G. Jung was to make into a major tenet in his quite different analytical mode. Jung posited a racial unconsciousness within the psyche, as well as an individual one.)

It is an untenable fallacy, Freud observes, to call children innocent, if we mean innocent of sexuality. The child has not yet focused upon sex as reproduction, a situation that adults often fail to observe. The child is "polymorphously perverse," in Freud's phrase. In dreams we regress to childhood, for the unconscious is the repository of infantile mental life. What adults call evil in dream and intent is merely childlike. One observes here the calm expectation by Freud that all can be understood and so controlled by man, physician, and patient. Ironically known to popular culture as an exponent of free love and a demonic prophet of uncontrollable sex, Freud actually was one of the greatest of the nineteenth century rationalists. His whole life went into extending understanding, so that control and utilization might follow. Rather than a prophet of doom, he is a scientist with perhaps too much faith in man's perfectibility.

The last portion of the book, a series of twelve lectures, Freud devotes to outlining his general theory of sexuality and neurosis. The whole science of psychoanalysis came from the study of obsessional neurosis. In such a condition, the mind is taken over at times by seemingly useless and meaningless compulsions, and forced to repeat trivial acts that nevertheless are endowed with unreasonable tension and anxiety. Through his work with Josef Breuer on hysteria—first through hypnosis and then through his own technique of free association—Freud found that patient after patient, in probing the past, would come up with some event or situation over which the unconscious still broods, causing neurosis in the present. Freud called this stumbling block a trauma, and he designed his analytical technique as a way of exploring and explaining this event to the patient, thus ridding him of the need to be its victim. Because of fear the patient will always resist such a probe, a situation that must be overcome by the analyst's seeking the patient's confidence and getting him to participate in the quest himself. Every neurosis contains such a trauma or fixation, Freud avers, though not every fixation need cause a neurosis. The mind could be described as two rooms: a large one crowded with unconscious feelings and memories, and a small pre-conscious room of control and censorship. (In later Freudian theory this metaphorical structure will become the famous tripartite designation of Id, Ego, and Superego.)

In the last lectures of this series, Freud describes the development of human sexuality as his analysis found it. Libido, or sex drive, is present in the child from the beginning, though unfocused. At first libido is directed through sucking towards its mother's breast, which is the first object of sexual desire. Later the child is auto-erotic, finding gratification for libido in exploring itself. Then the child becomes analistic, interested in objects, finding gratification in bowel movements, for example. From age seven on the child is latently mature, beginning to be concerned with adult or genital sex. The first object of love is the mother. Here Freud summarizes his famous analysis of the Oedipus myth, in which the hero is punished by society and the gods for killing his father and marrying his mother. This is the key myth in Western culture, Freud explains, because what our society calls "maturity" consists of displacing the libidinal fixation from the mother and transferring it to another being of the opposite sex beyond the incest barrier. When we cannot or will not do this, we revert to childlike sexuality, which in the adult is perversion.

In conclusion, Freud notes that psychoanalysis is only a superstructure, resting on some organic base (the electrochemistry of the brain) about which we know little as yet. Psychoanalysis does not advocate "free love" or wild abandonment through destroying censorship. It seeks to free the libido from unhealthy repressions and re-educate the whole person for a responsible life in a world of adult maturity.

GEORGICS

Type of work: Poetry

Author: Publius Vergilius Maro (70 B.C.-19 B.C.)

First transcribed: c. 37-29 B.C.

Vergil's Georgics, a long poetic work in four sections, was written at the request of the poet's patron, Maecenas, to bolster the Emperor Augustus' agricultural policy.

It was essential to the progress of the nation that farming be seen as a worthy and patriotic occupation for soldiers returning from military campaigns, and Vergil's work glorifies many aspects of country life. His poem is one of the most remarkable in the history of Western literature, for in it he has managed to provide a considerable amount of what was, in his day, accurate information on the cultivation of crops and the care of animals and at the same time to maintain a lofty tone that is far from the prosaic quality of the subject matter.

The poet uses mythology extremely effectively, invoking the gods traditionally associated with agriculture at the beginning of each section and describing such ordinary phenomena as spring rains in metaphorical terms; the rain is Aether, the atmosphere's embrace of his wife, the earth. By referring to familiar deities Vergil lifts details of weather and conditions of the soil far above the realm of the Farmer's Almanac. His metaphorical language, his use of epic similes, and his references to the greatness of his country also contribute to making the Georgics fine poetry.

Each of the four sections deals with a specific problem of farming, but each also has a number of digressions that add interest and grandeur to the work as a whole. The first Georgic begins with a long invocation to the deities who control the growth of grain, vines, and olives, and with a special prayer to Julius Caesar, who has become a new divinity, with his own place among the constellations. The body of the book is devoted to the plowing, planting, and harvesting of crops and to the helpful knowledge that can be gained by study of the stars. Practical advice on the best time to plow and sow, on crop rotation, fertilizing the soil, and the tools needed by the farmer is enlivened by a majestic description of a storm, brief vignettes of farm life, and a description of the worship of the goddess Ceres at harvest time. A discussion of the changing appearance of the sun under different weather conditions leads to a description of the eclipse which was one of the disastrous omens that appeared at the time of the assassination of Julius Caesar. The conclusion of this section is a prayer that Augustus, Rome's new champion, may bring peace to the nation and allow farmers to return from the battlefield to their own lands.

The cultivation of the vine and the olive, staples of the Italian economy, is the central theme of the second Georgic, and Vergil makes the appropriate invocation to Bacchus, the wine god, as well as to his patron, as this part of the poem opens. Perhaps the most memorable passages here are the poet's lines in praise of Italy, in which he cites the special virtues of each part of the country and evokes patriotic sentiments as he alludes to famous ruling families of past ages. Fine, too, is the restatement of the pastoral ideal, Vergil's picture of the happy state of the farmers who live at peace on their own lands, far from the battlefield, the rule of law courts, and the frenzy of politics.

Even subjects like the grafting of trees and the preparation of soil for the planting of seedlings are treated in majestic language, and the catalogue of the virtues of the various wines of the country is equally poetic. Milton learned much from his classical master about the evocative effect of place names.

Vergil's praise of country life at the end of this section is tied to his political aims; he asserts that it was through the efforts of the sturdy farmers of the past that Etruria and Rome won their first greatness, and he suggests that much of the fate of the new empire will rest on those who cultivate the Italian fields.

The third Georgic opens with a general statement on poetry. Vergil realizes that he is opening new doors in writing about fields and flocks, yet he knows, too, that all the old myths have been repeated so often that they no longer lend lustre to the poet. He hopes eventually to win fame for himself and for his homeland, Mantua, by describing the heroic exploits of Augustus Caesar and his army, but meanwhile he must follow Maecenas' request that he chronicle the domain of the wood nymphs, and he turns to a new topic, the breeding of horses and cattle. He pictures vividly the strength and grace of the thoroughbred horse, alert and eager for action as the mount of a great soldier. Again Vergil elevates the tone of his subject by alluding to the magnificent horsemen and charioteers among the Homeric heroes.

The nurture of sheep and goats forms another part of this section. The poet even suggests remedies for diseases that strike these animals, and he gives a moving and realistic description of a devastating plague among them, picturing their death agonies as the result of the avenging force of the fury Tisiphone, who drives slaughter and terror before her.

The fourth Georgic has probably provided the greatest pleasure for modern readers, who can share Vergil's fascination with the habits of bees more readily than his interest in various kinds of soil and methods of grafting. The poet relates the popular belief that the highly complex society of the bees results from a special blessing bestowed on them by Jupiter after they aided him when he was imprisoned in a cave; they alone of all the creatures live under law.

The poet has observed colonies of bees closely, and he describes with great accuracy their characteristic swarms and the battles between the "king" bees for supremacy. He suggests the best sweet-smelling plants for attracting the swarms to new hives and recommends the playing of cymbals to aid in drawing them toward their new homes. He also offers helpful hints about the flowers that make the best honey and mourns regretfully that he lacks time and space to speak of gardens.

The last half of this Georgic deals with the curious subject of spontaneous generation from corruption, a belief that has fascinated men as recently as the seventeenth century, when Sir Francis Bacon discussed it in his New Atlantis. There was a tradition, apparently quite widespread, that, should a whole colony of bees perish, a new swarm could be born from the corruption of the blood of a slaughtered bullock. Vergil explains this phenomenon by relating a mythological tale about a shepherd, Aristaeus, the son of Apollo and a sea nymph, who goes to the sea god Proteus to learn why his bees have died. He finds that the nymphs who mourn the deaths of Orpheus and Eurydice have brought about this misfortune, and he sacrifices four bulls to placate the spirits of the singer and his bride. From the carcasses of these animals arise a great cloud of bees, signifying the acceptability of the sacrifice, and from that time on hives were believed to be replenished in the same way.

The concluding lines of the fourth Georgic summarize the poet's achievement in this poem; he speaks a little apologetically about singing of the cultivation of fields, flocks, and trees while Caesar is winning great victories, and he identifies himself as the same writer who formerly sang of the shepherd Tityrus, in his Eclogues.

While the Aeneid is unquestionably Vergil's masterpiece, the Georgics perhaps reveals his remarkable poetic imagination even more fully. The successful didactic poems in Western literature are very few in number, and not many of them achieve the majestic tone of Vergil's work.

Though usually discussed as a novel, Go Down, Moses is both a collection of seven short stories, written and published independently, which together form a sharply detailed picture of a small region in the Mississippi Delta, and an outrageously confusing tale of the McCaslin clan. The book recapitulates the story of the American South and reaffirms the Biblical views of human history.

"Was," which foreshadows the cruelty and injustice of later generations, and shows man treating his brother like a piece of property and gambling over human happiness, is one of the funniest stories Faulkner wrote. It opens with a pack of hounds racing through the house after a fox. A central pun of the book, "race" is the theme of the first story, which takes the form of outrageous rural comedy. Buck and Buddy, twin sons of Carothers McCaslin, chase their slave and half brother, Tomey's Turl; Turl is after his sweetheart, Tennie, a slave of Hubert and his sister Sophonsiba Beauchamp; and Sophonsiba, called Sibbey, the only woman in the whole countryside, is after Buck. Buck and Buddy must catch Turl before he catches Tennie or else Sibbey will bring Turl home, stay for a visit, and may catch Buck. When Buck arrives at Warwick, the dilapidated Beauchamp plantation which Sibbey fashions after an English estate, he is tricked into staying the night and tricked again into climbing into a bed that contains the mistress of Warwick. When he is caught by the smiling Hubert, a poker game ensues to settle once and for all whether Sibbey gets Buck, whether Turl gets Tennie, and who will buy the other slave in either event. Buddy comes to the rescue and forces Hubert's hand with a possible straight over three threes. Buck is free, Turl gets Tennie, and Hubert must buy Turl. The ending is happy, but when the hounds break into the house once again in pursuit of the fox we sense that the race is not over. And indeed it is not; Sibbey gets Buck, Ike is born, and an estate is established that will perpetuate a system of cruelty and injustice.

The story is set in a mythical past, when a man could ride for days without having to meet a woman, and when in a lifetime he did not have to dodge but one. Further, the characters are innocent. Buck and Buddy may have owned slaves, but they quartered the Negroes in the mansion and themselves in the shack. They may have locked the front door every night after putting the slaves in but they never checked the back door which became an exit as soon as the lock was turned. They may have chased a slave and half brother with dogs, they may have gambled over wedlock; but these were forms or games as silly as Sibbey's imitation of a court lady and as harmless as the episodes of a silent comedy. Although the actions of the McCaslins and the Beauchamps in this story are based on slavery, an inhuman system that will become a foundation of injustice, the individual characters are not guilty. Although their conventions are shown to be ridiculous, they are also shown to result in a humane if comic gracefulness and an idyllic equilibrium.

The story is a burlesque of the Garden of Eden, yet it is also true to the biblical form and meaning: guilt inevitably follows innocence, cruelty and destruction are inextricably bound with freedom and love. As we read further in Go Down, Moses we can reflect that the true focus of the opening story is not Buck, Buddy, Turl, Tennie, Sibbey, or Hubert, but Ike McCaslin. It is Ike's voice that tells the tale, although it is in his cousin Cass's idiom. Ike, past seventy, tells the story but he cannot understand it; therefore he can only repeat verbatim the words of the boy who accompanied Buck and Buddy. Perhaps this was Cass's initiation into adulthood. Ike's initiation comes later, during a bear hunt; but rather than open his eyes to the adult world with all its complexities, it seals them with blinders of fanaticism. Ike never grows beyond the self-conscious dedication of his adolescence. He can never understand the story of his older cousin because he never develops a sense of humor. While a comic view could lead to the acceptance of absurdity for fact, Ike's heroic posture can lead only to outrage and impotence—and finally to the inhumanity of what Hawthorne called the "unpardonable sin."

The next two stories universalize the situation of "Was." "The Fire and the Hearth" establishes the anguish and heroism as well as the pathos and comic dignity of Lucas Beauchamp, the son of Turl and Tennie. "Pantaloon in Black," the most tenuously connected of the stories, establishes the present condition of injustice. A powerful young Negro is driven mad by his wife's death, kills the white man who has been exploiting the colored workers for years in a crooked dice game, and is finally lynched; ironically, the story is told by the sheriff, who misunderstands the Negro's motives, to his wife, who is annoyed at being kept from her picture show. "The Old People" brings us back to the main story line, describing Ike's ritual killing of his first deer, under the tutelage of Sam Fathers. "The Bear" deals with Ike's full initiation into manhood.

"The Bear" is confusing and incomprehensible out of context, for the story is told from Ike's point of view, and we tend to identify with the idealistic boy. It is only gradually that we come to see how Ike misinterprets his experience. Ike sees Sam Fathers, the bear, and the dog who is destined to catch it, as taintless and incorruptible; and he sees the woods as ideal. Sam Fathers, the illegitimate son of the Indian chief who sold the land to Carothers McCaslin, now old and the last of his line, teaches Ike humility, patience, self-reliance, and a love for the wilderness. But he fails to teach Ike, even though he baptizes the boy in the blood of his first deer, that destruction is a part of life, and that to retreat from this reality is not only suicide but an impetus to the destructive force. Ike never sees that his taintless and incorruptible bear kills farm animals and cuts a destructive path through the wilderness just like the locomotive; he never admits to himself that the hunters whom he idealizes for the rest of his life are in fact killers. He is blind to the reality of destruction even as Sam trains the dun-colored dog that will track Old Ben.

Ike can see only the wilderness of James Fenimore Cooper; he is blind to the "heart of darkness" that is all the while before him. Part IV of "The Bear," is well known for the tortured, involuted style that represents Ike's mind seeking to grasp and explain an unbelievably complex, absurd, and suppressed heritage. Ike has read through the ledgers of his father and uncle, Buck and Buddy, which burlesque the chronicles of the Old Testament and portray the South in a comic microcosm. And he has discovered that his grandfather, old Carothers McCaslin, not only violated a slave but later ordered the daughter brought to the house and had another child by her—that Tomey's Turl was a product not only of exploitation and miscegenation but of incest. Ike has come of age, and after arguing with his older cousin, Cass, he decides to repudiate a heritage founded on injustice and rapacity. Believing that Sam Fathers has set him free, he gives the land to Cass and, in imitation of Christ, becomes a carpenter.

Cass tries to explain to Ike the meaning of his responsibility. He knows that Ike is relinquishing the land for the same reason that he refused to shoot Old Ben when he had a perfect chance. The explanation is in Keats's "Ode on a Grecian Urn": Ike would forever hold the moment of his fulfillment. Cass understands that the love on the Grecian Urn had turned "Cold Pastoral," and he will accept compromise. Ike, by his attitude not only shows a possessiveness as fierce as that of the slave owner and the capitalist, but denies life, which is complex and inevitably fluid.

In "Delta Autumn" Ike, weak and nostalgic and almost eighty years of age, goes into the woods with the grandsons of the hunters who trained him. He is left in the camp while the others go off hunting, and Roth Edmonds, grandson of Cass, asks him to deliver a packet of money. A girl carrying a small child arrives in the camp while Ike is lying in bed without his glasses or trousers. Now his blindness and impotence are brought to full realization. He learns that the girl is not only part Negro but also the grand-niece of Lucas Beauchamp; the situation involves exploitation and miscegenation and incest, Carother's ancient sin all over again. Ike can only offer the girl money, the family hunting horn, and advice. His initiation, conversion, and renunciation has served only as an evasion of human responsibility. He has loved an abstraction of the past which blinded him to human necessity, although it did not finally relieve him of his responsibility. The girl recognizes that when Ike gave Cass the land, he contributed to the grandson's recklessness. She does not want money or even a husband; she knew a moment of love and is willing to recognize that it is past. All she wants is recognition. Roth evades the simple but difficult gesture by leaving camp. Ike evades it by offering empty forms and empty words. He himself has re-enacted the original sin of Carothers McCaslin, who left his illegitimate child an inheritance, recognizing that this was cheaper than saying "Son" to a Negro.

The focus of the final story, entitled "Go Down, Moses," is not on Ike, but, as Cleanth Brooks tells us, on the community. Lucas Beauchamp's grandson, Samuel, has killed a policeman in Chicago and has been electrocuted. Lucas' wife Mollie, senile and crazed by the outrage, wants the body brought home. The story shows how the leading members of the white community accept the responsibility of hiding the truth from Mollie and of bringing home the body. Sentimentality is balanced by the fine, comic characterization of Mollie.

The history of the past twenty years has dramatized the problem of leaving the race issue to the South, a position which Faulkner advocated explicitly to the press and implicitly in this story. But this is only one dimension of Faulkner's philosophy, just as it is a single facet of the story, and both are distorted in isolation. Marvin Klotz has recently tried to establish the superiority of the original stories to their revision and collection in Go Down, Moses. But while the early stories may have had greater control and a finer economy, the novel that they form is far more ambitious. In a structure that combines various attitudes and perspective, Faulkner gives us a picture of the Southern situation and makes of his regional materials a metaphor of the human condition, which combines both love and destruction, which is complex and unbearable and at the same time capable of affirmation—but only when viewed from the humane vantage point that avoids fanaticism and accepts both comedy and tragedy.

Go Tell It on the Mountain is James Baldwin's first book and first novel. A relatively short work, it continues to impress readers and critics by the economy of its form and the initial statement of Baldwin's vision of the brotherhood of man, represented in the deposition of the father figure and the initiation of the son into the company of the Saints, a religious equivalent of the human brotherhood.

Passages in Baldwin's later essays refer to the autobiographical materials used in this novel, chiefly those discussing his relationship with his father, a preacher in Harlem. The impression of unity in the book is achieved in three ways: by observing the classic unity of time and using only three related settings for the three parts; by structuring the book round Gabriel, the father; and by meticulously exploring and triumphantly concluding the struggle between John and Gabriel. This unity is especially apparent in the middle section. Part One shows the maneuvering for position between protagonist and antagonist, and Part Three the deposition of the father and the elevation of the son to equal status as a "saved" member of the congregation.

The extremely formal structure is intended to release a combination of universal meanings. In twenty-four hours the actions of four members of the Grimes family, together with their past histories summoned up by their actions, re-enact the Christ story from John the Baptist to St. John the Divine. Elizabeth was the mother of John the Baptist and his birth was announced to Zacharias by the Archangel Gabriel; further parallels could be developed in the almost consistent use of Biblical names. The parallel is imaginative rather than literal and thus cannot be stressed obviously, but it is an effective means of stating the universal themes developed in the action of the novel, culminating in the message of love and release from bondage which is to be told "on the mountain."

The longest part by far is the second. Its setting is the Temple of the Fire Baptized, the church attended by the Grimes family on or near Lenox Avenue in Harlem. This is also the setting of the last portion of Part One and of the first section of Part Three, so that the action of Part Two is prepared at the conclusion of Part One and concluded at the beginning of Part Three. Parts One and Three are comparatively short and serve to frame the middle section, just as the central chapter of the three in Part Two is framed by short chapters on either side. Parts One and Three are chiefly concerned with the hero, John Grimes, and Part Two with Gabriel; John is supported by one of the two important female figures, his mother Elizabeth, and Gabriel is controlled by the other, his elder sister Florence. Her strong personality makes her the most overt doubter of Gabriel's self-sanctified status because she holds the key to his past in knowing the histories of his first wife, Deborah, of his mistress, Esther, and of his dead son, Royal. Royal is brought to life again in Roy, the eldest child of Gabriel and Elizabeth as an incarnation of old Adamic Gabriel before he was "saved."

The histories of Elizabeth and Florence are completed in their reveries of their dead lovers, Richard and Frank, in their chapters titled "Prayers" in Part Two. Gabriel is thus related not only to the four female characters but also to all of the male characters but Elisha.

Florence meets her husband Frank, in New York and loves him hopelessly, though he lives a sensual existence that reminds her painfully of her brother's. After he is killed in France during World War I, she is left with memories of her mother, her brother, her lover, and with a passionate interest in her step-nephew, John.

Elizabeth's "Prayer" shows a true love affair, delicately described and tragically concluded when she, too, goes North to New York with her lover; Richard, like Deborah, Royal, and Roy, falls foul of white society, is wrongfully accused of a crime, is acquitted by Elizabeth's efforts, but ends by committing suicide. Elizabeth is left with John.

The longest "Prayer" is Gabriel's. Filling more than a quarter the length of the book, it follows Florence's, encompasses the histories of all three characters, and is the center of the action and meaning. Gabriel's situation, after having been saved by the Lord's striking him on his way home from a debauch, is complicated. He has married in righteous fashion the blasted Deborah, who had been so cruelly assaulted by white men one night that she is sterile. But Gabriel longs for a son. When his affair with a maid, Esther, produces Royal, a smaller image of himself, he is caught between the feeling of sin and the feeling of pride. He disowns Esther, who dies in childbirth. Royal is brought up in Gabriel's Southern home town, and father and son meet only once. Then each offers the other protection after a lynching. After Royal has been killed in Chicago, Deborah taxes Gabriel with his fatherhood, but even in confessing it Gabriel remains unrepentant: he is a preacher and the Lord will look after and understand him. Esther was a harlot, Deborah objects, and she warns Gabriel to seek true repentance before it is too late.

Gabriel's story is concluded in Elizabeth's "Prayer." At the conclusion of Florence's "Prayer" and of Gabriel's the reader knows that Deborah has told Florence the secret of Royal. Also, Gabriel's dilemma with Elizabeth is very like that with Esther. Since Royal is dead and Deborah sterile, Roy, having cursed his father, is sulking at home; he is the son of the bond-woman standing where the true heir ought to stand. Gabriel's Old Testament views have not given him the satisfaction he feels a prophet of the Lord is entitled to; we are to understand in the irony with which Gabriel's conversion and course as a preacher have been described that James Baldwin does not approve of though he can sympathize with a kind of religion that omits love because love seems to suggest sensuality.

Gabriel's simple views are seen in John's excursion on the morning of his birthday. He descends in the Hell of the movie house across Sixth Avenue, the Inferno of good and ungodly living, contrasting with the piety and poverty of his home. Having sinned on Sixth Avenue, John returns to find a minor catastrophe and his father's prohibitions justified: Roy has been slashed with a razor during a gang war between white and Negro hoodlums and his father is in a towering and righteous rage with everyone but Roy. But Aunt Florence stands up to Gabriel, telling him that he was born wild and will die wild because nothing can be changed. Gabriel is unredeemed and, in his righteousness, unredeemable.

In Elizabeth's "Prayer" we see Gabriel in New York after the death of Deborah, trying to change those around him and ready to begin founding his line again. Through Florence he meets Elizabeth and John as a baby attracts him enormously. He marries Elizabeth to forgive her her sin—Gabriel is always righteous—and begins to beget Roy, Sally, and the coming baby on her; Gabriel is also highly sensual. The old Adam in him cannot be done away with, as Florence has warned, but his fury is not allowed to wreck the lives of others. For the Lord himself intervenes in two ways that Gabriel hardly expected: John is saved by the Lord, and Gabriel is damned in learning that Florence has Deborah's letter about Esther and Royal, and that she will surely pass it on to Elizabeth and John, if and when need arises. Gabriel is thus defeated by his own nature, by his past, and by his stepson.

Against this towering male figure John pits his strength during the twenty-four hours of the novel. John's battle is to reach salvation or God without acknowledging Gabriel as his father; he must reconcile flesh and spirit so as to deny Gabriel's combination of gross sensuality and righteousness, or he will simply turn into another Gabriel, a "black" angel.

John triumphs and is triumphed over in Part Three, "The Threshing-Floor," which carries straight on from the dramatic conclusion to Part Two when he is suddenly stricken by the power of the Lord and finds himself thrown down upon the "threshing-floor" in the center of the Saints. The songs of the Saints return to the theme: "To walk in Jerusalem just like John." This night decides the issue whether John can walk there by somehow getting directly to the Lord and not through his stepfather. In an apocalyptic vision he fights his last battle with the forces of darkness, represented by his father, and thus fights free of his shameful past and regains his real father's independent spirit. Richard is reborn in John as John is reborn and baptized that Sunday morning, as Elizabeth, Florence, and Gabriel realize when they all leave the Temple and walk down Lenox Avenue to meet the new day.

The completely Negro cast, settings, and speech are highly relevant to the themes of John's initiation and rebirth into a world of love as against sensual enjoyment, a particularly fine but necessary discrimination for a boy of fourteen in Harlem; further, the movement of the novel from the harshly realistic light of Saturday in Harlem through the darkness of the Tarrying Service on Saturday night to the clean Sunday dawn gains figurative value from the blackness of Gabriel and others. This is, then, a Negro novel in the truest sense: human problems achieve a special and unique coloring without ever becoming "Negro" or "colored" social problems.

The Golden Apples, first published in 1949, is a group of seven short stories, interrelated and held together by their characters, their common setting, Morgana, Mississippi, and their common theme, the wanderer's search for happiness. The stories were all published separately, but taken together they cover some forty years in the lives of the inhabitants of Morgana and form a complete drama in which they are engaged. The list of a dramatis personae on the first page of the book indicates that we are to consider the work as a unified whole. The related stories are in some ways Miss Welty's attempt to create a regional world like Faulkner's, in this case MacLain County, not Yoknapatawpha, but her focus is neither upon the Sartoris nor upon the Snopeses but on the comfortable upper-middle class and their everyday activities such as piano recitals, camping trips for the young girls, gossip between neighbors, and funerals. This world is examined from all sides, extending even to the structural device of point of view. Thus the first story, "Shower of Gold" is narrated by the gossipy Mrs. Rainey, whose matter-of-factness contrasts with the mystery of what she reveals about King MacLain and his influence upon the community. "June Recital" is revealed through the eyes of two witnesses: Loch Morrison, the young boy who sees everything wrong yet peculiarly right, and older Cassie, his sister, who sees correctly but does not share the insights or life force of her brother. "The Whole World Knows" is revealed through the eyes of Randall MacLain, a somewhat blurred vision that discovers a certain truth as it re-enacts what it observed. Whatever the point of view, Miss Welty is able to get beneath the veneer of middle-class comfort and scratch the surface of "place" to get at the hidden lives and hidden mysteries of her characters.

The common setting is not the only unifying factor for the stories. They are held together by Yeats's poem, "The Song of the Wandering Aengus" from which the title of the collection is taken. This poem breaks into Cassie's mind as she tells her narrative, and in a very real way it is the symbolic key to the meaning of the work as a whole. The poem itself is about a quest, a search for golden apples, representing beauty, poetry, ultimate meaning, a search which is marked by the pursuit of a vision, a mystery where a silver trout becomes a "glimmering girl" before the eyes of Aengus. The people of Morgana are also wanderers, in search of the meaningful that will transform the commonness of their lives and make the name of the town as magical as it sounds in its resemblance to the name Morgan la Fay. This search reveals the mysterious beauty that lies beneath the surfaces of their lives, and it is brought out by Miss Welty in an attempt to transform them. This movement and interest is typical of most of Eudora Welty's work.

The tone of the stories is rather unlike Miss Welty's earlier fiction, for there is not so much variety of mood here as in her early work, but rather a pervasive feeling of solemnity and sadness, even in such works as "Moon Lake," in which a "silver trout," this time a girl named Easter, is presumably drowned and brought back to shore, but is resurrected by Loch Morrison, a Boy Scout. Here the trout does not become a "glimmering girl" but remains a choking twelve-year-old with mud and blood coming from her mouth. The mystery of life is here, but the beauty is somewhat harder to perceive. There has been an acceptance of the symbols of Yeats, but an unwillingness to accept the direction in which the symbols lead. The search is there, but there is the sadness of the knowledge that there will be no glimmering girl.

Yet despite the solemnity and sadness there is the affirmation of human life and its values. In The Golden Apples the journey through innocence to experience and meaning is painful, and often the wanderers' knowledge is only of their predicament, not of its solution; but it is knowledge and knowledge won from experience. This affirmation is tied to the region, but the universal is symbolized in the regional, as is so often the case with Southern writers of today. Miss Welty's manner of achieving this universality of the human predicament is unique. She evokes the universal by invoking the mythic and the magical. She takes a real world, Mississippi, and makes it legendary, Morgana.

The title of the book is but the first hint of the pervasive use of myth and symbol. The poem from which the title is taken sets the mythical mood and the character and events are consonant with it. There is the figure of King MacLain, who seems to grow out of the character of Don McInnis in Miss Welty's early story, "Asphodel," a story which also makes use of myth for its mood of gentle fantasy. King first appears in "Shower of Gold" and reappears throughout most of the other stories, flitting in and out of the action like a golden butterfly. Morgana is in MacLain County, in fact, and thus even geographically the King's presence is to be felt. King finally comes to rest in the last story, "The Wanderers," but even there his vitality at the funeral of Mrs. Rainey is a source of amazement and admiration for Virgie Rainey. MacLain is not only king but also Zeus. There are many conscious allusions to him in this role. As a sort of wandering pagan god, he lies in wait for unsuspecting girls in the woods and peoples the town with his progeny. "Sir Rabbit" is a story of such a seduction. There is something beautiful as well as slyly humorous in his comings and goings, as we see all the children who have inherited their golden hair from his golden touch upon their mothers. Mrs. Rainey tells us in "Shower of Gold" that King has run away to the gold fields. Whenever he returns, he brings some of it with him.

There are many people in the town who are related to him. Randall and Eugene MacLain are not his only children. There are broad hints that Loch Morrison might be his child, and also Easter, the resurrected orphan girl in "Moon Lake." They both share his preoccupation with the vital forces of life and are wanderers like himself. Every one of the seven stories has a character related to him. Thus he is intimately connected with the golden apples as a unifying symbol; indeed he is more symbol than human, and connected with the wandering search that the quest for the golden apples entails. All of his fellow seekers and roamers are brought together in the final story, "The Wanderers," and each of these wanderers, like Aengus in Yeats's poem, has his own "song."

Perhaps the most attractive and memorable of these is Virgie Rainey, whose name connects her with King in his "Shower of Gold." Her father's name is Fate, and she is the best musician in all Morgana. Virgie is the protégée of Miss Eckhart, the outsider who is the music teacher for all of Morgana and who remains one of the most pathetic characters in the book. Miss Eckhart herself belongs to the large group of Welty grotesques, lonely and isolated characters who have been warped by their lack of love. In "June Recital" Miss Eckhart escapes from a mental institution to try to burn down the house in which she has taught her many lessons, giving the town music and getting nothing in return.

Virgie is Miss Eckhart's pupil, but not her disciple. Music has set her free, and she moves towards freedom by leaving Miss Eckhart to become the pianist at the silent movies and from there to various strangers passing through, to the final escape after her mother's death in "The Wanderers." She is joined as a wanderer with Randall MacLain, inheritor of his father's domain, for he is mayor of Morgana; in "The Whole World Knows" he creates tragedy by involving another in his quest. Maideen Sumrall commits suicide because Ran does not seem to be able to see beyond his own problems and thus realize that others are seekers also. Eugene MacLain discovers what it means to be a wanderer on a beach in California, where he has gone in company with a chance-met Spanish musician. Loch Morrison is the blower of the golden horn, the Boy Scout in charge of reveille at Moon Lake. Easter is the orphan who wants to be a singer. All the wanderers have their song.

The one constant feature of all these songs is that they are sung in silence, by solitary singers. Virgie accepts the gift of Beethoven from Miss Eckhart, but the gift does not bind her to the giver. That is the tragic and perhaps ennobling aspect of the wanderers. They give the gift of love, but love truly given separates and does not create a recognizable union. Those who truly know the value of the golden apples realize that the search is never over. What union there is remains a union in search of the unattainable. This is the community that is felt by some of the wanderers, notably Virgie. They are all victims of the search and that is the reason for the pervasive sadness. But in their common circumstance as victims they are also all heroes. Miss Welty expressed this idea well and characteristically at the end of "The Wanderers" by referring to the myth of Medusa and Perseus. To cut off the Medusa's head was heroic, but it revealed a horror about life that is life's separateness. Life is a condition in which both the Medusa and Perseus are ever-present. The glory is in the struggle; the tragedy in the lack of completion of that struggle. The golden apples are more beautiful because they will always be on the tree.

THE GOLDEN BOUGH

Type of work: Anthropology

Author: Sir James George Frazer (1854-1941)

First published: 1890-1915

The Golden Bough, perhaps the most famous work in modern anthropology, began appearing in 1890. Originally planned for two volumes, Frazer eventually expanded it to twelve, the last of which appeared in 1915. In 1936 he added a supplementary volume (Aftermath). The work is undoubtedly best known in the one-volume abridgment which Frazer published in 1922, a volume revised by Theodore Gaster in 1959.

Though many of Frazer's ideas have been superceded in the intervening years, his overall thesis has stood the test of time, and its influence outside the field of anthropology has been unprecedented. The influence of Frazer's work upon the poetry, fiction, and drama of the twentieth century was phenomenal; one has only to mention the notes T. S. Eliot appended to The Waste Land as one of the best-known examples.

From the dramatic opening scene, in which we see the doomed priest of Nemi stalking the grove of Diana at Aricia on the Italian coast, sword in hand, waiting for his unknown rival who will assail him, murder him, and become the priest in turn, Frazer investigates one basic theme. He pursues the meaning in myth and ritual of the sacrifice of the heroic leader, whose people are renewed through his death. Industriosly ransacking accounts of missionaries and travelers, Frazer transferred his data into huge notebooks from which he synthesized his parallel myths of the Near East and Europe, and composed his theories about the relations of myth to ritual, magic to religion, hero to god, leader to people. Frazer's power to synthesize is undoubtedly the key to his impact upon the intellectual climate of his time and ours. He never left his Cambridge study to investigate these matters at first hand; all his data was taken from correspondents and diarists. He studied the information thus acquired for its symbolic meaning, tracing the relationship between myths and religious rituals to the cultures which produced them and to those cultures that came later. As Freud showed man the profoundly significant world of the unconsciousness, Frazer showed our culture the elements and meanings of its group behavior, generally hidden in the past but often still alive in folk customs and belief.

Frazer's quest for the meaning of the life and death of the priest of Nemi took him through the mythology of the Mediterranean area and Europe. He first discusses magic and religion, suggesting that religion is the civilized offspring of primitive magic. Religion comes out of what he called "homoeopathic" or sympathetic magic, which associates acts through similarity. When the tribe or clan desires rain, the magician will command it through pouring water on the parched soil; the priest will invoke it by the same act. Frazer also postulates "contagious" magic, in which primitive man believes that things once associated can never be separated in the ideal sense. Here he cites the practice, known widely through voodoo, of endeavoring to harm a real person by maltreating a symbolic representation containing the intended victim's real hair or nail parings.

Frazer suggests that the primitive magician first became the tribal priest or medicine man (known to today's anthropologist as the shaman, from the name for this vocation among the Manchurians). Then, as civilization developed from primitive culture, he became the sacred king of his people. Retaining his religious import, this king in the highly developed ancient civilizations of the Near East became divine. Thus the myths of sacrificial death and spiritual rebirth are really stories that reveal the regimen of the king's rule. Through describing the myriad of totem and taboo customs that saturate the ritualized existence of the divine king, Frazer draws a portrait of a being whose life was set apart from the rest of the people by their need to solve cultural problems through his life and death. The physical and spiritual well-being of the tribe was literally dependent upon the well-being of the priest-king; hence the extraordinary number of rules (totem and taboo) governing his existence. Frazer also collects a number of stories of primitive people who either deposed or actually killed their shaman-king when his health or potency failed. This ritual death would explain, for Frazer, why the old priest at Nemi expected attack from a mysterious stranger who actually had been chosen to succeed him.

To show how the life and death of the king is related to myth, Frazer compiled parallel incidents from the tales of pagan deities such as Adonis, Attis, Osiris, Dionysus, Demeter, and Virbius. Adonis was said to be born of tree bark; his life was linked with fruition and his death was celebrated in the early spring. Killed by a boar on Mt. Lebanon, his body was said to join the land, for the red mud that washed down the rivers in the spring rains was said to be his blood. Thus the god literally fertilizes the land, and his resurrection, and the land's, is celebrated shortly after. By all these rites, Frazer maintains, primitive man in his ignorant simplicity confuses man with the earth and wish with fulfillment, trying to influence, even coerce nature itself, through homoeopathic magic. Frazer associates the death of Osiris with the flooding of the Nile, upon whose waters the fertility of Egyptian civilization depended. Osiris, like Orpheus, is said to have been torn apart by his sacred murderers and his body scattered to insure fecundity of land, animals, and men.

Other myths relate of the eating of the slain god for his power and holiness, and this obvious forerunner of transubstantiation in Christian communion Frazer traces in numerous cults. Cannibalism and the eating of sacred wine and bread are similar patterns of sympathetic magic.

Along with rites designed to bring health and prosperity, other primitive rituals were supposed to ward off danger and evil. In many rites a sacrificial victim or scapegoat served as a representative of general atonement for a whole people. Frazer suggests that frequently the sacrificed god served as a scapegoat, thus introducing the idea of sacrifice to later culture and to the literature created by civilization. He links this phenomenon with later festivals of saturnalia and carnival and their kings of misrule, who are allowed free conduct and then deposed.

Fire festivals throughout Europe are linked by Frazer both to seasonal religious ritual and to human and animal sacrifices. He suggests that the life-giving property of the sun is thus invoked, and the destructive power of fire is appeased through such complex ritual, especially at midsummer, which Frazer found to be the most widespread religious rite known to Aryans.

Finally, using the legend of the Norse god Balder, Frazer draws the threads of his theme together. Balder is alleged to have been slain by a branch of mistletoe and burned in a great funeral fire. The parasitical mistletoe is strange and magical because it is rootless, and it grows upon oaks; thus both mistletoe and oak are sacred. Frazer then returns to the sacred oak grove on the shore of Lake Nemi. The priest of the sacred wood is a representative of the divine king, the doomed god of organic life who must die that his spirit and power may be propagated throughout the world. The yellow, waxy mistletoe represents the spirit of the oak, the sacred tree, and is the golden bough carried by Vergil's Aeneas through the world of the dead in order to show the power of life available to the hero of myth and epic that enables him to triumph over death.

Later anthropologists and linguists have revised many of Frazer's speculations about the material he accumulated. Ironically, some of the principal revisions involve his primary concern. The sacred grove at Nemi was not of oak, and the famous bough was probably generalized greenery carried by supplicants in religious ceremony everywhere. The shrine at Nemi, most now agree, seems to have been some sort of sanctuary for escaped slaves, not a temple of a seasonal god of death and resurrection.

Also, scholars today find that Frazer was entirely too simplistic and logical in interpreting his material according to the tenets of his orderly Darwinian mind. He calls almost all men living in cultures before the birth of the city-state "primitive," but we now know how much stratification there was in so-called primitive culture. Religious ritual did not grow out of magical practice, for magic is a separate cultural phenomenon. Most of Frazer's deities are not merely seasonal or vegetable gods; they are also embodiments of divine force and heroic human qualities. Osiris, for example, is more the avatar of the sacredness of the Pharaoh than he is a vegetable deity. Frazer tended to oversimplify and often to denigrate his primitives, in tracing a too mechanical progress to the Victorian world. He was also handicapped through his method, for he, of necessity, relied on second-hand accounts compiled by amateur travelers, many of whom did not really know the cultures about which they reported and rarely knew the languages and dialects spoken in the regions they had visited.

But when one has made all these qualifications, he still finds, says T. H. Gaster, Frazer's contemporary editor, that this work has contributed more to the intellectual and artistic climate of our time than any other in the field of anthropology. Frazer's compilation is so vast that everywhere he turns up materials of myth and ritual that lie at the root of our customs and our literature, and survive in folk customs still associated with Christmas, Easter, and May Day. Frazer's work remains the most influential anthropological study known to literate people who are not students of the subject. Despite the voluminous number of examples cited by Frazer, the work possesses distinctive clarity and great dramatic drive. Its drama still moves because Frazer's primary plot is itself analogous to myth: the quest for the secret of the life and death of the haunted priest in the grove at Nemi.

THE GONCOURT JOURNALS

Authors: Edmond (1822-1896) and Jules (1830-1870) de Goncourt

First published: Three series in 9 volumes, 1887-1896

The Goncourt Journals were begun on December 2, 1851, the day on which Louis-Napoleon dissolved the National Assembly and made himself dictator, as a first step toward becoming Emperor of the French. The journals span the years of the Second Empire in France.

It was the intention of Edmond and Jules de Goncourt to capture and record "momentary reality" in their journals. They carefully noted their impressions and the actual words of men of their time. As in their realistic novels they tried to be objective, so in their journals they claim as their own an attempt at complete impartiality. Though Edmond was eight years older than Jules, they thought as one, and there is nothing to suggest any difference in opinion concerning the correct interpretation of any event or circumstance. The journals are in fact far from being objective or impartial. Part of their interest lies in the light these records of people and the age cast upon the personal preferences and prejudices of the Goncourts.

In the net they cast, the Goncourts catch not only the most outstanding men of letters of the period, but in addition acquaintances of the latter. Though Victor Hugo, for example, could not possibly be present in Paris at that time, since he was in exile in the Channel Islands, his literary or spiritual presence is very much felt; for both Gautier and Sainte-Beuve—friends of the Goncourts—had been very close to Hugo, and frequently reminisced about him.

The brothers were masters of the word portrait in miniature. To the initial portrait, new touches and shadings were added over the years, until eventually the person represented in it seems to acquire a life of his own within the journals. Moreover, so great is the Goncourts' success in revealing to the reader the antipathies and enthusiasms of the persons they describe, that even writers of previous centuries—Voltaire, Diderot, Molière, Corneille—seem to be given a breath of new life in these pages.

The Goncourt brothers did not depend fully upon their writing for an income. However, they were members of a relatively new breed of men in France; that is, they were professional men of letters, imaginative writers in the hire of a society with whose ideals they did not necessarily agree. The brothers share with other artists of the period characteristic preoccupations and dislikes. Thus, as a document giving information about the current of ideas during the Second Empire, the journals are precious.

The exasperation caused by the severity of censorship under Napoleon the Third is shown as not being by any means peculiar to Baudelaire and Flaubert. In the journals, it emerges as a pattern of frustration. Similarly, Baudelaire's preference for the town over the country and his very fear of nature are shown to be sentiments that the Goncourts understand and feel also; by a process of extension that the reader will readily operate, this aversion will be viewed as rather characteristic of the age. The Goncourts, with their extremely refined sensibility, their artistic tastes, and their Parisian life, voice their hostility to Nature in several places. In one they ask whether a thinking man does not feel ill at ease in the country, as if in the presence of an enemy.

While it is true that the Goncourts did seem to prefer the city to the country, this fact should not be interpreted as a stamp of approval for the industrialization and mercantilism spreading throughout France in the 1850's and 1860's. In places, there are references to the "American Babylon" that the Goncourts feared France was becoming. Their distaste for the "Exposition Universelle" of 1867 is made very plain. For them, it was a symbol and a summing up of the "Americanization" and industrialization which they resented. In another interesting entry, the brothers lay bare what was for them a symptom of creeping commercialism in France: they point out that in the bookshops of Paris the bookseller has given up the practice of leaving out a chair for his customers. The new emphasis, the Goncourts claim, is upon buying, not browsing. Their distaste, incidentally, was common to many writers of the time.

Unlike the creations of Balzac's vast imagination, the real literary figures who appear and reappear in the journals do not come with their price tag, their holdings of property and money, attached. Nonetheless, there is, throughout the journals, a keen awareness of the new importance of money in the nineteenth century, a sense both of the servitude it can impose and the liberty it can permit. Even the disinterested Sainte-Beuve is seen to reflect ruefully upon the meager income which will be his for three whole years of hard work as a critic.

At times, the Goncourts let fall a remark which seems at first rather insignificant, yet makes the reader pause to reflect. Thus, after mentioning that they have no ear for music, the Goncourts indicate that this weakness is shared by Gautier, while they even claim that Lamartine, Balzac, and Hugo actively disliked music.

In places, the Goncourts reveal a truly poetic talent. They show the poet's partiality for the metaphor, and they have the ability to express almost any idea in the form of an image. Thus they will compare a house and its occupants to a living body. The artists (the head, the Goncourts eloquently claim) always seem to live on the top floor; on the ground floor are to be found the shopkeepers, the legs; in between, of course, are the bourgeois—a great digestive tract.

Needless to say, the journals are filled with entries giving an insight into the life and works of the Goncourts themselves.

One can find, for example, the chronicle of the last sickness of their devoted servant Rose. One discovers with them, as it were, her carefully hidden vice, her licentiousness, and the pangs of conscience to which it made her subject. There is more than a suggestion here of the theme of their novel Germinie Lacerteux. Staring from every page is their old-maidish meticulousness, their highly individual tastes and fancies. Their cure for boredom at one stage is the purchase of two old, silver-gilt embossed Saint-Cloud teapots in a box with a fleur-de-lis lock. It is fascinating to remark that as far as the eighteenth century was concerned, the Goncourts were interested far less in the "philosophies" than in the handicrafts of that century. Their satisfaction with their collection of objects of art and their pride at introducing the French public to the arts of the Orient are made obvious.

In observing themselves pass through successive moods, the Goncourts frequently translate for the reader the torments of a hypersensitive nature struggling to find expression in a play or a novel. Their frustrations, as well as the joy of creation, are often recorded in significant detail; the register of the stages of the creative process make for most interesting reading.

The name of the Goncourts will always be associated with the Magny dinners. It was at these dinners, arranged to be held every two weeks at the instigation of Sainte-Beuve, that the brothers were best able to observe under one roof some of the leading figures of the intellectual world of the Second Empire. To be sure, they complained, in an entry dated June 6, 1865, after they had been attending the dinners for over two years, that these affairs were characterized mainly by the lack of daring and the paucity of original talent shown by the guests attending them. Be this as it may, the Goncourts' impressions of dinners and guests constitute a most important part of the journals.

Among the names which are mentioned most frequently in connection with the dinners is that of Sainte-Beuve. However, Gautier, Flaubert, Taine, Renan, Claude Bernard, and others come and go.

In spite of a footnote suggesting that their remarks about Sainte-Beuve were dictated by unbiased, scrupulous observation, the reader comes away with the impression that the masterly writer of Port-Royal has been treated with singular harshness by the writers of the journals. Here, as in all their portraits, the Goncourts introduce Sainte-Beuve to the reader by first offering a description of his appearance, comparing his pale forehead and ruddy cheeks to the impressions of a provincial librarian whose book-filled cloister is over a cellar filled with rich red wines. The method used to describe Sainte-Beuve is, ironically, the one that the critic himself advocated. After watching him closely and recording his words and thoughts and even handshake, the brothers later attempt to record Sainte-Beuve's patterns of thinking, while never losing sight of his appearance, filling in the picture as they see it. The completed portrait is scarcely appealing, being suggestive of ugliness and pettiness, while barely indicating the greatness of the subject.

Occasionally, a note of succinct smugness pierces in an entry such as that of December 14, 1868, which records that Zola, whom they called their admirer, lunched with them that day.

The vagaries of Gustave Flaubert's vast imagination and his extravagance, recorded in detail by the Goncourts, provide some intriguing information about that great novelist. In any century but the nineteenth, Flaubert, as seen through the eyes of the Goncourts, would have seemed unique in his immensity. The Goncourts also record in their journals the massive enthusiasms, aversions, and extravagances of Théophile Gautier, with whom they were very friendly, as well as memories and impressions retained by others of Honoré de Balzac and Victor Hugo. Hugo, living in exile, could not be present at the Magny dinners. Absent, his literary presence was nonetheless felt. His immense stature does on occasion cast a large shadow on the group around the table at the Magny dinners.

With Jules' last, long illness, Edmond was to take up the pen which his brother had been forced to let drop. Edmond's courage in continuing to note down his impressions in spite of his great feeling of discouragement lends a new grandeur to the journals and allows the reader to forget the brothers' occasional pettiness, their harshness toward some associates, their biased indulgence toward others.

The Goncourt Journals have been rather neglected in recent years by the casual reader, if not by the critic. Diffuse they are, and sometimes petty, yet they are most readable as well as a rich source of information about the temper of the Second Empire period. They flatter the reader by letting him view from close up some of the outstanding men of letters of the nineteenth century. Though not always entirely reliable in their judgments, the Goncourts have the supreme merit of making the reader wish to go on exploring the writings of the novelists and playwrights and poets to whom he has been introduced informally.

THE GOOD SOLDIER: SCHWEIK

Type of work: Novel

Author: Jaroslav Hašek (1883-1923)

Type of plot: Military satire

Time of plot: World War I

Locale: Bohemia, Austria

First published: 1920-1923

Principal characters:

JOSEF SCHWEIK, a soldier

JINDRICH LUKASH, a Lieutenant, Schweik's superior

OTTO KATZ, a chaplain

COLONEL KRAUS, Lieutenant Lukash's superior

LIEUTENANT DUB, a former schoolmaster

Critique:

Schweik is probably the strangest war hero to return from the battlefields of World War I. Written originally in Czech, The Good Soldier: Schweik found its way into many recent histories of German literature. One reason for this increased interest is that German literature was not able to provide such a satirical masterpiece of the follies of war. Although the novel never achieved the popularity of Remarque's All Quiet on the Western Front, it nevertheless became one of the war classics of the period. The superb characterization of Schweik is frequently compared to Bertolt Brecht's dramatic power. Another reason for classifying this novel as German literature is the fact that Hašek lived in Prague at a time when German literature had its greatest success there. Franz Werfel, Rainer Maria Rilke, and Max Brod all belonged to the active circle of German-speaking writers in Prague. Franz Kafka was a friend of Hašek long before The Good Soldier: Schweik was written. Hašek himself, the son of a mathematics teacher, was born in Prague. To earn a living, he started to work as a bank clerk, but soon he devoted himself exclusively to writing. Before World War I he had published sixteen volumes of short stories. During the war he was taken prisoner on the Eastern Front and spent several years in Russia as a prisoner of war. His experiences as a soldier are reflected in his novel. Hašek died in 1923 when he had only four volumes of the planned six volumes about Schweik completed; however the book was sufficient in scope to bring alive the unforgettable Schweik. It is not surprising that the unperturbed Schweik, an antithesis of all things for which Prussian militarism stands, found no friends in the Third Reich, where the book was burned. After World War II The Good Soldier: Schweik found a larger audience than ever before. In his preface to the book Hašek notes, that there are unrecognized heroes who surpass figures like Napoleon or Alexander the Great. Schweik probably would not have understood the meaning of such comparisons, and would have replied modestly to all inquiries about his importance: "I am Schweik."

The Story:

Schweik, by profession a dog trader, was discharged from his military service saddled with the classification of "feeble minded." However, the shots at Sarajevo, which signaled the beginning of World War I, brought Schweik back into the army. A careless remark soon led to his arrest, but he convinced the police of his feeble-minded condition and was sent to a lunatic asylum. Medical authorities were so much irritated by the cheerful Schweik that they classified him as a malingering of weak intellect, and he was sent back to the police. The ability of Schweik to give the most innocent and confusing replies to all bureaucratic inquiries caused the police to send him home again.

When the Austrian Army suffered its first major losses, however, the war ministry decided that Schweik should be conscripted into military service once more. Schweik came to the medical examination in a wheel chair, with crutches by his side to indicate the bad state of his rheumatism. The army doctor, who was in the habit of finding everybody fit for service, was incensed by Schweik's performance. Thus the first station of the good soldier Schweik was the military prison. Treatment in the infirmary of the military prison was aimed at speeding up the desire of each patient to serve his fatherland away from the infirmary.

The major diversion in the prison was the Mass celebrated by the chaplain, Otto Katz, a priest whose love for alcohol surpassed by far his dedication to priestly duties. Otto Katz, impressed by the qualities of Schweik, requested, that the soldier be assigned to him as an orderly. In this capacity Schweik became indispensable as an altar boy during Mass, as a helper at various drinking bouts, and as a stimulating partner during unorthodox religious debates.

But Schweik's good fortune did not last long. Chaplain Katz was as fond of gambling as he was of wine. During a poker game Schweik was lost by Katz to Lieutenant Lukash, who was beloved by his subordinates but disliked by his superiors. Now Schweik was expected to handle many delicate situations in connection with Lieutenant Lukash's love for the opposite sex. Frequently the lieutenant despaired over the embarrassing predicaments which seemed to develop each time Schweik was handling a project.

One day Schweik procured a dog. The animal, which he gave to Lieutenant Lukash, actually belonged to one of Lukash's superiors, Colonel Kraus. When the lieutenant took an evening stroll, he had a most unpleasant encounter with Colonel Kraus, who recognized his missing pet. The colonel arranged for a prompt transfer of the lieutenant. Thus Lieutenant Lukash and orderly Schweik became members of a battalion destined for front-line duty.

On the train Schweik managed to insult a fellow passenger who turned out to be an Inspector General. He also inadvertently released the emergency brake. Unable to pay the requested fine, he was taken from the train, much to the delight of Lieutenant Lukash, who had not yet recovered from the incident of the dog. The train moved on without Schweik, who soon found himself considered a mistreated war hero by the people at the railroad station. A collection was taken up to pay his fine, and he was entertained with free beer. Later military police arrested Schweik when they discovered that he was without papers of identification. A cross examination, conducted at headquarters, frustrated the investigating officer, and he ordered Schweik to proceed on foot to the destination point which he was supposed to have reached by train.

Schweik, marched off in the wrong direction and was arrested as a suspected spy. An ambitious sergeant, interpreting Schweik's confusing way of answering questions as highly intelligent evasions, considered him a prize catch. Schweik was transferred to higher authorities, but the captain in charge preferred to believe the implausible explanation of Schweik to the more implausible report which the sergeant had prepared. Schweik was returned to his regiment and to the surprised Lieutenant Lukash, who, determined that Schweik should not be of any further embarrassment to him, ordered Schweik transferred to the regimental dungeon for unauthorized absence from duty. However, after three days Lieutenant Lukash's superior officer, who nourished a grudge against him, sent Schweik back to the lieutenant to resume his old position, and Lieutenant Lukash was forced to accept the unavoidable situation.

Before long Lieutenant Lukash discovered a lady whom he considered a good prospect for another amorous adventure. Schweik was assigned to deliver a letter to the lady, but the letter reached her husband instead. Thus the delivery of the letter turned into a street fight, which in turn resulted in Schweik's arrest and a great deal of unfavorable publicity around the garrison.

Lieutenant Lukash was now appointed company commander of a unit on its way to the Russian front; he also had strict orders to take Schweik along as a company orderly. In his new duty post Schweik's first assignment was that of telephone operator, a duty which gave him ample opportunity to confuse the preparations for the transfer to the front. His next contribution to frustrate the war effort occurred when he exercised again his common-sense judgment. A coding system based on the second volume of a novel was to be used by the regiment; however, Schweik distributed the first volume because he was of the opinion that everybody should start reading a book at the beginning. As a result, the regiment was without a coding system.

The most disliked officer of the regiment was Lieutenant Dub, a former schoolteacher who considered it his duty to transplant barracks drill discipline to the front line. Several episodes with Schweik convinced Lieutenant Dub that he had enough material for court-martial proceedings against Schweik. Then, during a short day in a small village, Schweik was ordered to look for Lieutenant Dub; he discovered his superior drunk in a brothel. This discovery gave Schweik an opportunity to ridicule the lieutenant in front of all the soldiers. Schweik was also valuable in assisting the quartermaster to find billets and supplies.

Schweik's last assignment was an order from Lieutenant Lukash to find the road to the next village. Schweik, trusting his common sense, disregarded the map and lost his way. When he approached a pond, he found a Russian prisoner of war taking a bath. The sight of Schweik caused the Russian to flee stark naked. Schweik could not resist the temptation to try on the Russian's uniform. At this moment soldiers arrived to recapture the escaped "enemy." Schweik was assigned to a gang of Russian prisoners repairing the railroad leading to the Russian front.

THE GREAT PLAINS

Type of work: History

Author: Walter Prescott Webb (1888-1963)

First published: 1931

Since The Great Plains was published in 1931 it has become one of the cardinal texts of American Studies, the most significant extension within the United States of the ideas of Frederick Jackson Turner, for despite criticism of both Turner and Webb, their work has served its purpose, that of setting up new frames around known facts and encouraging the exploration of the blank spaces within those borders. But The Great Plains belongs in two other contexts. One is the great development of Southwestern studies associated with people like J. Frank Dobie and John Lomax in the first four decades of this century. The second is the canon of the four historical works by Walter Prescott Webb, of which this is the second. The four began with a commissioned history of the Texas Rangers. Contemplation of the effect of the introduction of the six-shooter on the Plains became the germ and center of The Great Plains. Webb later turned to consider the imperial-colonial relations of Eastern capital and Western development in Divided We Stand. Finally he produced his own expanded version of Turner's "frontier thesis" in The Great Frontier, an interpretation of European and world history since 1492 in terms of the influence of the frontier on the metropolis.

The genesis of Webb's thesis about the Great Plains is briefly described in the preface of this work, in his presidential address in 1958 to the American Historical Society, and in his rejection of Fred A. Shannon's "Appraisal" of the book for the Social Science Research Council in 1939. "Appraisal," Webb's rejection of it, and the conference which involved author and appraiser were the severest testing of the work. The summary of the conference showed that it is impossible to use or even to obtain all the facts needed to support such a general thesis as Webb's, and that the decision did not affect the growing use of the book by all sorts of people from English students to game wardens. The continuing appeal rests on the scope and novelty of the thesis, as well as on its studied presentation. The orderly sequence of chapters and the clear divisions within chapters are typical of Webb's work, as is the use of long quotations and epigraphs as well as the use of questions to suggest hypotheses.

Walter Prescott Webb is not a social scientist but an institutional historian whose thesis developed out of and back into his famous Frontier Seminar at the University of Texas. The subtitle, "A Study in Environment and Institutions," states his intention to study the influence of the former on the latter, and the guiding genius of his work is probably that figure who lurks behind Turner's thesis: John Wesley Powell, Director of the United States Geological Survey. In accepting the postulate that man does change in response to his environment Webb follows a long line of distinguished historical writers from Buckle and Taine to Ellsworth Huntington; their task has usually been to assert the sudden illumination which contemplation of one historical fact has provided: in Turner's case the census of 1890; in Webb's the six-shooter. Although Turner imagined the frontier as a series of bands of transition between savage and civilized life, Webb depends heavily on a fixed geographical frontier, the ninety-eighth meridian, as the cause of so sharp a change in human institutions that he calls it an "institutional fault." Webb and Turner are alike, however, in that they are students of variables in history, not of a continuing tradition or line of development; further, they are unlike most historians who prefer to see change as the result of time, not of place. The difference between Webb and his critic, Shannon, has been summarized as simply that between two kinds of historians: those who see the woods and those who study the trees.

The Great Plains consists of an introductory chapter and ten chapters corresponding to the eleven questions which, Webb says, contemplation of the Plains suggested to him as a historian. The introductory chapter is in some ways the crux of the book and has become, next to the whole question of geographic determinism, the main point of criticism against the Webb thesis: the attempt to isolate a part of a whole (here a part of the United States—the Great Plains—from the continent) is always the first step in regional studies; unless the region is shown to have a genuine unity or entity the study cannot proceed. Webb's criteria are three: the region is defined by being relatively level, subhumid, and treeless. The second chapter contains an elaboration of the author's introduction. The next two chapters show the successful adaptation of one race, the Plains Indians, and the failure to adapt of the Spanish colonizing culture. The next five chapters (V to IX) cover the American settlement in three stages: early setbacks because of a new and different environment, adaptations which allowed conquest, and institutional adaptations resulting from settlement. These chapters constitute three-fifths of the book. The remaining two chapters show less tangible adaptations in a rough sketch of the literature of the Great Plains, and the final chapter presents a set of seven additional larger questions about the meaning of the Great Plains experience in American life, questions which led to The Great Frontier.

Webb discovered the "institutional fault" at the ninety-eighth meridian by recognizing four aspects of the Plains: its indigenous inhabitants (the Plains Indians), lack of timber, level land, and relative lack of water. Although the conditions varied slightly in the three subregions of the Plains he distinguished, they were all markedly different from the pioneering conditions met by the American settler on the frontier from the coast to the Mississippi. Five technological developments enabled the American to settle the Plains: the six-shooter, the railroad, barbed wire, windmills, and farm machinery; in two phases these altered the human institutions for transporting and controlling stock, and for granting land and water rights. The first phase was the Cattle Kingdom, achieved by the revolver and the railroad; the latter in turn, together with the other three technological developments, swept away the Cattle Kingdom for the second phase, homesteading. Webb does not pursue the thesis up to the Dust Bowl, but that would seem in part to confirm his thesis that man was not using the tools the environment meant him to use, and in part to deny it because in his view the environment seemed powerless to insist that man use the right tools. Webb suggests, the Great Plains themselves summoned the six-shooter into commercial production. But he does agree that time tends to smooth out the "institutional fault."

A further difficulty in reaching a total view of an arbitrarily isolated historical phenomenon is seen in The Great Plains, for two activities proceed apace. At the same time that the life in the Great Plains is being analyzed and categorized in the appropriate chapters, an explanation of the historical cause of each aspect of that life is being urged in terms on one total thesis. The antithesis, then, could maintain that there is little effect of environment on institutions and, by piecemeal analysis, assert that what has been proved in selected aspects must be true of all. Webb maintained, however, in 1939 and elsewhere, that he would welcome such a critique; but none has been forthcoming and his thesis is therefore still unchallenged as a working hypothesis, at the very least, of what happened during an exciting period in American history. Undoubtedly Webb's own Great Plains ancestry and pioneer forebears led him, like Turner, to apply his gifts as a historian in an imaginative recapitulation of the Great Plains experience. While this personal involvement sometimes makes his writing more assertive than is usual in history textbooks, it is also the quality which continues to attract students and laymen to his work.

FOTIS, a priest, the leader of a refugee band

Two world figures as dissimilar as Thomas Mann and Albert Schweitzer spoke up in public praise of Nikos Kazantzakis, the Greek novelist introduced to American readers by Zorba the Greek in 1953. One wonders, however, whether their admiration sprang from his earlier picaresque novel, the lively account of a pantheistic and pagan spirit adrift in the modern world, or from the quite different story of savage emotions and primitive religious feeling that he told in The Greek Passion. These two novels make it clear that Kazantzakis is capable of widely varied effects in his fiction, though both in their ways create a haunting, poetic atmosphere and a depth of serious insight into human necessities and motives.

On Easter Tuesday of an unspecified year—the time is apparently about 1920 since there is mention of the Bolshevik Revolution—the Greek elders of Lycovrissi gather to select the principals of the Passion Play given every seven years, at Easter time, under the portico of the church. Lycovrissi is a remote village in the mountains of Anatolia. Its poor, illiterate, superstitious peasants, although they have dim memories of the greatness of their Hellenic past, have lived under harsh Turkish rule for centuries. Only two men in the town know anything about the outside world. One is Captain Fortounas, a drunken old sailor retired from his rough seafaring life. The other is the Turkish Agha, overlord of the village, a gross, sensual man who spends his days drinking raki and his nights amusing himself with pretty boys.

The elders reveal themselves as an avaricious, corrupt lot as they discuss possible candidates for the Passion Play. Eventually Manolios, a handsome young shepherd betrothed to the archon's illegitimate daughter Lenio, is selected as the Christ; Michelis, the archon's son, as John; Yannakos, a rascally peddler, as Peter; Kostandis, the innkeeper, as James; Panayotaros, a red-bearded, sly man nicknamed Plaster-eater, as Judas, and the widow Katerina, a woman of warm heart and easy virtue, as Mary Magdalene. The principals must be selected a year in advance so that they may prepare themselves for the responsibilities of their roles in re-enacting the story of the Passion and the Crucifixion.

On the same day a party of miserable refugees arrives in the village. Driven from their homes by their Turkish masters, they are sick and starving after their long journey to find a place where they may settle. One ancient man carries the bones of his ancestors on his back. Their leader is an ascetic priest named Fotis, who asks for food for his people and land on which they may build their homes. Many of the villagers are sympathetic, but Priest Grigoris, a selfish, domineering man, wants no religious rival in the neighborhood. Unfeelingly he orders the refugees to move on, and when one woman collapses and dies from hunger he shouts that she has died of cholera in his efforts to arouse the credulous villagers against the refugees.

Manolios, already feeling himself a changed man because he has been chosen to suffer the five wounds and the burden of the cross, persuades Michelis, Yannakos, and others to help the distressed people. Fotis' band is allowed to take refuge in the caves on the summit of Mount Sarakina nearby. Grigoris is enraged when Manolios and Michelis take from the archon's cellar four baskets filled with food to feed the famished women and children. Because Michelis is betrothed to his daughter Mariori, Grigoris claims that the gift is actually a theft of goods that were partly his.

Manolios withdraws to his mountain hut to battle with his weaknesses of the flesh, for he feels that if he is to act the part of Christ he must struggle to become Christlike. Much to her distress, he denies Lenio. When his face breaks out in strange sores he believes that God is punishing him because his dreams at night are filled with visions of Katerina. Lenio, disappointed in her wedding plans, gives herself to Nikolio, a lusty young pagan who is Manolios' assistant in herding the archon's flocks. As the summer passes the other characters in the Passion Play change also and begin to act more in accordance with their roles in the biblical story. Michelis gives up Mariori, defies his father, and eventually goes off to live with Manolios in his retreat. Yannakos foils the scheme of Ladas, the village miser, to cheat the refugees of the few valuables they have left. Kostandis gives them alms. Katerina no longer opens her door to her midnight callers. Panayotaros, eaten by jealousy, plans to revenge himself on Manolios, whom he blames for the widow's new-found virtue.

One morning the Agha's youthful favorite is found dead in his bed. Wild with rage and grief, he arrests the village elders and threatens to hang one man each day until the murderer is discovered. Because of a strange dream he has had, Manolios believes that he must offer himself as a sacrifice and he confesses to the slaying. When another jealous servant of the Agha's household is revealed as the killer, the people of Lycovrissi show no gratitude to the shepherd for his offer to die that other innocent people may be saved. He infuriates Grigoris still more when he tries to preach a sermon on charity and compassion at the Feast of St. Elijah.

As winter draws on, the plight of Fotis and his band grows more desperate. Manolios, who has been carving the wooden mask of a gentle Christ, carves a new mask of savagery: not the kind, compassionate Christ, but a warrior who came not to bring peace but a sword. It is as a Christ of burning and destruction that Manolios leads the refugees in a raid on Lycovrissi on Christmas Eve. But Panayotaros has already played the part of Judas and the attack fails. Grigoris becomes Caiaphas and the Agha Pontius Pilate to Manolios' Christ. The shepherd dies of his wounds. Fotis and his band begin their wanderings once more.

On the level of symbolism Kazantzakis has kept fairly close the spirit if not the actual events of the New Testament story. His one great departure is the scene of violence which gives the novel its grim climax. Those likely to be shocked should remember that it was the real Christ who in fury scourged the moneylenders from the temple. Perhaps the author implies that in our disordered world of today there is no real place for a Christ of compassion and love. The Manolios who leads the attack on the village is no longer the meek shepherd he was at the beginning of the novel. Yet the change has been accounted for in the visions that came to him in his solitary retreat. In a dream he had seen Christ descending the mountain, his sad, angry face turned toward Lycovrissi, and carrying a can of petrol instead of a cross.

The Greek Passion is a story of man's desperate, at times despairing, attempt to war with evil in the world about him. The work is well named. It is a fable of mankind's deeply rooted passions for freedom and the survival of the race and for a faith which carries with it the promise of salvation. It is a book of pathos, humor, vulgarity, beauty, and tragedy, a dark and disturbing picture of human striving and failing. Greed and lust struggle with pity and moral justice. And the author's final appeal is to the Christian conscience. These qualities make this a novel to be remembered for a long time because of the truth and strange beauty of its message.

GREENE'S GROATSWORTH OF WIT BOUGHT WITH A MILLION OF REPENTANCE

Type of work: Semi-autobiographical moral tale

Author: Robert Greene (c. 1558-1592)

First published: 1592

Principal characters:

ROBERTO, a scholar, turned playwright and rogue

LUCANIO, his gullible brother

LAMILIA, a courtesan

Little in the narrative of "Greene's Groatworth of Wit, Bought with a Million of Repentance" distinguishes it from dozens of other Elizabethan tales of rogues and courtesans. Yet the pamphlet has attracted attention far beyond that merited by its intrinsic literary worth for its comments on the actors and dramatists of Greene's day, and in particular for one of the earliest allusions to William Shakespeare.

Greene composed the little book in 1592 when he was on his deathbed, cloaking his own misadventures in the story of one Roberto, a scholar who turns to playwriting and to vice. He ends the work with an extensive list of morals to be drawn from his experiences and issues a special warning "to those Gentlemen his Quondam acquaintance, that spend their wits in making plays."

Greene tells his tale in a plain, unadorned style, showing some of his dramatic skill in the dialogue. He concentrates his attention on only a few significant episodes and summarizes other experiences in a sentence or two. The story opens as Gorinius, an old usurer who lives in a city with strong resemblances to London, addresses his sons from his deathbed. He counsels the younger, Lucanio, his heir, to follow his example and "heap treasure upon treasure" in every way possible, moral or immoral, advising him above all to disregard conscience where profit is involved. He disinherits his older son, Roberto, who had dared to condemn his father and others of his profession for their unscrupulous dealings and leaves him only "an old goat where-with I wish him to buy a goatsworth of wit: for he in my life hath reproved my manner of life, and therefore at my death shall not be contaminated with corrupt gain."

Up to this point the story has followed the stock plot of the good child who prospers in virtue and the evil one who suffers the consequences of sin and folly. But Greene adds a new twist to the tale. Roberto forsakes the path of right when he sees his brother's good fortune, and he devotes all his energies to securing Lucanio's wealth. He gives up his studies and plots with a courtesan, Lamilia, to ensnare his innocent, malleable brother. According to the plan, Roberto is to induce Lucanio to wed Lamilia in return for half the wealth she will gain in the alliance.

Lamilia entertains Lucanio with a seductive song of pleasure and quickly makes an ardent suitor of him. The narrative comes to a temporary halt as the three settle down to dinner together. Roberto proposes to tell a tale about the hazards of love, but Lamilia interrupts him with a fable about a crafty fox who makes a match between a badger and a ewe. On the eve of the wedding he kills the ewe and escapes, leaving the badger to the mercy of passing shepherds, who believe him guilty of the sheep's death. The connection of Lamilia's fable with the plot is obscure; she concludes by telling Roberto, "Go forward with your tale, seek not by sly insinuation to turn our mirth to sorrow."

Roberto launches into a complicated story about the daughter of an old squire, who chooses from all her suitors a farmer's son and marries him. A young gentleman who wanted her for himself schemes to betray the couple. With the help of an old country woman and her daughter he makes the farmer unfaithful to his bride on their wedding night and wins her for himself. The moral of this tale is "the effects of sudden love."

With these more or less irrelevant episodes concluded, Lamilia and Lucanio settle down to play cards. Lucanio, unsuspecting, inevitably loses large sums to the lady, but his ardor is not dampened. Roberto is the first to suffer, for Lamilia simply laughs at him when he asks for half her winnings. She tells Lucanio enough of their plot to make him cut all ties with Roberto but not enough to spoil her plans for marriage.

Roberto, now penniless, is heard by an actor as he bemoans his fate and curses false women. The prosperous player tells him of the material advantages of working in the theater, describes some of his own successful parts, and suggests that Roberto join his company as a playwright.

As Roberto takes up his new career Lucanio's fortunes plummet. Lamilia takes all his money and his property, then turns him out on the street, penniless, in rags. He works for Roberto for a time, then turns to vice and ends his life as "a notorious Pandar." Greene wastes little time in describing Lucanio's misfortunes; he is primarily concerned with Roberto's fall.

The latter fares little better than his brother. Alternately well-to-do and penniless, he becomes expert in all kinds of crimes, regularly cheating his landladies, failing to produce any work for which he is paid in advance, and leaving his virtuous wife to amuse himself with women of the streets. At last he finds himself despised by his acquaintances, ill, and down to that single groat left him by his father. Repenting, he addresses it: "O now it is too late, too late to buy wit with thee: and therefore will I see if I can sell to careless youth what I negligently forgot to buy."

At this point Greene leaves Roberto and draws his own morals, first in a poem on the deceptive pleasures of the world, then in ten rules for virtuous living. He concludes the pamphlet with specific counsel to his playwright friends. His first remarks are addressed to a famous tragedian, probably Christopher Marlowe, who had died an atheist: "Why should thy excellent wit, [God's] gift, be so blinded, that thou shouldst give no glory to the giver?" This man's example must be avoided at all costs.

He next speaks to "young Juvenal, that biting Satirist, that lastly with me together writ a Comedy," warning him to direct his criticism to general faults, not to specific individuals, for the latter course makes bitter enemies. Finally, he warns all his friends against the ingratitude of actors, "those Puppets that spake from our mouths, those Antics garnished in our colors." They have forsaken him and left him to starve; they may do the same thing to his friends.

He is especially bitter about one player, "an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tiger's heart wrapped in a Player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you: and being an absolute Johannes fac totum, is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a country." The allusion here is certainly to Shakespeare, who was both actor and dramatist and wrote in one of his early plays of a "tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide."

Greene ends his pamphlet by retelling Aesop's fable of the grasshopper and the ant. He is the grasshopper who spends the summer in revelry and starves in winter, while the provident ant feasts on the food he has stored up.

"Greene's Groatworth of Wit" has almost no literary unity; it combines prose and verse, narrative and morality, fiction and personal reminiscence. It is, however, typical of the vast body of rather amorphous pamphlet literature of Elizabethan England, and it is a valuable document for the history of the English drama.

THE GUIDE

Type of work: Novel

Author: R. K. Narayan (1906-)

Time: The present

Locale: Malgudi, India

First published: 1958

Principal characters:

RAILWAY RAJU, a tourist guide, later a swami

MARCO, an Indian art historian

ROSIE, later NALINI, Marco's wife, a dancer

VELAN, Swami Raju's disciple

GAFFUR, a chauffeur and taxi driver

R. K. Narayan is a persistent rather than a highly gifted novelist, a craftsman whose command of the English novel is sufficient for his purposes. One could specify one of his purposes as the creation in a series of novels of the imaginary town of Malgudi were it not that the town is not as clearly realized on the page as, for example, E. M. Forster's Chandrapore in A Passage to India. Narayan seems to know intimately his locale and characters and sets them in motion with as little explanation as possible. It is probable that his novels would come more vividly to life if one were to know India intimately; on the other hand, the lack of Indian artifacts in the foreground of the action makes it easier simply to see his characters as people like ourselves. This was Narayan's prime intention in embarking on the difficult role of writing Indian novels, in English, but about wholly Indian characters, scenes, customs, and events. In a B.B.C. interview he said he wrote for readers who saw themselves as citizens of Malgudi, the town he created in 1930 to hold the characters of his novels and his short stories.

The Guide is an extended pun or triple allegory based on the title: Raju, the hero, is known as Railway Raju because he develops a large clientele of Indians who arrive at the railway station from the large cities of the subcontinent to be shown the past wonders of Malgudi, the Mempi Peaks, and the sacred Sarayu River. The tourist "guide" of the title, Raju also becomes the swami or holy man of the village and thus the guide to future life, especially during a dreadful drought. Furthermore, in describing the activities of Raju, his mistress Rosie, a low-caste dancing girl, and her husband Marco, an art historian, Narayan gives us a short guided tour of Indian culture, a common ingredient in the Indo-Anglian novel. There is a fourth possible meaning in the title which extends its relevance into that shadowy area Westerners find hard to appreciate: all the characters seem controlled or "guided" by a force other than theirs or the novelist's, as in Raju's slow acquiescence in the unaccustomed role pushed on him by the villagers. The novel may be a philosophic disquisition in a minor key on the whole question of one's "guide" in life, as against the Western notion of one's "goal" in life.

The circular structure of the novel supports such a philosophic construction. Composed of two stories told alongside each other, it tells of the two lives of Raju. His worldly existence as Railway Raju is told in reminiscences in the first person, first in flashbacks inserted into the first two chapters, then in the whole of chapters three and five; finally he tells the story of his life, from the beginning of his association with Rosie, to the swami's faithful servitor, Velan, during the first night of his twelve-day fast. That story ends with his serving two years in jail for forgery. His entirely different or second life as a swami begins on his release from jail. When he performs an apparent miracle for Velan by reconciling the latter's sister-in-law to the family plans for her marriage—Raju simply temporizes—he becomes the spiritual leader of the village. But after he foolishly entrusts a verbal message for Velan to an idiot cowherd he learns with dismay that the village assumes with gratitude that he has decided to break the drought by fasting to death. He attempts to escape this unexpected spiritual duty by sneaking food and by confessing to Velan the wickedness of his past life. The attempt fails; Velan seems to miss the point that the swami feels unworthy to undertake such a duty. The novel ends ambiguously as the exhausted swami announces that he feels the rains coming and collapses in Velan's arms.

Each story has a "birth" and "death" with the contrast between the lives strongly drawn. Although Raju retains the selfishness and callousness of the entrepreneur in his second life as a swami, in the end the circumstances defeat his own proclivities. When he realizes that being a swami is a way of getting free food from the offerings of the villagers, he postpones making any move from the abandoned temple in which he took refuge when he was released from jail. His mistake, which is also his salvation, occurs while he is trying to hint to Velan that he craves a special dish he doted on as a youth; the message miscarries and the fast replaces the feast he anticipated.

This kind of irony plays over events and people throughout the novel, but more so in the second story. The history of Railway Raju is one of success and failure: the successful establishment of the bookstall and refreshment stand at the railway station and its eventual failure when his guiding takes all his time: he rescues Rosie from Marco after the latter has forbidden her to dance the "Bharat Natyan," or ancient temple dances of India, though he is himself an art historian specializing in friezes and though Rosie descends from a maternal line of temple dancers who have no acknowledged fathers. Raju's success in giving Rosie another name, Nalini, and establishing her as a great dancer collapses for him when he forges her name to a receipt for jewelry and is arrested during her first triumph. While Nalini goes on to greater laurels, Raju goes to jail. All Raju's pre-jail life is described by himself, and the sharp eyes of the guide present a diverting picture of Indian home life, the petit bourgeois business world where he succeeds, and the greater world of politics and administration he almost enters as Rosie's manager.

In the second story of Raju as a swami the comedy becomes ironic. In jail Raju has had time to ponder his abiding question: is he really as worthless as everyone says and as his sentence seems to prove? He succeeds in jail just as he did in life, by being the superintendent's toady or stool pigeon. But this streak of the entrepreneur, his strongest characteristic, leads him to give himself airs as the village swami; he dresses and acts the part, taking refuge in sonorous nothings when pressed for advice. When the villagers mistakenly assume the good swami will fast to break the drought, he is caught in his finest role. By the fourth day he finds himself undergoing a transformation, begins to pray in earnest, and is apparently a reformed character when he collapses at the end of the novel. The comedy of the shrewd Raju at the mercy of the simple peasants indicates the pervading and growing irony which is the distinctive trait of the book. An earlier instance would be Nalini's decision to abandon Raju when he goes to jail; she walks out of their house carrying only the magnificent volume which Marco has at last published on the cave friezes at the Mempi Peaks. This is the point at which the break between husband and wife occurred and the book ironically expresses the gratitude of the writer for Railway Raju's assistance in the writing and production of the work.

The novel is not elaborate in structure and apart from the dialogue, especially that of Gaffur, which is lively, the writing is simple and sometimes clumsy, as when the names Rosie and Nalini are interchanged on a page. What makes the book an enjoyable introduction to the English novel by Indians is the gentle revelation of Raju's shady character somewhere between the more strenuous heroics of Raja Rao or Kamala Markandaya and the more biting irony of Kushwant Singh or Balachandra Rajan. Narayan is earlier on the scene than these post-Independence novelists, and his urbanity is in striking contrast to the peasant novels of the even earlier Mulk Raj Anand. Among stronger talents and clearer voices the charm of Narayan's Malgudi novels may be overlooked unless given their full ironic value.

THE GULL'S HORNBOOK

Type of work: Satirical pamphlet

Author: Thomas Dekker (c. 1570-c. 1641)

First published: 1609

Thomas Dekker, poet, playwright, pamphleteer, and moralist was one of the more prolific writers of the English Renaissance. While several of his plays, particularly The Shoemakers Holiday, and several of his lyric poems are still widely known, his other writings are for the most part unread today. The Gull's Hornbook is an exception. This delightfully ironic satire on the young men about town in Dekker's London has always been found to be well worth reading. As a valuable source of information on the customs and manners of the day, not the least interesting aspect of the pamphlet is the view it gives us of the behavior of certain parts of the audience in the Elizabethan and Jacobean theater.

While the material of the piece is essentially Dekker's observations and experience, its basic plan, especially in the first chapters, was drawn from the Grobianus of Frederick Dedekind (c. 1525-1598). Dedekind was a German who wrote satiric Latin verse and his Grobianus, first published on the Continent in two books in 1549, and in revised and enlarged form in three books in 1552, was a popular satire on boorish behavior. The technique of the author was to address the foolish lout Grobianus and advise him, under the guise of giving him advice on elegant behavior, in such a way as to cause him to increase his offensiveness and make him even more of a fool. More popular on the Continent than in England, the book was nevertheless translated by "R. F." into English in 1605 (four years before Dekker's Hornbook appeared), under the title The Schoole of Slovenrie: Or, Cato turnd wrong side outward. In Dekker's preface "To the Reader" in The Gull's Hornbook, we learn that he knew the Latin work and that his book has a "relish of Grobianisme, and tastes very strongly of it in the beginning: the reason thereof is, that, having translated many Bookes of that into English Verse, and not greatly liking the Subject, I altered the Shape, and of a Dutchman fashioned a mere Englishman."

The title of Dekker's work explains its nature: "gull" was an Elizabethan slang term meaning fool or one who may easily be made a fool; and a "hornbook" was a kind of elementary teaching device, usually a sheet of parchment with the alphabet written on it and mounted on a small board with a handle so that a child could hold it before him; the parchment was protected by a thin, transparent sheet of horn. The hornbook, then, was a child's primer, and The Gull's Hornbook is Dekker's primer for fools, in this case fops and gallants.

The book is made up of a prologue and eight short chapters. In the prologue, after announcing that "I sing (like the cuckoo in June) to be laught at," Dekker rushes on to insult "you that have authority under the broad seale of mouldy custom to be called the 'gentle audience.'" He points out that those who read his book are fools with no claim to critical judgment, and he announces he cannot be touched by their scorn. Further, he is determined to sing his cuckoo song to them whether they like it or not: "I will saile boldly and desperately alongst the shore of the Isle of Guls; and in defiance of those terrible blockhouses . . . make true discovery of their wild (yet habitable) Country." His position established, Dekker ends the prologue with a wild invocation to his "courageous muse"; and to Simplicity who was "first, fairest, and chiefest chamber-maide that our great-granddame Eve entertained into service"; Silvanus, who first taught "Carters to weare hob-nailes"; Bacchus and his "moist mystery"; Comus, clerk of "Gluttonies kitchen"; Tobacco, "setter-up of rotten-lunged chimneysweepers"; and Rusticity, "Schoolmistres of fooles."

Chapter One is actually a continuation of the prologue, in which Dekker identifies his point of departure: "Good cloathes are the embroidered trappings of pride, and good cheere the very eringo-roote of gluttony." Praising the fig leaf simplicity of dress in Adam's time, Dekker declares that "Fashions then was counted a disease, and horses died of it." As for the "diet of that Saturnian age, it was like their attire, homely." But in this age he found diet rich, vast, and corrupt. The breath of the age "stinks like the mouthes of chambermaids of feeding on so many sweet meats." Dekker claims that while purging the world will be a labor more difficult than the cleansing of Augeas' stable, he is the "madcap that will do it." "Draw neere, therefore," he says, "all you that love to walk upon single and simple soules," and learn from me.

In Chapter Two he lays down his first rule for those who wish to be gallants and actors on the stage of the world: stay in the largest and softest bed until noon, sleep until you hear your belly grumble. Be warned about physicians who recommend less sleep; they want to tire you so that you will fall ill and be forced to pay their fees. Sleep is a wonderful thing shared by emperor and beggar, and, among other things it makes us thrifty: we save the cost of breakfast and we don't wear out our clothes. When you wake, be bad tempered and speak to no one; loll about in bed awhile; and then walk about in your room naked for a time. Nakedness is man's best and natural state. Therefore, when you go out, put on no clothes at all, or put them on carelessly: one is more free when his clothes hang loose. "What man would not gladly see a beautifull woman naked . . . and even highly lift her up for being so? Shall wee then abhorre that in our selves, which we admire and hold to be so excellent in others?"

But problems may arise, points out the author in Chapter Three. The day may be cold. If so, jump from bed, seize your clothes in your arms, and rush into the chimney room and push your way through the crowd about the fireplace so that you may toast yourself to a sweat before you dress. Since this is done for the sake of your health and life, you may safely boast that you live by the sweat of your brow. When you do dress, wear your clothing in such a way that all men will point at you and, thus, make you famous. Also, let your hair grow thick and bushy "lest those sixe-footed creatures that breede in it, and are Tenants to that crowne-land of thine, bee hunted to death by every base barbarous Barber; and so that delicate, and tickling pleasure of scratching, be utterly taken from thee." Further, "Long haire will make thee look dreadfully to thine enemies, and manly to thy friends. It is, in peace, an ornament; in warre, a strong helmet. It blunts the edge of a sword, and deads the leaden thump of a bullet. In winter, it is a warme night-cap; in sommer, a cooling fan of feathers."

After discussing what is required of the proper gallant when he walks abroad in public in Paul's Walks (Chapter Four), and how he should behave in an inn at dinner (Chapter Five), Dekker gives us a detailed description of how he should conduct himself at a playhouse (Chapter Six). "The theatre is your Poets Royal Exchange, upon which their Muses, (yt are now turnd to Merchants,) meeting, barter away that light commodity of words for a lighter ware then words, Plaudites. . . . Plaiers are their Factors, who put away the stuffe, and make the best of it they possibly can (as indeed tis their parts so to doe)." The theater is the place where all kinds and classes of men gather; therefore, it is the best place for the gallant to be seen. On entering, he should walk up and sit on the stage itself where he may arrange himself to show off his clothes and elegant figure, and where he may direct and comment aloud on scenes and the development of the play. Everyone in the theater will look at him and his name will be on everyone's lips: this is fame. "It shall crowne you with rich commendation, to laugh alowd in the midst of the most serious and saddest scenes of the terriblest Tragedy, and to let that clapper (your tongue) be tost so high, that all the house may ring of it . . . for by talking and laughing (like a ploughman in a Morris) you heap Pelion upon Ossa, glory upon glory. As first, all the eyes in the galleries will leave walking after the Players, and onely follow you: the simplest dolt in the house snatches up your name, and, when he meetes you in the streetes, or that you fall into his hands in the middle of a Watch, his word shall be taken for you: heele cry 'Hees such a gallant,' and you passe." The gallant should arrive at the theater in great and loud style and should take his place on the stage only when the play is about to begin. "Before the Play begins, fall to cardes . . . throw the cards (having first torne foure of five of them) round about the Stage, just upon the third sound [of the trumpet announcing the prologue], as though you had lost." And if the poet is a fellow who has epigrammed the gallant or flirted with his mistress, he should stand up in the middle of the play, yawning; greet all his acquaintances aloud, and lead as many as he can off the stage, and be gone.

After the play, the gallant should go to the tavern (Chapter Seven). Having selected the most fashionable place, he should go there and become familiar with the staff, calling all by their first names. He need not worry about money, but put on a good show. Finally, as the gallant's day ends and he leaves the tavern, he should beware of the watch (Chapter Eight). If he is too poor to afford serving men, he should cry aloud in anger, every time he meets someone in the street, that his servants have abandoned him, or else hire one of the tavern boys to light him home. If he should run into the watch, have the boy address him as "Sir," and if the watch accosts him, the gallant should answer their challenge with a jest that they may think him of a proud and aggressive spirit and fear to arrest him; or better, pretend that he is a Dutchman or a Frenchman and cannot understand their language. If the gallant lives far from the tavern, he should spend the night with his mistress and lie to her about money.

HADRIAN'S MEMOIRS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Marguerite Yourcenar (1903-)

Time: 76-138

Locale: Hispania Baetica, now modern Spain, Syria, Gaul, Germany, Britain, Greece, Mauretania, Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and Rome

First published: 1951

Principal characters:

HADRIAN, Emperor of the Roman Empire and narrator

ULPIUS TRAJANUS, his uncle, later Emperor Trajan

ANTINOÛS, a handsome Bithynian youth, Hadrian's favorite

SIMON BAR KOKBA, leader of the Jewish revolt

MARCUS AURELIUS, Hadrian's adopted grandson and successor

Hadrian's Memoirs is a work of sound scholarship and unusual imaginative reconstruction. Not the least of the appeals which this novel holds for the modern reader is the light it throws on two of the great problems of our own time—the nature of man and the uses of power. Here these matters are presented as they shaped themselves in the experience of one man. The fact that this man was also a ruler of absolute power is only incidental to the total picture presented. Hadrian was also like the modern man in the con-traditions and complexities of his character, and the novel is as much a study of ethical motivations as it is the story of a life. Some readers, in fact, may be baffled by the slight attention paid to purely biographical detail. For this reason it should be kept in mind that the novel is intended to be both a memoir and an apology. Supposed to have been written in his last days when Hadrian, resigned to the prospect of death, felt himself exhausted by the responsibilities of his office, these memoirs take the form of a long letter addressed to his adopted grandson, the seventeen-year-old Marcus Aurelius. Under the circumstances it is only natural that the work should be philosophical in tone and much concerned with ideas of history, death, and immortality.

The public events of Hadrian's life can be briefly summarized. He was born in A.D. 76 in Hispania Baetica, in what is now modern Spain. His family was provincial, and though it had important connections in the greater Roman world there was no prospect that the boy would ever wear the imperial purple. About the year 86 he was placed under the guardianship of his uncle, Ulpius Trajanus, the general who later became the Emperor Trajan. It was Hadrian who, according to this account, carried to Trajan the news that he had been proclaimed by the legions. As the nephew of the emperor, he served in many of the campaigns on the outskirts of the Empire. Whether Trajan ever did adopt him formally as his heir remains somewhat clouded. Trajan's wife supported his cause, however, and a will was produced after Trajan's death. Hadrian, who had been in command of the Roman armies in Syria, succeeded his uncle in 117.

His first acts were to renounce Trajan's costly program of conquest and to consolidate the imperial powers at home. Abandoning completely the attempt to subjugate the Parthians, he made the Euphrates the eastern border of the Empire. His policy of stern but just Roman peace extended also to the wild Germanic tribes. In 119 he began his progress through Gaul, Germany, Spain, Britain, Greece, Mauretania, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt. In Britain he ordered construction of the wall that bears his name, intended to keep the savage Picts north of the Solway. Returning to Rome in 131, and saddened by the death of his beloved Antinoüs, he issued a year later the Edictum perpetuum on which Justinian subsequently based his Corpus juris. In the same year the Jews, led by Simon Bar

Kokba, revolted in protest against the establishment of a permanent Roman colony at Jerusalem and the dedication of a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the Hebrew Temple. This revolt Hadrian put down with the utmost severity, and with the defeat of Simon Bar Kokba in 135 the eighteen hundred years of the Jewish dispersion began. On the whole, however, Hadrian was a wise and humane ruler who reduced taxes, alleviated the hardships of the slave class, and completed tremendous building programs in Athens and Rome. A patron of the arts, he was also a poet of some distinction whose best-known work is the appealing lyric beginning, "Animula, vagula, blandula. . . ." He died at his villa at Baiae in 138.

Most of these incidents figure in the background of Mme. Yourcenar's novel, but usually it is not the event which is most important for her purpose but its significance to Hadrian's way of thinking and feeling. It is in the delicate handling of this material and the shift from outward circumstance to inward meaning that the novelist's achievement becomes apparent. It must also be kept in mind that she is dealing with a non-Christian milieu. To show Hadrian and his age from the modern viewpoint would strike a false note at the start; consequently, for purposes of morality as well as of art, she allows Hadrian to explain himself. The result is a study which is probably as close as any modern writer can ever get in presenting the pagan mind in a period before the concepts of a gap between body and soul, between the physical universe and eternal reality, became historical fact.

This aspect of the novel is more clearly revealed in the account of Hadrian's relations with Antinoüs, the handsome Bithynian youth who became his favorite. When the emperor's beloved was drowned in the Nile—the suggestion is that he committed suicide—during a trip to Egypt in 130, Hadrian was for a time inconsolable. Later he established a cult to deify the young man, built cities in his honor, and commissioned the statues which in many art museums today are still regarded as the symbols of immortal youthful beauty. There is no question of modern morality in the relationship existing between emperor and favorite, only a pagan delight in the beauty of the human form. Hadrian's attitude, though we would nowadays call it abnormal, reflects more than the perversions many of his contemporaries practiced because they were fashionable. In his view all pleasures enjoyed with art seemed chaste.

Another instance of Mme. Yourcenar's skillful handling is to be found in the story of Simon Bar Kokba's revolt. There was no idea of religious domination in Hadrian's decision to dedicate a shrine to Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the Hebrew Temple; there was room in the Roman pantheon for the gods of all peoples, and the Romans were as willing to accept Jehovah within their religious framework as they had received, often through returning veterans, the gods of Egypt and other outposts of the Empire. Hadrian's act was really intended to symbolize the solidarity of the state, the principle of empire and the stabilizing influence of a culture and a civilization. But the Jews, although able to accept the idea of Roman citizenship and law, could not accept Jupiter as the symbol of unity because he stood for a different faith. It may be that Hadrian's moment of recoil when he was presented with Simon Bar Kokba's severed head marks the actual beginning of modern history, for the Jewish revolt signified the concept of passionate rejection which we find in all protests against systematized authority, whether in religion, in politics, or in science.

These are only two of the incidents which provide dying Hadrian with material for philosophical speculation. The approach of death, which first leads him to recall events and personalities of the past and to savor in recollection the sensations of experience, becomes in the end an attempt at self-understanding, an effort to penetrate his contradictions of sensualism and rationalism, of discipline and license, of philosophical detachment and emotional involvement, in order to see clearly the nature of man as reflected in himself. His speculations were directed toward a single and worthy end: to confront death with open eyes.

Mme. Yourcenar plays fair with her readers. In an appended Author's Note she lists her sources, tells where and why she has taken minor liberties with chronology or characters, and explains certain interpretations justified by the vagueness of actual history. Her own honesty and clarity of motive argue much for her portrait of a man and an age presented in this contemplative, intuitive, and beautifully styled historical novel. This is a work of fiction in which all details are relevant and everything is in proportion. A spirit of Roman gravity and serenity is apparent on every page.

HAMPSHIRE DAYS

Type of work: Nature study

Author: William Henry Hudson (1841-1922)

First published: 1903

Despite the poverty and ill health from which W. H. Hudson suffered much of his life, the dominant mood of Hampshire Days is the quiet joy found in the creatures, plants, and seasons of nature. This mood may have been furthered by the Civil List pension granted the author in 1901, the year before he finished the work. He tells us that he returned to New Forest in December, 1902, to complete this book, which chronicles his activities and discoveries in Hampshire from 1900 to 1902. His purpose was to write of this "delectable spot in the best bird months of April, May, and June," but fortunately his vision included more than these months and a far wider variety of subjects, including Hampshire people, towns, and buildings, than this statement indicates.

Because Hudson was an important naturalist, one would expect much of the book to be devoted to the flora and fauna of Hampshire and its centuries-old forests, like Harewood, Wolmer and, especially, the somewhat misleadingly named New Forest. Hudson reveals his love of this particular forest on many pages and on one occasion speaks of it as containing the most beautiful forest landscape in all England. Its name derives from its being placed under forest laws by William the Conqueror in 1079. Of its present-day 130-square-mile area, thirty square miles are privately owned and forty-five of the remaining hundred are Crown woodlands, largely of oak and pine. Hudson lived in a former manor house in the forest while gathering material for his book. He was obviously concerned about the future of the forest, endangered by the abuse of the New Forest. This abuse was the unregulated raiding of the forest of its heath, game animals, rare species of birds, and plants. Hudson believed that only by government ownership of these lands and by careful regulation could New Forest be restored to its former glory.

Hudson's interest in plant life is further revealed by his discussion of yew trees, particularly the Selborne yew, whose age he believed to exceed greatly the thousand years usually credited to a large churchyard yew, and the Farrington yew, both of which he numbers among his Hampshire favorites. He postulates that the practice of burying people beneath yews (with the consequent removal of a barrowful of roots for each grave) inflicts injury on the yew, and he concludes that the great size of the Selborne yew may result from the fact that only one grave was dug near it. As a naturalist, Hudson properly preferred wild nature to cultivated or garden nature, and he had little use for collectors of plants or animals if they killed in order to collect. He seems to have had little use for cut flowers; a picked rose, he says, lacks luster and means no more to the soul than a flower made from wax or paper. But roses growing wild convince one that there is no more beautiful sight in all the world.

The bulk of the book concerns such small creatures as birds, small mammals, and snakes. Hudson did not intend to present any very startling discoveries, but to reveal what he had learned about these animals of Hampshire: their mating habits, peculiarities of behavior, and some of the tales told of them. He discusses the mating game of several animals, as, for instance, the unusual behavior of the female viridissima (a variety of grasshopper) who, hypnotically drawn to the singing of the males, selects the one she wants and waits "to be taken in marriage." In the case of the white spider, however, the male is both irresistibly drawn to the somewhat larger, white female and at the same time made fearful by her poisonous fangs. Consequently, first he advances eagerly, only to be made wary, and then retreats.

Hudson had the naturalist's desire to test the truth of accepted nature tales, as his meticulous account of the cuckoo in the robin's nest shows. In order to verify the newly hatched cuckoo's supposed strength, he watched the developments in a nest containing, originally, three robin's eggs and one cuckoo egg. In time two of the robin eggs were ejected, one definitely by the cuckoo, as Hudson saw, but the cuckoo went even further. As Hudson watched, the preternaturally strong fledgling pushed a baby robin from the nest. In all his discussions of animal behavior he reveals the qualities shown here: the care in observation, the desire to test accepted ideas, and the obvious relish he took in reporting his findings.

Despite Hudson's obvious concern for plants and animals, his book also deals with man and his works. In fact, he devotes some chapters to these topics and only rarely is man totally absent from his discussions. He is careful to acknowledge his debt both to such earlier naturalists as Gilbert White and Moses Harris and to men of his own day who provided him with facts and stories. Of the chapters devoted to man, one deals with the Selborne atmosphere and discusses the appearance of the people, the scenery, and other aspects of the town. Another, devoted to the Hampshire people divides the inhabitants of this region into four types: the blond, which greatly outnumbered all others; the Saxon, also light-haired with blue eyes, but heavier; those slight and narrow-headed, with brown skins, crow-black hair, and dark eyes; and those of average height, with oval faces and dark eyes and hair.

Hudson's concern for man and his ways is also seen in his interest in old folks and their stories of the past. In one instance, an old woman was able to explain how the lone grave beneath the great yew at Selborne came there; in another, an old woman told of the dashing career of her father, a horn-blower for the "Selborne mob" that attacked a poor-house in a time of poverty. Such tales of the past were much to Hudson's liking; he gives them prominent places in this book.

Hampshire Days is the work of a many-sided man: both Hudson the naturalist and Hudson the student of human nature are clearly visible. The personality that informs the work is that of a keen-minded inquirer, capable of delighting himself in study but also capable of feeling compassion for both men and animals. Even though he seems to dislike the intrusions of man into nature's haunts, he has kind words for some of the young people he meets during his outings. And even though he delivers a lecture in Chapter One about the undesirability of such interference with nature as saving one of the robins ejected from its nest by the cuckoo, and the necessity of the death of great numbers of young birds each year, Hudson himself is guilty of such "interference." When a young blackbird shows itself incapable of getting food, Hudson intervenes. His explanation is that although he may dislike playing at providence among nature's creatures, he cannot free himself of pity.

Although the forms and techniques of fiction seem capable of almost endless variation, most novelists have only one main story to tell, and the fortunate writer is the one who finds his major theme and fable early in his career. Saul Bellow did in his first novel, Dangling Man. It is the quest, man's search for freedom and rest within the fretted human spirit.

For this reason Henderson the Rain King is a Messianic novel, like The Plumed Serpent or A Fable. The pattern it follows—the outsider in search of the truth which a local African Messiah reveals to him—is as old as Samuel Johnson's Rasselas: Prince of Abyssinia. The theme is the achieving of individual identity, of becoming turning into being. For a man thus to learn the depths of his own nature Bellow constructs a situation that verges on the fantastic: a middle-aged American millionaire becomes the chief priest of the rain goddess of a tribe in a totally isolated region somewhere in East Africa. The identification of the tribe is impossible, the geography is unplaceable, the realities of travel are ignored. The narrator uses a coarse but effective style; he is what is technically called an "unreliable narrator" who must reveal his character, even when he does not know his identity, in the earlier chapters; the redeemed must act as if he were unredeemed in telling of the events up to his redemption. Unlike Great Expectations, for example, in which Pip tells us all after the close of the action, the narrator employs a continuous past tense so that the narration and the action parallel each other. Thus neither he nor the reader is ever in advance of the final revelation.

But the seeker in Bellow's fiction is no Ulysses, Hamlet, Don Quixote, Gulliver, Huck Finn, or Ishmael. He is the philosophical clown, the innocent American and adventurous discoverer of a spiritual quest which begins with the knowledge that "man's character is his fate" and ends with the realization that "man's fate is his character." He is the schnorrer Joseph in Dangling Man, Asa Leventhal in The Victim, and Augie in The Adventures of Augie March, that free-swinging, irreverent, passionate account of one man's journey on two continents, through the depression years and a world war, and within the geography of his own soul. All of Bellow's heroes are driven by their desires toward some goal where the beginning of wisdom is often indistinguishable from error and folly. Eugene Henderson, the narrator and central figure of Henderson the Rain King, is no exception. In fact, he is the most frantic and grotesque of Bellow's creations.

He is, to begin with, a tremendously comic figure, oversized in physique, great in his appetites, obsessed by the demands of an I want, I want that clamors without appeasement within him. He is fifty-five years old when we first meet him. A man with a temper as violent as his physical force, he has more money than even his eccentric needs demand, a second wife, an assorted brood of children. He has turned his home into a pig farm, learned to play the violin, and acquired a reputation for drinking and crude manners. When he tries to sum up his life, it is, as he says, a mess, a fact he realizes acutely without knowing why.

When he can no longer face himself, his family, or his past, he flees to Africa with dreams of becoming another Dr. Grenville or Dr. Schweitzer. Africa, as Henderson sees it, is an empty and secret land, the last outpost of the pre-human past, a land unmarked by the footprints of history.

With a native guide, Romilayu, he arrives at last in the land of the Arnewi, where he engages in a ritual wrestling bout with Itelo, the champion of the tribe. But in that remote place he still cannot escape his past; he remains a millionaire, a wanderer, a violent man looking for peace and happiness. The queen of these gentle people tells him that his malady is the grun-tu-molani, the will to live instead of dying. Accepted by the Arnewi and courted by the queen's sister, Mtalba, Henderson plans to cleanse the tribe's sacred cistern, which is infested with frogs. But his homemade bomb blasts away the wall of the cistern and the water seeps into the parched earth. Rather than face the consequences of this disaster he runs away.

Henderson next turns up among the Wariri, a more warlike and savage tribe. The king is Dahfu, a ruler considerably more enlightened than his subjects, for he has studied in a missionary school and can speak to Henderson in English. While watching a tribal festival, Henderson is moved to lift the statue of Mum-mah, goddess of clouds, after several of the Wariri have failed to budge the massive idol. His act of strength, he soon discovers, is sacramental. When a sudden downpour follows, he is acclaimed as the new Sungo, or rain king, of the tribe, and he is compelled to put on the green silk drawers of his office. But Henderson, elevated to a post in which he becomes a scapegoat for the capricious rain goddess, is no better off than he was before; he is as much governed by ritual as King Dahfu, who will rule only as long as his powers of procreation last. When they fail, he will be strangled and another ruler will be selected.

In the end, Dahfu is the means of Henderson's salvation. In an underground pit he keeps a pet lion, Atti, a creature hated and feared by the Wariri because they believe the beast has bewitched their king. As Dahfu continues to postpone the ritual capture of the wild lion supposed to contain his father's spirit, the chief priest and the king's uncle plot against him. Under Dahfu's tutelage, meanwhile, Henderson learns to romp with the lion and imitate its roars. Dahfu tells him to act the lion's role, to be a beast. Recovery of Henderson's humanity will come later; meanwhile, he is to imitate the lion.

Dahfu's lion cult impresses Henderson. His failure has been his bullish or piggish attempt to alter the world around him, to kick back when he felt kicked by fate. Instead he must alter himself, and in particular cure himself of fear by thinking like a lion, by imagining the lion at the cortex of his brain and making himself over as a lion. In spite of his crushing failure with the Arnewi he has learned two things that help him in his daily lion lessons. First, although a man when struck is likely to strike out in revenge (as the Wariri but not the Arnewi do,) pure virtue can break the chain of blows. The Arnewi, principally Mtalba, the aunt of Prince Itelo who was once the companion of Dahfu, are virtuous but cowl-like because they love their cows; hence their virtue is not for Henderson. Second, he has been confirmed in a sneaking sense of his own worth by Mtalba, who oozed the odor of sanctity and was prepared to marry him. The demanding voice of the I want, I want within Henderson becomes the roar of the lion as Dahfu instructs him that man is still animal, but that it is possible for him to be a lion and not a pig.

The king's final lesson is that of courage in meeting death, which Henderson has always thought the biggest problem of all. When Dahfu is killed, possibly through the chief priest's conniving, while trying to capture a wild lion, Henderson flees the Wariri to avoid becoming the next king, and he returns with a captured lion cub to America. We get our last glimpse of him at the airport in Newfoundland. He is playing with a little boy, the child of American parents but who speaks only Persian. Dahfu and his lion have done their work. Henderson's spirit is finally at home in the animal housing of his flesh.

No brief outline of Henderson's story can ever adequately convey the gusty, wild humor, sensuous brilliance, abundant sense of life, or stylistic vigor of Saul Bellow's novel. Nor is it profitable to discuss the allegorical or symbolic meanings it contains, for those are matters that each reader must discover for himself. Call the novel whatever one will—a wild burlesque on all the travel books ever written, a comic extravaganza on modern themes, a melodramatic adventure story, a fantasy, an allegory, or the narrative of a symbolic journey into the dark reaches of the soul—Henderson the Rain King allows every reader to find a moment of truth. It is not always the same truth because readers look in different directions, but it is some revelation of the comedy and the tragedy of being. We cannot demand more of any novelist.

In a sense, A Heritage and Its History, because it encompasses more time than any other novel by Ivy Compton-Burnett, is the most representative of all her novels, though it is not quite her best. The heritage, as Miss Compton-Burnett's readers and those who have studied their ancestors' lives will recognize, is the complex genetic and social inheritance of what we call good and evil tendencies. It is the virtues and the sins of the fathers that are visited upon all generations since; though we live in our own day, what we do has been done by all our forebears, as Rhoda and Sir Edwin say and as parts of the Bible imply. In its encompassment of universalized and eternalized human activity in three generations, as in its inclusion of the wise butler and the excessively precocious children as commentators upon the sensational and usual events the dialogue of the novel advances, A Heritage and Its History is Miss Compton-Burnett at her most representative. Because in presenting more characters and times than usual, she leaves even the alert reader occasionally baffled, the novel, though excellent, is inferior to its immediate predecessor, A Father and His Fate and its two successors, The Mighty and Their Fall and A God and His Gifts.

It is not, as indeed it is not usually, of the utmost importance to give the intriguing complexity of the plot, which as someone once said of another of her novels, combines complexities that might have arisen had Sardou and Sophocles collaborated. Of course things are not what they seem. The apparently healthy Sir Edwin precedes in death his dying brother. The proper son of Hamish, Simon, has children by both the Graham sister he marries and the older one he does not, and he becomes at the close of the novel, Sir Simon. The erratic son, Walter, who did not finish Oxford and who is a poet, leads a proper life. Behind the scenes, as in the Greek tragedies it resembles and, like them, interrupted by comic and satirical interludes, events of plausible sensationalism occur: sudden death, adultery, near incest, a conflict of parents and children, of brother and brother. The story is, in other words, the stuff of human nature told factually and palatably and wittily and bearably, as it is in all but the first of Ivy Compton-Burnett's novels, the stuff of human nature in action.

Under its Victorian trappings A Heritage and Its History retells the ancient dynastic story of the cuckolded king, the dispossessed heir, and usurper; but in this case the heir, Simon Challoner, brings about his own undoing. All of the Challoners live in a large family house over which Sir Edwin Challoner, a bachelor, presides. For years, however, the job of running the estate has been entrusted to his younger brother Hamish. Julia, Hamish's wife, has been the mistress of the household ever since her marriage, and Simon, her older son, is Sir Edwin's heir. Because his uncle is over sixty, Simon seems unlikely to have a long wait before he comes into his expectations. Walter, the younger son is an impractical, frustrated poet. Then Hamish Challoner dies. Sir Edwin, lonely after his brother's death, marries Rhoda Graham, a young neighbor less than half his age. Because of his uncle's advanced years, there is no chance that Simon's prospects will be changed by this marriage. Then Simon, ironically, cuts himself off from his inheritance by fathering a child on Rhoda. To avoid scandal, Sir Edwin claims Hamish as his son and heir after swearing Simon and Walter to secrecy.

Forced to yield his place to his own son, Simon marries Fanny, Rhoda's sister, and Julia goes to live with them in the small house which had belonged to Rhoda and Fanny. Simon continues to help his uncle in administering the estate, but as the years pass and his family grows he becomes more and more a disappointed, embittered man. By the time his sons and daughter are grown he has driven them almost to distraction—certainly to the point of detesting him—by complaining gloomily that his family lives only one step away from the workhouse.

But guilt concealed cannot remain hidden. The secret of Hamish's birth must be revealed to all when he falls in love with Simon's daughter Naomi and the young people tell their parents of their desire to marry. Simon accepts the burden of the story that must be told.

This family situation is further complicated when Hamish marries Marcia after Sir Edwin's death at the age of ninety-four. He dies childless, however, and the estate and title pass to Simon. At the end his children are discussing his change of fortunes. Is he actually noble or merely deceiving himself and the others? A combination of both is the answer.

Counterpointing the Challoners in this grim comedy of possession and dispossession is the figure of Deakin, the butler. His true loyalty is not to the different masters and mistresses he serves but to the house itself, which is a symbol of history, of life in the stream of time. The others are like the creeping vine that grows outside the house, shadowing the rooms within; if they were to be exposed to the light they would be startled.

The plot is not the main thing, but merely an unfolding of events that carries forward the revelation of life the characters enact or put in action. The characters are not the main thing, either, in the individualized sense in which they would be in a novel by William Faulkner or Joyce Cary. Here, as in many of Miss Compton-Burnett's novels, it would be possible to transpose some of the characters without causing the reader, unless he is constantly alert, to notice the difference. This statement does not mean that Miss Compton-

Burnett's characters are distinguishable types any more than Hemingway's early characters, who were clarified almost exclusively by dialogue. It does mean that they represent all kinds of people in whom the likeness to ourselves and to the friends we know deeply is more marked than individuality.

Aesthetically speaking, the dialogue is the point at which, more in each novel it seems, Miss Compton-Burnett's originality manifests itself most clearly. As in Congreve and Etherege and Hemingway and Henry Green, to cite disparate aesthetic cousins, the dialogue is the thing wherein the consciousness of the human predicament and how it may be endured, sometimes with joy, sometimes with anguish, is forwarded and revealed. It is bared to the essential bone, increasingly without conventional props. The characters, never identified by more than a few sentences of description and their age, speak it condensedly and wittily. If the reader is not the co-operator in the aesthetic enterprise Miss Compton-Burnett expects, alert as if it were poetry he is reading, he is likely to miss the plot, lost in a mesh of unidentified time and characters unknown. If he attends well, his reward is the aesthetic delight the most harrowing events, well-told, bring.

What occurs in A Heritage and Its History is united in tone by the controlled chorus of butler and children, all of whom keep us aware, as Deakin the butler puts it, that life is not adapted to us and that it is up to us to conform as cheerfully as we can to its conditions if we are permitted to know them. To know all that the main characters and the commenting choruses say about themselves and others is to understand and forgive the facts of human nature as Miss Compton-Burnett recognizes them.

This divine lack of reproof—even more apparent in The Mighty and Their Fall and A God and His Fate—has been increasing ever since Miss Compton-Burnett published Mr. Bullivant and His Lambs in 1947. Evidently this development has burgeoned from both a growing reconciliation to the worst that may happen to all of us and a slight brightening of her world-view, so that it now approaches what may be called cheerful stoicism or uncritical, nearly omniscient, factualism. All her novels deserve attention, the earliest for what they expose, the latest for what they show of how we may dispose ourselves before what must be exposed. "If way to the Better there be," Thomas Hardy said, "it exacts a full look at the Worst." The early novels show the worst. The later suggest, with diffident hopefulness and no lack of clarity about the Worst we must face, how we may best aim towards the Better.

The kind, hard look the novels give on life and death and her unusual technique that requires a co-operative reader rather than one accustomed to the pap-feeding of popular fiction, has kept Miss Compton-Burnett from popularity in the United States. To a lesser extent this has been true of the public even in England, where she has been honored by royalty, critics, and the awarders of prizes. Not to read Ivy Compton-Burnett is to deprive oneself of a depth of vision comparable with what one finds in Aeschylus, Shakespeare, Tolstoy, and other writers we agree to call great. Not to read her is to deprive oneself of pleasure also, for Miss Compton-Burnett's somewhat hopeful stoicism is always leavened by humor and wit. In her work style and wisdom, within the necessary human limit of fallibility, conjoin beautifully to delight.

HEROIDES

Type of work: Letters in verse

Author: Ovid (Publius Ovidius Naso, 43 B.C.-A.D. 18)

First transcribed: Indefinitely B.C.

In the Heroides or Letters of the Heroines the Roman poet Ovid composed a series of dramatic letters in elegiac verse (alternating lines of dactylic hexameter and dactylic pentameter). "Elegy," writes one of Ovid's heroines, "is the weeping strain," and the mood of most of these letters is that of sadness. Most of the heroines have been rejected by famous heroes, Dido by Aeneas, Ariadne by Theseus, Hypsipyle by Jason, Oenone by Paris. Some are apprehensive of coming death either for themselves or for their lovers: Canace, Dejanira, Sappho, and Dido are about to commit suicide. Medea is about to kill the new wife of Jason and her own two children. Almost all of the heroines are in hopeless but pitiful situations.

Ovid's heroines are caught at a turning point in their lives, usually when bad is going to worse. But in these turning points there is conflict, both internal and between several people, and we are reminded that Ovid was also a dramatist. (His play, Medea, is not extant.) The letters are the ancestors of the familiar dramatic monologues of Robert Browning and also of the interior monologue, as used by Joyce or Dostoevski, since the heroines reveal in their writing their inmost thoughts. Also, what the heroine says usually sets a scene for the reader: she will tell, through reminiscence, the events of the past which led up to her present woe. Sometimes the reader seems to be put in the mind of the heroine, moving rapidly from one of her associations to another, or from a past memory to the present. In telling the different stories dramatically, Ovid remains in the background, almost out of sight.

The Heroides, apart from being one source of dramatic and interior monologue, have inspired different generations of English poets, from Chaucer, who felt deep sympathy for Canace, and his contemporary Gower, to John Donne, who imitated several of the letters in his own poetry, and to Alexander Pope, who wrote one of his finest poems, "Eloisa to Abelard," in imitation of the verse epistles.

Ovid's "Canace to Macareus" is one of the finest short dramatic poems in classic literature. As it opens, Canace is telling her brother and lover Macareus that she has been ordered by their father Aeolus to kill herself as punishment for having a child by her brother. She tells in close detail how she had become pregnant by Macareus, how her sympathetic nurse had tried unsuccessfully to abort her, and finally how the new-born baby had betrayed itself by crying as the nurse was trying to carry it, wrapped in a bundle of sticks, past Aeolus. Aeolus, the household tyrant, paradoxically able to control the four winds but not his own passion, is the inflexible villain of Canace's letter. The reader sympathizes with the incestuous couple, and Ovid succeeds in getting us to question any sort of inflexible legal or moral code.

At best Ovid's heroines appeal to our sympathies; however, a poet can say only so much on the theme of rejected love. Ovid sometimes seems bored with his subject matter, especially when he takes his material from another poet. When he borrows Dido from Vergil, his poem becomes only a good but obvious imitation; and Ovid's "Dido to Aeneas" adds almost no new detail to Vergil's story in the Aeneid.

Most modern readers will be bored with the majority of the Heroides, for the letters often seem sentimental or mawkish by modern standards of taste; but at the same time today's reader is often caught up by Ovid's power as a storyteller and dramatist, and convinced that many of the characters are "true" or "real." One remembers, for instance, the pictures of the indulgent nurse and of Aeolus, the petty tyrant, in "Canace to Macareus"; the picture of Ariadne lying on the rocks of her island watching Theseus' sails disappear in the distance; and the picture of Paris flirting with Helen at the table of her husband Menelaus. The realism in the Heroides is psychological:

what Ovid's characters think and do seems natural today. Also, Ovid writes sympathetically about the social outcast and the mentally sick: he shows understanding for the close to insane Dido and Medea, and for the incestuous Canace and Phaedra.

Ovid's verse is artificial, however, and he makes no effort to give each of his heroines an individual style or poetic voice; all seem to speak in the same way. Still, they retain a psychological individuality, which is shown through their actions and their thoughts.

Ovid depends on his readers' already knowing his story, and he often builds his poems dramatically on various allusions, so that the modern reader is annoyed by all the unfamiliar names. But in the context of his time Ovid was certainly within his rights in sketching in a character's descent from one of the gods. To make up for what are today obscure allusions, Ovid presents accurate physical detail with vigorous and compelling power.

HISTORY OF FREDERICK II OF PRUSSIA

Type of work: Historical biography

Author: Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881)

Time: 1712-1786

Locale: Prussia, Austria, Poland, Hungary, Silesia, Moravia, Saxony, and Friesland

First published: 1858-1865

Principal personages:

FREDERICK II, called the GREAT, born Karl Friederich

FREDERICH WILHELM, his father, known as Frederick William I

SOPHIE DOROTHEE OF HANOVER, his mother

WILHELMINA, his older sister

GEORGE II, King of England, his uncle

ELIZABETH CHRISTINA, his wife

FRANÇOIS MARIE AROUET DE VOLTAIRE, his literary confidant and mentor

Sometimes called Carlyle's Thirteen Year War with Frederick of Prussia, the six-volume History of Friederich II of Prussia Called Frederick the Great is still a controversial masterwork, more talked about than read. Undisputably original, the work departs radically from the Gibbon-Macauley tradition which Carlyle called the Dryasdusts in order to bring back life to a great man, a hero who exercised the divine right of kings with military and diplomatic might to overcome diabolic wrongs. Such was the belief of Carlyle, a historian who found his theory of history explicit in one great man, and who then accommodated history to fit the thesis, a most objectionable practice to most of his critics, but lively and compelling both as literature of power and literature of knowledge, as De Quincey defined them.

Much of the knowledge, however, is outdated because of recent historical discoveries. Also, the historical method is suspect, Carlyle having explained the past in terms of his present and prejudices. Much of the documentation is edited, especially that concerning Voltaire, to the convenience of the historian. In addition, most of the geneology serves only to confuse without advancing the biography. Careful attention and great ingenuity, however, brings Frederick II to life in his setting, especially on the battlefields which Carlyle traversed with such care and understanding.

The power of the book cannot be overstated; the hundred-year test of a classic has been met. The quality of the framing, the immensity of the design and the execution, the ruggedness of style stand idiosyncratic but firm.

The biography of the author under the stress or the compulsion of writing this work is well known: five years of reading, traveling, and writing and rewriting, to bring out the vigorous first two volumes, the slow, tedious job of digesting and disgorging "truckloads of Dryasdusts" of battles and treaties, the neglecting of his fatally ill wife Jane who saw the hand of God in the enterprise, the fact that his conscience bothered him for the rest of his life.

Frederick II, known in history as Frederick the Great, shaped modern Europe almost single-handedly with his own great strength of character, personality, and resolve. To Carlyle, his might did mean right. No hero, however, made a less auspicious start, and in looking backward to the first volume no hero appeared less impressive in his fullest unpretentious dress. He possessed, however, an internal vigor, a sharp gray eye, and a cloak of impenetrability learned well in youth.

The protracted opening of the biography traces the history of the Brandenburg and Hohenzollern families back to the Middle Ages, covering both sides of the inbred family.

Emerging from medieval beginnings, born to a militaristically and cruelly imperative father and a seemingly calm but conniving mother, young Frederick, the fourth in the family of ten, seemed destined to failure as a son and prince. His older sister, Princess Wilhelmina, his protector and confidante throughout life, thought him a "dull" student, probably unwilling to learn by rote and drill, and his father discovered him obstinate. He showed an early interest in music (he called the flute his mistress during his lonely and exiled hours), literature, and good conversation. Officially he was exposed to "mathematics, no Latin," science, and military drill.

Before his majority, he revolted against his father's stern measures and planned to flee to England, but this breach in military discipline brought death to one of the conspirators and Frederick himself barely escaped execution. Revolting also against religious conformity, he was compelled to acknowledge the doctrine of Predestination and to swear loyalty to his king before being forced to live in semi-retirement, first in Cüstrin, later in Ruppin, where within four years he had redeemed himself in the King's eyes. "That their method of training-up a young soul, to do God's will, and accomplish useful work in this world, does by no means appear to the royal mind an admirable one," Carlyle adds and explains that this episode, though it brought Frederick to stern self-discipline, caused him to draw a curtain of reticence over all important actions later.

Both Wilhelmina and Frederick were pawns in parental matrimonial machinations, but neither of the hoped-for weddings took place. The sister enjoyed her withdrawal to reading and music; her brother studied to become a monarch, at the same time courting famous literary men by correspondence, Voltaire in particular.

Then followed four years of domestic tranquillity, in which the irascible Friedrich Wilhelm had finally to admit "there is much in this Fritz." He married his son to the "Inspidity of Brunswick," as the sharp-tongued Carlyle called Princess Elizabeth Christian, and they lived comfortably in Reinsberg. Apparently this marriage overcame all rumors of the indiscretions of the "foppish" prince. In 1735 he became for some time the virtual ruler during his father's illness.

In 1740 the young king took over a peaceful kingdom into which he brought culture, and Voltaire, for a brief respite. From the three-fold conquest of Silesia to the partition of Poland, King Frederick did not falter in his firm resolve to create, or re-create, an Empire, never holy, and certainly not Roman. The latter three volumes are history: accounts of treaties, battles, entertainments, aggrandizements, pomp and circumstance. With the exception of masterful descriptions of topography and scenes of battle, Carlyle falls into his own dryasdust bin. The affluent and powerful ruler has not the charm of the young prince, though he is vividly portrayed in setback and reversal, and something of his aspiration to glory has majesty in the recounting. His patronage of Voltaire, however, is another matter for discussion.

Prince Frederick had corresponded with Voltaire for several years. When Frederick became king, he invited Voltaire to visit him. The philosopher accepted the invitation because he hoped to convince the new king that peace was the best system for all, and he traveled to Germany as an emissary for Cardinal Fleury. When Frederick realized that Voltaire was acting as a diplomat for the cardinal, his relationship with the philosopher cooled rapidly and soon Frederick was attacking Voltaire's theories. Carlyle, the doughty but dour Scotsman did not like the "crafty" Voltaire or his Madame du Châtelet, even to the point of ridiculing the poor mistress in death. He asks his readers to disregard Voltaire's writings on the subject of Frederick as lies, a request we must in turn suggest in connection with Carlyle on Voltaire.

Embedded in the fourth and fifth volumes are sly though satiric barbs which enliven battles and treaties. On the other hand, there is seldom a question among scholars and none among military men of the worth of these latter volumes, which are carefully composed and documented.

The Seven Years' War and the failure to resolve the Russian problem marks the conclusion of this ambitious work, beginning with the "Afternoon and Evening of Friederich's Life." The repairing of a ruined Prussia, the partition of Poland, and the Bavarian war telescoped into the greater acts of reform, agricultural advances, and stable government. Although the last chapter is an appendix of a day in the life of the great general and ruler, "a Daguerreotype" which repeats something of an opening chapter written years before, the book effectively ends with the death of the monarch, an account of his burial, and a valediction restating the Carlylean thesis.

HISTORY OF KING RICHARD III

Type of work: History

Author: Sir Thomas More (1478-1535)

Time: 1483

Locale: England

First published: 1543

Principal personages:

RICHARD PLANTAGENET, Protector and then King of England, Richard III

ELIZABETH, wife of deceased King Edward IV

DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, the ally of Richard

About 1518, at the age of forty, Sir Thomas More stopped work on his History of King Richard III. This was the time when he was about to become a valuable member of the Council of Henry VIII, the beginning of a political career that would lead to his death and martyrdom in 1535. The work itself bears the mark of Thomas More the humanist scholar, rather than Sir Thomas the courtier or St. Thomas the martyr. Written in both English and Latin versions, presumably concurrently, the History was broken off at the speech of the Duke of Buckingham and Morton, Bishop of Ely, one week after Richard's coronation. The English version was then completed by Richard Grafton and published in the Hardyng and Halle chronicles, before being published in 1557 as a separate work edited by More's nephew, William Rastell. More had planned at first to extend the History to include the record of his own times, up to Henry's VII's death, but for reasons of his own he put the work aside.

These reasons may have had their roots in the polemical nature of the work. It is very much a treatise against tyranny and nonmoral statecraft, a refutation of Machiavelli some years before The Prince was even completed. Far from being a Tudor apologist, as he is sometimes thought to be, More is nonpartisan. He is against tyranny in any king, whether it be Richard III or Henry VII. A sense of his own well-being, perhaps, is what leads him to draw his moral lesson from Richard alone and not risk extending his criticism to the kingship under Henry VII. This is the reason why one should remember that it is the Thomas More of the Utopia and not the Thomas More of the years of Tudor courtiership who is writing at this time.

The History of King Richard III is not only significant as an example of the humanistic education of princes, but it is also important as the model for other histories to follow. Historians tell us it was not equaled in excellence until the appearance of Sir Francis Bacon's History of the Reign of King Henry VII, written more than a hundred years later. His historical methodology is not always exemplary, for much of what he says is based on conversations with others and much is used for the polemical thesis he is trying to develop. Though not objective, nor completely accurate, the facts he presents are probably closer to the truth than many scholars in past centuries, notably Horace Walpole, have been willing to admit. Nevertheless, what strikes the reader immediately is the vivid character of the writing and the ability to make the historical characters really seem to have once been alive. The fact that over a third of the work is in the form of speeches and dialogue indicates the book's dramatic character.

The characters are wonderfully alive. Edward IV is not only a model prince who was politic in counsel and who treasured wisdom, thus fitting in well with More's thesis about kingship, but also a lustful king whose youthful excesses are duly recorded yet pardoned by More because they did not interfere with the ruling of the kingdom. Jane Shore, moralized if not immortalized by Thomas Churchyard in A Mirror for Magistrates, is sympathetically drawn and her illustrious past contrasted with her harsh old age, for she was still living at the time of the writing. Henry, Duke of Buckingham, is treated as a surprisingly naïve conspirator, and the gap between his supposed guile and his actual naïveté gives More a chance to exploit fully the irony he sees present throughout the chronicle of the times.

The characters who are drawn in most depth are Queen Elizabeth and King Richard. Elizabeth, the widow of King Edward IV, is sympathetically portrayed. The great scene with her in the sanctuary of Westminster is marked by the pathos and even tragedy of her certain knowledge of what will happen if she allows her younger son to leave the protection of the sanctuary and yet the necessity for her to pretend that she trusts Richard. The verbal jousting between the queen and those trying to pry her son from her could be put almost directly upon the stage, and the final, dramatic separation of mother and son is equal to any scenes on the English stage before Shakespeare. Her clear-sightedness, deliberately contrasted with Buckingham's obtuseness, gives her tragic stature while it keeps him a figure worthy of contempt.

The blackness of Richard is dramatically, if not historically, justified. In a world turned upside down by revolt, he is the personification of unnaturalness. Everything about him is unnatural, grotesque, and evil. First, there is his unnatural appearance, his crooked back and malevolent look. More tells us he was born with teeth and came out of the womb feet first. As the unnaturalness extends from his appearance to his actions, we see him causing his blood relatives to be murdered. This evil is illustrated vividly in his scheme to destroy the two princes in the Tower, a deed assigned to Sir James Tyrell and carried out by his two lackeys, John Dighton and Miles Forest. Finally the poison spreads to the political order itself where the lack of rightful, thus natural, succession leads to many horrors. All this unnaturalness reaches a climax in the nightmares that More says came to Richard as his life drew to its violent close. These terrible dreams disturbed the restful nature of sleep and perhaps inspired Shakespeare in his own handling of the dream scene in The Tragedy of King Richard the Third.

The ability to depict vivid scenes such as that of Richard waking trembling from his sleep is another reason for the lasting interest of the history. This scene, the one with the queen, the dream of Stanley about the boar (symbol of Richard) with the slashing tusks, and especially the great "strawberry episode" in which Richard's innocent, offhand request for some strawberries is swiftly followed by his seizure and execution of Hastings, accomplished with a speed that leaves the reader breathless and those around Richard with no time to object, are all examples of how Thomas More is able to develop the dramatic possibilities inherent in the historical situations. Perhaps the most dramatic scene of all, at least the one that best illustrates More's gift for irony and humor, is the one in which the Duke of Buckingham and the Mayor of London are trying to prepare the people for Richard's usurpation. Buckingham is much taken with his flair for rhetoric and expects that after his long speech the people will not only be reconciled to the usurpation but will cry out for Richard to be king. Instead, his speech is met with complete silence. Buckingham turns to the mayor, who tells him that perhaps the people had not understood what he said.

Buckingham repeats the whole speech, with several more flourishes, but meets with the same response. Finally some of Richard's men, planted advantageously throughout the audience, cry out for Richard, and the Duke replies that he is happy to see so many behind the new king. Not far behind the ironic detachment in the narration of this scene is a very severe condemnation of usurpation of any sort.

This depiction of character and scene is made possible by the vigorous prose employed by More. The History of King Richard III is a fine example of how English could be used for the purposes of rhetoric and represents a considerable prose achievement at a time when English was considered second to Latin as the language of the learned. The style is vigorous, humorous, ironic, and the rhythm is characterized by the balanced cadences. Some of the long sentences, never obscure though sometimes complex, have the balance of the prose of Samuel Johnson. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why Johnson quoted extensively from More in his essay, "The History of the English Language," which he appended to his Dictionary. As a work of prose, the History of King Richard III is a landmark.

Thus there seem to be four main facets of the work that demand attention and account for the book's lasting worth. It remains a valuable example of More's own thought and of the humanistic tradition in which he was educated. It is important as an example of English history, both for what it tells us of King Richard III's life and time and for the model it sets for later histories. It is important in that it gave dramatic impulse for one of Shakespeare's early plays and may have had some deeper influence on the development of his thought. But most of all, it is important for the style in which it is written and the dramatic characterization and confrontations which that style brings so vividly to life.

HISTORY OF THE REBELLION AND CIVIL WARS IN ENGLAND

Type of work: History

Author: Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon (1609-1674)

Time: 1625-1660

Locale: England, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, France, and Spain

First published: 1702, 1703, and 1704

Principal personages:

CHARLES I,

CHARLES II,

EDWARD HYDE, Chancellor of the Exchequer, later Lord High Chancellor, Earl of Clarendon

LUCIUS CARY, Lord Falkland

WILLIAM LAUD, Archbishop of Canterbury

OLIVER CROMWELL,

GENERAL GEORGE MONK

The History of the Rebellion and the Civil Wars in England has been called the first great English history, without which Macaulay's famous continuation would not have been possible. Clarendon's work was first published in three volumes, in 1702, 1703, and 1704, at Oxford, through the effort of his second son. The Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, . . . Written by Himself, a companion volume, was written expressly for his children and was not published until 1759. The history was begun informally, being compiled during his two periods of exile in which the earl hoped that something could be learned to improve the future from the "wicked times" of vindictive lawlessness. As an Anglican, loyalist, and legalist he acted always out of high principles during the exasperating Short and Long Parliaments, in exile, and in the Restoration court "full of excess, idleness, and luxury; and the country full of pride, mutiny, and discontent."

The work is not known for its accuracy, although the first draft was completed when state documents were available, nor is it known for its completeness; Clarendon was biased and treated in detail the Royalist argument, to the neglect of the Commonwealth's. However, he was aware that his art and method were different, full, vigorous, "with fidelity and freedom of all I know of persons and things."

As an Oxford bachelor of arts in the Middle Temple, he had moved among the literati and intelligentsia; Ben Jonson and Lord Falkland were his mentors and friends. For twelve years a member of the House of Commons, he was quick to follow the lead of Falkland, learning statesmanship under his tutelage. Clarendon was inspired by the feeling of the revolutionary times, by classical historians whom he knew well, and by historians of his own time, notably Hooker. The history proper begins with his own removal from Parliament to the position of trusted adviser, chief defendant and speech writer, and Chancellor of the Exchequer for the ill-fated but kingly Charles I. Clarendon's advice to Charles I, which was not heeded, was to bring about a conciliation of the factions of Puritans, Royalists, Levellers, Catholics, and Presbyterians. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, Clarendon raised money to support the royal cause and provide a government in exile. During this time he also wrote defenses of the king against the scurrilous accusations of Cromwell's faction. When King Charles delivered himself to the Scottish army at Newark in 1646, his trusted adviser turned to the aid of the exiled Prince of Wales. After a break with Queen Henrietta Maria in France, he went to Spain in an attempt to enlist Catholic forces in a restoration of the monarchy.

In exile in Jersey, the great statesman continued his defense of the king while writing his great work. Clarendon advised Charles II at the time of the Restoration in 1660, and it is here that the History of the Rebellion comes to a conclusion, although during his banishment in 1668 Clarendon replaced some of the documents with portraits of influential and pivotal figures of the period. Clarendon never deserted his friends. He defended them against malicious slander, high treason, and any false charges made in the heat of the emotional times. The portraits were deeply and artistically conceived in their candor and touching in their defence of innocence, particularly in death of King Charles I, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Falkland, who were executed at the time of the regicide.

The overcoming of his wise counsel through malicious mischief on the part of his highborn enemies, and in the face of thirty years of service to two monarchs, is characterized by restraint even when he faced a doubtful posterity. His autobiography, written in the third person and for his family, extends the history, recounts the disappointment of his daughter's marriage to the Duke of York, later King James II, contains his praise of General George Monk, his elation over the return of the monarchy, his disappointment in the "French-influenced" court of Charles II, his good advice for avoiding the Dutch menace, and his sincere praise of crown and church.

The keynote to this remarkable work is Clarendon's respect for and adherence to constitutional law: he opposed Parliament when it became dictatorial and the king when he became irresponsible. Clarendon's reputation, then as now, was clear of any taint of self-serving, although his banishment seemed to be the result of overuse of power and complicity in the war with the Dutch. His judgment, discounting his own claims, always was enlightened and his conciliatory manner as exemplary as that of Sir Thomas More; but always his conscience was clear and his Anglican, Royalist, legalistic actions were consistent with his views.

In that "fit season" of the publication, his sons were loyal servants of the king, his daughter was the Queen of England and later the mother of queens, and his reputation was cleared. His grand canvas of cause and effect, together with his insight into men and their motives, has produced a monumental work almost without parallel in history and letters. He was aware that his panoramic view was an innovation, that his analyses of personages manipulating events with such dire consequences were literary as well as historical; and he wrote a rhythmic prose, perhaps too antithetical and parenthetical even for the convoluted style of those times, yet with verve and directness. His work looks toward the Age of Reason.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF KING HENRY VII

Type of work: Biographical history

Author: Sir Francis Bacon (1561-1626)

First published: 1622

Principal personages:

HENRY VII, the first Tudor monarch of England

CHARLES VIII, King of France

FERDINAND OF ARAGON, King of Spain

LAMBERT SIMNELL and

PERKIN WARBECK, impostors claiming the English throne

Sir Francis Bacon wrote in his Advancement of Learning of the importance of biography as a branch of historical writing, pointing out that it is individuals who direct the actions that are recounted in historical chronicles and suggesting that these events can be best examined in the light of the characters of the men who make them. It is this principle that underlies Bacon's History of the Reign of King Henry VII, which is one of the first analytical biographies in the English language.

Bacon wrote his history of Henry VII in a few months during the year following his impeachment in 1621. He was exiled from London, and therefore from many of the sources that would have enabled him to produce new information about Henry's reign. He depended heavily upon the sixteenth century chronicles, especially the history of the early years of the century written by Polydore Vergil. What is original and noteworthy in Bacon's volume is his study of the personality of his subject and its effect upon the course of the English nation during his reign. Bacon is original, too, in his strong emphasis upon the laws of Henry's day; as a distinguished lawyer and Lord Chancellor of England at the height of his career, he was thoroughly familiar with the statute books and the development of the common law, and he felt the significance of innovations in the reign he chronicled. He praised Henry's laws as "deep, and not vulgar; not made upon the spur of a particular occasion for the present, but out of providence of the future, to make the estate of his people still more and more happy; after the manner of the legislators in ancient and heroic times."

Bacon follows a chronological plan in his history, concentrating upon the years after the Battle of Bosworth Field, where Henry dethroned Richard III in 1485. His account alternates between narration and set speeches in the manner of the classical historians; the conversations between important personages add considerable interest to the book.

Bacon presents many facets of Henry's personality as he relates his actions on first gaining the throne. There is a masterful analysis of the king's deliberations about the wisest grounds for claiming royal power, which he held by conquest; through his wife, the eldest surviving child of Edward IV and the heir through the Yorkist line; and in his own right, less clear, through the Lancastrian line. Bacon pictures Henry's reasoning in this manner: "the inconveniences appearing unto him on all parts, and knowing there could not be any interreign, or suspension of title, and preferring his affection to his own line and blood, and liking that title best which made him independent; and being in his nature and constitution of mind not very apprehensive or forecasting of future events afar off, but an entertainer of fortune by the day; resolved to rest upon the title of Lancaster as the main, and to use the other two, that of marriage and that of battle, but as supporters, the one to appease secret discontents, and the other to beat down open murmur and dispute."

Through his account of the major events of the reign—the successive uprisings of discontented commoners and fractious noblemen; invasions by impostor-Plantagenets who claimed to be true heirs to the throne; lengthy negotiations with Emperor Maximilian, the ineffectual ruler of the Holy Roman Empire, and with King Charles VII of France, a considerably more formidable foe; and the slow formation of an alliance with the politically sagacious Ferdinand of Spain, whose throne rested on foundations almost as uncertain as Henry's—emerges a picture of the English king as a man cautious and deliberative, reluctant to fight, yet skillful in using the threats of war to fill his own coffers, merciful to most of his rebellious subjects, but ruthless in the extermination of others, notably Edward Plantagenet, one of the few surviving Yorkist claimants to the throne, when their deaths seemed expedient.

Henry's skill in the game of statecraft is evident in Bacon's discussion of the lengthy and somewhat confusing conflict with Charles of France over the control of the Duchy of Brittany. The author cites a message from Henry to Charles proclaiming the English monarch's friendship for both the French king and the Duke of Brittany and offering his services as mediator. Bacon explains Henry's desire to avoid military conflict whenever possible: "A fame of a war he liked well, but not an achievement . . . and he was possessed with many secret fears touching his own people, which he was therefore loath to arm."

The liveliest portions of Bacon's narrative are the accounts of the uprisings on behalf of Lambert Simnell and Perkin Warbeck, boys brought forth by opponents of the king, the former as Edward Plantagenet, the latter as Richard, Duke of York, one of the princes murdered in the Tower of London. Both impostors were supported by English noblemen and by Continental sympathizers with the Yorkist cause, especially Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, a close relative of Edward IV. Henry coped skillfully with both plots, punishing their instigators and trying to make examples of the youthful conspirators. Simnell was made a kitchen boy; Perkin, whose campaign came far nearer success and lasted for several years, became a juggler at court for a time. However, after he had escaped, been arrested again, and been imprisoned in the tower, he initiated a new and far more threatening conspiracy with the real Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, who, as the nephew of Edward IV, had a legitimate claim to the throne. As a result of their plot both Warbeck and the prince were executed. Henry incurred considerable public displeasure by his severity with them, though he tried to place the blame on his ally, Ferdinand, who co-operated by saying that he could not allow his daughter, Katherine of Aragon, to wed the Prince of Wales so long as Warwick lived as a threat to the succession of his future son-in-law.

Bacon does not gloss over the later years of Henry's rule, when his henchmen Empson and Dudley perverted the laws of the realm to confiscate land and wealth from subjects all over the kingdom. Henry's avarice increased with his age, and he left enormous wealth at his death, riches soon to be dispersed by his pleasure-loving son, Henry VIII.

Bacon concludes his account of Henry's reign with a character sketch of the king. He summarizes the traits of character that he has shown influencing English policy throughout the reign, portraying Henry as a shrewd ruler, a crafty statesman who calculated the effects of all his actions and "knew the way to peace was not to seem to be desirous to avoid wars." He was his own chief counselor, a man who had no really close friends or advisers. Empson, Dudley, and others who performed his less attractive tasks served him only as the "instrument" does the "workman." Henry's independence is clear in this comment: "To his confederates abroad he was constant and just, but not open. But rather such was his inquiry, and such his closeness, as they stood in the light towards him, and he stood in the dark to them; yet without strangeness, but with a semblance of mutual communication of affairs."

Henry chose his ministers generally for their cleverness rather than for their birth; he commanded the grudging respect of the nobility, but he was never certain of their loyalty. Yet, unlike many monarchs of his era, he could trust his closest counselors implicitly; only one betrayed him during all the years of his reign.

The king emerges from Bacon's account as a clever man, but a cold and withdrawn one; he seems also to have been a dutiful husband and father. He was far from the most appealing of men, but Bacon, whose temperament was in some ways like Henry's, recognized his greatness: "Yet take him with all his defects, if a man should compare him with the Kings his concurrents in France and Spain, he shall find him more politic than Lewis the Twelfth of France, and more entire and sincere than Ferdinando of Spain. But if you shall change Lewis the Twelfth for Lewis the Eleventh, who lived a little before, then the consort is more perfect. For that Lewis the Eleventh, Ferdinando, and Henry, may be esteemed for the tres magi of the kings of those ages. To conclude, if this King did no greater matters, it was long of himself: for what he minded he compassed."

THE HIVE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Camilo José Cela (1916-)

Time: 1943

Locale: Madrid

First published: 1951

Principal characters:

DOÑA ROSA, owner of the café "La Delicia"

MARTIN MARCO, a poor poet

JULITA, the niece of Doña Rosa

CELESTINO ORTIZ, the owner of the café "Aurora"

DON IBRAHIM DE OSTOLANZA Y BOFARULL, the candidate for the Royal Academy

"The Hive" is the name Cela gives Madrid, specifically in a passage describing dawn breaking after the turgid night life of the city. The book is a latticework, a crisscrossing of innumerable lives; the number of characters has been estimated at some one hundred and sixty. Not all of them are principals, of course, but even where only brief glimpses are given of some of them, they all serve to illuminate the whole fabric of shifting contacts. In fact, in any sense of a structured novel, there are not even any principals. Some characters merely appear more often than others.

In some ways The Hive resembles the picaresque novel. The majority of the characters are down-and-outers, or on the verge of poverty. Those who are managing to make a prosperous or respectable living are largely grasping or mean. Hunger is always present. The need for the peseta haunts the lives of the Madrileños. Where can one get the most for it? Who does not have it and is trying to get by without it, bluffing or hoping? But the work is not the traditional picaresque novel with an anti-hero whose personality, in the service of many masters, holds the work together. Here there are only recurrent situations, without either the peripatetic progress of the pícaro, or the attainment by him, sometimes, of respectability. No narrative unfolds. None of the characters shows spiritual change. Thus the book is more like Pío Baroja's kind of picaresque world, formless but revealing the swarming life of the city.

The two characters most often seen are the domineering Doña Rosa and the shabby Martin Marco, the nearest thing to an anti-hero. Doña Rosa, owner of the café "La Delicia," is the presiding genius of the book. She is in a sense the queen bee of the hive, although there is nothing regal about her. She is avaricious, a slave driver, and a bully. When young, she had been courted by the wastrel son of a marquis. Today, though she is fat and dirty, she is a rich woman, covered with diamonds. In addition to the café, she owns the house it is in and four apartment buildings, located in other parts of Madrid, whose tenants she terrorizes. She is shareholder in a bank, and it is rumored she has trunks full of gold scattered here and there.

The public that visits Doña Rosa's comes in two waves, as is the case, Cela says, with all cafés: the after-lunch group, around three o'clock, for coffee and, he adds, bicarbonate, and the after half-past-seven group. Early arrivals of the latter receive angry looks from the former; and the same thing happens to stragglers from the afternoon group. Each group likes to feel that it is the Old Guard.

But although the action centers mainly around Doña Rosa's café, other places figure frequently in the kaleidoscopic shifts of scene—the café "Aurora" owned by Celestino Ortiz, who had fought in an anarchist unit during the Civil War and who keeps a copy of Nietzsche under the bar; the house of assignation of the widow Doña Celia Vecino de Cortés, who keeps the portrait of her dead husband Don Obdulio Cortés López on the wall of the most expensive bedroom; the dairy of Doña Ramona Bragado, which is a cover-up for the same line of business, purchased by her out of money left her by the Marquis de Casa Pela Zurana, a senator and twice Undersecretary of Finance, whose mistress she had been.

Still other cafés are visited, as well as the interiors of people's apartments; for example, that of Doña María Morales de Sierra, who spies on everybody in the neighborhood and reports all she sees or hears to her bored husband, a technical assistant at the Ministry of Public Works. Cela likes to insert sly references to important-sounding positions (a dig at Spanish empleomanía or urge for government employment).

Martin Marco is a poet who writes (for warmth) either in the Central Post Office or the Bank of Spain; paper is plentiful in both places—telegraph or deposit forms. He carries cigarette stubs in an envelope. He sleeps on a cot in a store-room of the apartment of Pablo Alonso, and sometimes when his brother-in-law, Roberto González, is not at home, he cadges a meal from his sister Filo, with whom it is strongly suggested he has had incestuous relations in the past.

Roberto is a free-lance bookkeeper who works for, among others, Señor Ramón, a baker. Pablo Alonso is in business but apparently does nothing much about it; he spends most of his time with his mistress Laurita, who is beginning to bore him with her doglike devotion.

One of the regulars at Doña Rosa's is Señorita Elvira, a poor drab who maintains some of her liaisons through correspondence, cadges cigarettes, dines on a peseta's worth of chestnuts, and suffers horrifying nightmares. In the past, one of her patrons was Don Pablo (not Pablo Alonso) who still watches her with interest at Doña Rosa's, much to his wife Pura's disgust.

The manager of Doña Rosa's is Consorcio López, who came to Madrid from the town of Tormelloso; there he had seduced Marujita Ranero and, threatened by her brother, had fled the town. Marujita later gave birth to twins and sent pictures of them to Consorcio, who is quite proud of his unofficial family. Marujita, now Doña María Ranero de Gutiérrez, and rich, comes to Madrid with her husband. Because he is an invalid, she packs him off to a nursing home and loses no time in renewing her affair with Consorcio. She also offers to buy out Doña Rosa.

One of the most amusing characters is the pompous Don Ibrahim de Ostolanza y Bofarull, who is practicing his speech of acceptance into the Royal Academy. A neighbor in his apartment building, Don Leoncio Maestre, bursts in to tell him that Doña Margot, another neighbor, has been strangled with a towel. She was the mother of Julián Suárez Sobrón, an effeminate character known as The Lady Photographer. Unknown to his neighbors, he had come home, found his mother dead, and rushed out in panic to a meeting with his friend Señor Giménez Figueroa, known as The Chip. These two end up in jail for questioning, while Don Ibrahim presides over a meeting of the tenants of the building to decide what to do. The Judge Magistrate has already been to the scene, arrested Don Leoncio Maestre, who after discovering the body is in a state of shock, and told the rest to go home; he will call them if he needs them. However, Don Ibrahim feels the need for the meeting, and here again Cela reveals his extraordinary flair for assembling resounding names and variegated backgrounds.

Among those present we find Don Antonio Pérez Palenzuela, an employee of the National Syndicates, who feels that he should be in charge of the proceedings; Don Camilo Pérez, a chiropodist; Don Exuperio Estremera, a priest; Don Lorenzo Sogueiro, the owner of the Fonsagrado café; Doña Juana Entrena de Sisemón; Don José María Olvera, a captain in the Army Ordnance Corps; Arturo Ricote, a clerk in the Banco Hispano Americano; Don Julio Maluenda, a retired merchant marine officer; and Pedro Tauste, the owner of a shoe repair shop called "The Footwear Clinic."

Don Ibrahim, continuing to make long-winded speeches, proposes that they all mention Doña Margot in their prayers and pay for a funeral mass. This they all vote enthusiastically to do.

Doña Rosa's sister, Doña Visitación, is married to Don Roque, and they have three daughters—Julita, Visi (or Visitación, named for the mother), and Esperanza. They have a maid with the engaging name of Escolástica. Esperanza is the only one of the daughters engaged; she is to marry Agustín Rodríguez Silva, the owner of a drugstore and fifteen years her senior. Julita is in love with Ventura Aguado, a law student who has failed the examinations for public notary for seven years, not counting—Cela inserts—the war years. The two end up in a liaison at Doña Celia's, under the eyes of Don Obdulio's portrait. An ironic touch is that Julita's father, with Lola, maid to Doña Matilde, a pensioned widow, patronize the same establishment. They pass each other on the stairs. Julita says she has just been to the photographer. Don Roque is on his way to see a sick friend. The only one blissfully unaware of all that is going on is Visitación, the mother.

Petrita, the maid to Filo and Don Roberto, is sent to Celestino's café on an errand. When mention is made of recent peevishness on Martin Marco's part and the fact that he is in debt to Celestino, she sells herself to the latter for the twenty-two pesetas owed, because she is fond of Marco.

Victorita, a packer at a printer's, is in love with the sickly Paco, and shamelessly earns money through the offices of the go-between Doña Ramona, in order to keep him alive. Paco is the brother of Eloy Rubio Antofagasta, a poor ex-student who has just been given a job by Don Mario de la Vega, the owner of a printing shop. Don Mario is also the one making a financial deal for Victorita's favors.

Martin encounters an old friend from the university, Nati Robles, who had been an earnest, political-minded, unattractive girl. Now she is a beauty, elegantly dressed. Martin asks Nati for five pesetas, so that he can pay for standing her a treat. She gives him fifty and tells him to buy her a present. When he finally selects a print for her at the bookshop of a friend, he learns that he has lost what was left of the money. Seoane, the violinist at Doña Rosa's, finds it and is thus able to buy some dark glasses for the weak eyes of his sickly wife.

There are many more characters in Doña Rosa's gallery: Don José Rodríguez de Madrid, a magistrate's clerk, is held in envy by all his friends because he has won a prize in the lottery. The fact that it was only forty pesetas does nothing to dispel their wonder; there is a young poet, given to fainting spells in cafés, who must be carried, unconscious to the lavatory, where the smell of the disinfectant revives him; there is another pensioned widow, Doña Asunción, the friend of Doña Matilde. Besides visiting Doña Rosa's they play cards at Doña Ramona's dairy. Doña Asunción has two daughters, one married to a clerk in the Ministry of Public Works, the other living with a university professor in Bilbao, a fact of which Doña Asunción is very proud. Doña Matilde has a son who is an impersonator in Valencia; his stage name is Florentino de Mare Nostrum.

The staff at Doña Rosa's is as varied as the clients: Padilla, a kind-hearted cigarette boy who lends cigarettes to Señorita Elvira; Luis and Pepe, hardened waiters, indifferent to Doña Rosa's tirades; Alfonsito, the messenger who goes out for the newspapers and is always scolded by Doña Rosa for staying away too long; and the musicians—Macario, the pianist, and Seoane, the violinist. Their czardas and Viennese waltzes are a particular delight to Doña Matilde and Doña Asunción. Macario is engaged to a girlish, homely woman, thirty-nine years old. Seoane and his sickly wife live in a damp, basement flat they rent for seventy-five pesetas a month. But the apartment is close to the café and he can walk to work.

There is also a little gipsy boy, six years old, a flamenco singer, who haunts the neighborhood. He is self-supporting and, in the midst of all the tawdriness he witnesses, curiously innocent. When kicked by a drunken prostitute early in the day, his only thought is that it is a terrible time of day to be drunk. He collects the copper coins flung to him by his audiences, and by the time he has sung from one to eleven he has enough to get his supper at an inn where he is known—a plate of beans, bread, and a banana, for three pesetas, twenty céntimos. After his supper, he sings until two in the morning. He sleeps under a bridge on the outskirts of Madrid.

There is some resemblance in the pictures of Madrid night life between The Hive and José Suárez Carreño's The Final Hours. But the latter centers around three main figures, and lacks the amused satirical outlook of Cela. In The Hive the handling of personal and local names is one aspect of Cela's attitude. "Dons" and "Doñas" are sprinkled among the resounding names of the pretentious, the mediocre, and the disreputable. One firm mentioned is that of "Casimiro Pon's Widow and Sons, Threads and Yarns." A man who inherited a cakeshop called "The Sweetener" from a brother who died in the Philippines changed its name to "The Site of Our Forefathers." The final heir changed this to "The Golden Sorbet." A fairly successful bar called "The Earthly Paradise" became run-down and the woman owner ran off with a drunken guitar player. There is even a profane parrot named Rabelais.

In the end, Martin Marco appears to have done something shocking, but the reader does not know specifically what it is. From the timing and from the sequences one can read between the lines, and from what we know of his inherent nature, it would not seem to be connected in any way with Doña Margot. But a newspaper item indicates to his friends and sister and brother-in-law that something must be done for him, that he must be got out of the way. The book ends with Martin's visit to the grave of his mother; he is filled with thoughts of reforming his life and still unaware himself of what he has done. The author leaves him with a sense of foreboding. He has read all of the newspapers which he carries in his pocket except the part concerning himself.

This book is a long way from the contrived tremendista cynicism of Cela's The Family of Pascual Duarte, published in 1943. (Tremendismo was a popular literary trend of the 1940's which emphasized the horrifying mainly for its own sake.) Here, in spite of his sardonic attitude, and the possibility that he himself might be the first to disavow it, Cela reveals a compassion for the unfortunates, the failures, the outcasts that inhabit the "hive", and along with it, in spite of the world of venality and sometimes cruelty displayed, there is always present the Spanish sense of decorum.

THE HOLY STATE AND THE PROFANE STATE

Type of work: Moral discourse

Author: Thomas Fuller (1608-1661)

First published: 1642

Clergyman and moralist, Thomas Fuller was one of the most popular preachers of his age, even though he sided against the Puritans during the Commonwealth and died shortly after the Restoration. He was, in other words, popular despite his opposition to the emotionally charged Puritan overthrow of the monarchy. Such popularity was difficult to obtain, but as Thomas Fuller knew, it was even more difficult to keep. He was a prolific writer, and in his many books he always simplified his presentation of even the weightiest matter so that his books would have profitable sales. The result of this simplification is a style that is at once cogent and austere, instructive and entertaining.

But style is only one cause of his popularity. Fuller's agile mind, quick to penetrate into the core of whatever problem was at hand and slow to embrace any tenet that did not withstand scrutiny, was one that would be rare in any age. Not only did he have discrimination of mind; he was also witty, and he was able to captivate his congregations by his balance of the profound and the humorous. In his writings he preserved this ability, so that The Holy State and The Profane State, his first book, is never weighty in spite of its didacticism or trite in spite of the detailed moral rules.

The four books of The Holy State and the one of The Profane State are composed of three major types of prose. First, Fuller lists the traits that best illustrate a certain character. These maxims are pithy, easily remembered statements such as (for an advocate) "He is more careful to deserve, than greedy to take, fees," or (for a statesman) "He refuseth all underhand pensions from foreign princes." But Fuller knew that maxims alone are seldom read and even less frequently obeyed. When he gives a maxim, he immediately explains it with a clever anecdote or epigram. Second, after he has listed several of these maxims, he illustrates proper behavior in a "character" or a brief sketch exemplifying ideal types. In these "characters" lie the summations of character-types that were familiar to the Elizabethan theatergoer such as the favorite, the good schoolmaster, or the good servant. In terms of literary history, these "characters" were more than summations of the popular theatrical figures of an earlier age; as the prototypes of the descriptions later to be found in novels, they were influential in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries as statements of ideal types for the novelist's pen. Third, at times when a historical character will adequately illustrate one of the moral principles, Fuller inserts a terse, greatly stylized biography. In an age when the art of biography was still in its infancy, these biographical sketches helped to form the eulogy into a literary genre that would mature through Walton and Boswell into the psychologically probing biography of the twentieth century. The biographies in this book include such a broad selection of biblical and historical figures that few types of people are neglected.

In Book One of The Holy State, Fuller describes domestic relationships. The nine characters are conceived in their widest seventeenth century application so that the twentieth century reader can get a fairly good idea of what the people of that time thought constituted a harmonious home life. The good wife, for example, is properly obedient to her husband, and the good husband is cautioned not to tell secrets to her because she is too frail to sustain the strenuous responsibility of keeping secrets. The good parent is a combination of love and authority, and through his parents' examples the good child can learn to honor and obey them. But Fuller is realistic and cynically adds, "If preserved from the gallows, they are reserved for the rack, to be tortured by their own prosperity." Widening his view to other domestic relationships, Fuller proceeds to describe the good master and the good servant; the first should be stern but just, while the second should be quick to obey. The good widow and the constant virgin are special cases, each demands special consideration, even though Fuller believes that all women should marry and raise large families. The final two relationships, the elder brother and the younger brother, lead Fuller from the immediate family because they concern education and inheritance. Five biographies are inserted into the text to expand the lessons. St. Monica illustrates the good wife; Abraham, the good husband; Eliezer, Abraham's servant, the good servant; Lady Paula, a legendary Christian martyr, the good widow; and Hildegardis, a founder of convents, the constant virgin. The fact that Fuller uses Catholic saints and heroines for his illustrations shows his tolerance in an age of Catholic persecutions, but the fact that none of his examples comes either from England or from contemporary history reveals the severe criticism of his times that makes a moralist concerned enough to take action.

Book Two deals with the citizen, the professional man, and the man of the world. As a moralist, Fuller knew that what began in the home must be extended to society as a whole; therefore the same division into roles and into mutual dependences that he so carefully outlined for the home, he preserves for the business world. The good advocate and the good physician should be servants, not masters; they should think of their clients, not of their purses. But the controversial divine and the true church antiquary should think first of the dogmas rather than pursue far-fetched personal or sectarian ideas. This was especially cogent advice at the time when the Puritans were attempting to justify their recent execution of King Charles I, and Fuller's opinion of such an uncivilized action is clearly, though tactfully, presented. The general artist and the faithful minister are ideal mixtures of learning, moderation, and humility. In these Fuller shows his sensitive awareness of the responsibilities of those men who are in a position to sway public opinion. The good parishioner, the good patron, and the good landlord are also leaders, and since they are closer to the people, their roles are much more important for the maintenance of a "godly" society. The rest of the good citizens—master of a college, schoolmaster, merchant, yeoman, handicraftsman, soldier and sea captain—represent the majority of British wage earners in the 1640's. Their responsibilities can be summed up into a simple dictum: be obedient to your betters and live a Christian life of prayer, industry, and uprightness. The last two citizens are the good herald and the true gentleman, positions that occupy the amorphous gulf between the middle class and the aristocracy and thereby provide the transition to Fuller's discussion of the highest class.

Book Three interrupts the natural progress of the discussion because Fuller thought that it should balance the halves of his folio. This book, subtitled "General Rules," gives moral and social rules that are true for all men regardless of class. Here Fuller covers such broadly different topics as hospitality, self-praising, and tombs. His purpose in this book is to describe the life of moderation in which the individual is neither too proud nor too humble. According to Fuller either extreme in any trait, even religious zeal, is bad; the fully developed Christian gentleman should seek the way of harmony. He should be neither profligate nor unrealistically saintly. The six maxims that Fuller lists in the chapter "Of Moderation" form the philosophical basis to the entire folio: "Moderation is not a halting betwixt two opinions, when the thorough believing of one of them is necessary ■ salvation. Nor is it a lukewarmness in those things wherein God's glory is concerned. But it is a mixture of discretion and charity in one's judgment. Yet such moderate men are commonly crushed betwixt the extreme parties on both sides. Violent men reel from one extremity to another. Pride is the greatest enemy to moderation." With this enlightened view of moderation, Fuller is almost Aristotelian in his accounts of the general rules that should govern all men.

In Book Four, Fuller treats the aristocracy, and in contrast to Book One most of the biographies are of Elizabethan courtiers and nobles. Also, most of the principles are pointed, for the book was published after the fall of the English monarchy. Fuller discusses ten characters and eleven biographies, each worded in a way that points skillfully to the moral decadence of his own contemporaries. The favorite or court parasite opens Fuller's discussion on the conduct of this class, and his disreputable character is illustrated by the lives of Haman, Cardinal Wolsey, and Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. Fuller's treatment is sarcastic and bitter, for this is one social position with which he has little patience. The wise statesman, on the other hand, is exemplified by William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, Queen Elizabeth's trusted adviser; he is a man who is constant, loyal, and shrewd in the affairs of his monarch. The good judge (Sir John Markham) and the good bishop (St. Augustine and Bishop Ridley) are men who must maintain the laws and authority of the State and the Church; they must be wise, perceptive, and just. The true nobleman and the court lady are persons of the nobility, but blood alone does not give them their superior graces. That must come from their behavior, for a noble person must act in a noble way. Because the nobility forms the backbone of the nation, it must seek the very best life, or the country will collapse from within. The good ambassador and the good general, the prince and the heir apparent, have the responsibility of holding the country's place in the balance of power both between countries and within the state. Finally, Fuller describes the king, the man who must be virtuous and gentlemanly if the rest of the people are to be the same. Only if the highest member of society is spotless, will the rest be spotless.

The last book is The Profane State. Here Fuller describes the behavior that inevitably leads to social, moral, and religious anarchy. The harlot, the witch, the atheist, the hypocrite, the heretic, the liar—these are the types of people whose behavior is sinful and vicious. The traitor and the tyrant, Fuller's last characters, are the two whose actions lead to the end of peaceful Christian society and represent the establishment of Satan's kingdom. This final book shows that, if the moral maxims outlined in the first four books are not obeyed, the result will be a state that no one would willingly choose.

HOMAGE TO MISTRESS BRADSTREET

Type of work: Poetry

Author: John Berryman (1914-)

First published: 1956

The admirable Mistress Bradstreet receives in this poem more than homage. The work is a paean of praise to a woman who, as all students of American history and literature agree, was praiseworthy. Her biography, even in a skeletonized version, reveals the causes.

Anne Dudley was born in 1612, presumably in Northampton, England, of a well-read and intelligent non-Conformist father. In 1628, at the age of sixteen, she married Simon Bradstreet, aged twenty-five, a graduate of Cambridge University. They sailed to America on the Arbella in 1631. Anne herself was a Puritan of profound religious conviction, but she was intelligent and well-educated, and with her natural stimulus strengthened by her surroundings in the New World she was capable of strong-willed behavior, even to the point of rebellion. Thus she could not accept without questioning the tenets of American Calvinism. She responded energetically to the numerous demands of her father and her husband, both of whom became governors of Massachusetts Colony. Yet she still had time to become the mother of eight children, to overcome illnesses, to be a loving daughter and wife, and to write enough poetry to fill a fat volume. She died in 1672.

John Berryman's response to Anne Bradstreet is one of total approbation. He warms to her with a fervor at times approaches adulation. The poem covers her whole life. But it is not in fact a biography; rather, it is more than a mere account of the external aspects of her life. The work is at the same time a spiritual biography of the woman and of Colonial Massachusetts. Berryman's success in his attempt is notable because of the power of his language and because of the general success of his style.

Berryman catches the essence of his subject's conflicting characteristics, the power of her personality, in the first stanza. She is restless but patient. She was a loving mother but also a scholar of both literature and the Lord. As the stanzas develop, so does her character. She realizes that in the alien New World she and her husband must love each other. They must recognize worldly love and its importance because time is transitory. The years rot away.

The fourth stanza introduces the art and power of the poem. The first three and a half stanzas are spoken by the poet about his subject. At this point the poet's voice blends with that of Mistress Bradstreet, who continues the poem with only occasional interruptions by the poet and with an occasional dialogue between her and someone else. This stylistic technique has been highly praised. It is an effort to push back the horizons of poetic technique begun by the great American innovator Ezra Pound and carried on by various followers. It is a method by which the poet can reach more deeply than common into the very essence of poetry, telescoping statements and feelings, omitting transitions, plumbing to the very axis of poetry. This strength, if misused, can result in mere affectations, in technique for technique's sake and in terribly flat and meaningless statements. Generally, however, the level of poetic accomplishment is effectively high indeed.

The fifth stanza, spoken by Mistress Bradstreet, continues the catalogue of happenings in her world. She recounts the voyage on the Arbella and the death of the woman for whom the ship was named. More deeply, the poet touches on her hopes and aspirations and fears, the Puritans' troubles in the New World. All recountings are energized by the subject's strong character, brightened by her personality. She breathes poetry and revels in life. She deftly switches from present to past, effectively overlaying one time with another. She goes back to her youth when smallpox blasted the beauty from her face but when Romance and Mystery were brought to her in the person of Simon, her husband to be.

Her memory is agonized by memory of her revulsion at the Calvinism of John Cotton and her attraction, good Calvinist that she was, to Catholicism; she recognized that she must be disciplined against the easier attraction. The uncertain journey of her life is re-emphasized time and again as she remembers that her patience is short and she revolts from the life around her. The conflict between body and soul—the weakness of the flesh and the hoped-for strength of the spirit—are especially powerful in her memory. Sex pulls her like a magnet, then floods her very being, rising to a crescendo of glory in the accomplishment of having children, especially her first, born when she was twenty-one. Perhaps no lines in the whole poem are superior to the statement of the joy of this accomplishment. She is ecstatic.

The iron bands of her environment are revealed in her reaction to the trial of Anne Hutchinson for her "Antinomianism," her "traducing the ministers and their ministry," and her consequent excommunication and banishment by the synod of churches and by Governor Winthrop. Mrs. Bradstreet's reaction was ambivalent. She despised the mistreatment of Anne Hutchinson for her dissenting views, but she burned more inwardly than outwardly.

As she reveals herself in her examinations of herself, Mistress Bradstreet is of the earth and of the spirit, a balance never firmly and indisputably established, never sure of the ascendancy of which. She is also Mother Earth, encompassing the whole of life. Like Walt Whitman at a later period, she is large enough to include all. She renounces nothing, however petty and repulsive. The ending is thus a great affirmation.

In the style and technique of the poem lies its glory, and an occasional lapse into weakness. The language is compact, muscular, powerful. The words are simple, direct, earthy, slangy, idiomatic, and effective. The art of telescoping and compacting sometimes, however, vitiates its own strength, as when, for example a fifty-two-word, eight-line parenthesis separates, for no logical or aesthetic reason, the subject from its verb. But such technical weaknesses are few.

In outline this curious but somberly moving poem of fifty-seven eight-line stanzas is effectively organized as the spiritual autobiography of a complex personality who lived with physical hardship and spiritual travail the double life of a woman and an artist. Readers may be repelled at first by the rough intellectuality of the verse and the elliptical intimacy of the material, but a careful reading is likely to show how apt the writer's form and diction are for his task. In this work the poet shows that the American past may be employed as a subject for serious poetry without reshaping it to the wonder of legend or exploiting it for sentimentality.

HYDRIOTAPHIA: URN-BURIAL

Type of work: Philosophical essay

Author: Sir Thomas Browne (1605-1682)

First published: 1658

Hydriotaphia: Urn-Burial; Or, a Discourse of the Sepulchral Urns Lately Found in Norfolk is at the same time one of the great glories of Renaissance scholarship and without doubt one of the greatest prose poems in English literature.

The work is ostensibly a study on some forty or fifty Roman funeral urns that had been recently discovered near Norfolk. But the whimsical and associative mind of the author immediately reads philosophical implications out of, and rich analogues into, the urns.

In the "Epistle Dedicatory," addressed to "My worthy and Honoured Friend, Thomas Le Gros, of Crostwick, Esquire,"

Browne sets his tone. He broods on the common fate of all men, asking who can know the fate of his own bones or how often he is to be disinterred and scattered, as the bones in these Roman urns are now being brought again from their private seclusion. The uncertainty of man's ashes depresses his enthusiasm for earthly affairs at the same time that it excites his curiosity. He feels that it is his right and duty as physician, and man, to read the bones of our ancestors and learn from them, to make the living profit from the dead and to keep the living alive as long as possible.

Browne begins with a study of burial customs of ancient times, touching first on Biblical Abraham and the patriarchs, and Adam, then proceeds whimsically to the assertion that God interred but one body, that of Moses. Browne next takes up the subject of the burning of corpses, which he asserts was widespread in ancient times. He begins with Homer's account of Patroclus and Achilles, discusses the older tradition in Thebes, and then ranges to Israel, to the Amazons, and even to the Americas.

Next Browne says he will not discuss the ceremonies and rites of cremation or interment that are generally touched on by authors, but will talk only on the collected bones and ashes of the Romans discovered recently in England. He then moves from this narrower subject to a learned discussion of the burial customs of the peoples loosely associated with, or suggested by, the predecessors of seventeenth century Englishmen—the Romans, Druids, Danes, and others.

He points out that Caesar expressly says that the priests of the Druids used to burn and bury. History is silent on whether this custom held in the land of the early Britons, but since history speaks out clearly that the Romans distinctly influenced these early natives of Britain in many ways, for example, in getting them to build temples and wear gowns and study Roman laws with the intention of following it, probably, Browne feels, these people also followed their religious rites and customs in burial.

Browne further reminds his readers that in Norway and Denmark numerous burial urns obviously not of Roman origin in design are found containing not only bones but numerous other substances such as knives, pieces of iron, brass and wood, and, in Norway, one containing a "brass gilded Jewes-harp."

In the next chapter Browne continues with an inquiry into the various ways people have decorated the insides of sepulchers and tombs. He observes that men, such as Ulysses in Euripides' Hecuba, have not been so much concerned with how great they have been in life if they can be richly memorialized in death. He observes that great men affect great tombs, and large urns contain no mean ashes. He observes also the changing customs about the artifacts that have been placed in tombs, from the earliest customs when want dictated that only the most meager items be included to more opulent times when objects of much value were buried with the remains of the great people.

Browne also discusses the inscriptions which have headed graves, what kinds of bones make the best skeletons, the various positions in which peoples have placed their dead, and the time allowed between death and interment.

From the physical facts of life and death Browne rises to the spiritual. In these flights of fancy he, as a good Christian, reaches his greatest heights of philosophy and poetry. He realizes that life is transitory, of short duration, and life after death should be of greater importance than life on earth. He believes, however, that many people, perhaps most people, throughout the ages have failed to anticipate the wonders of the next world because of eagerness to exhaust the pleasures of this world. His feelings on the subject are at the same time an affirmation of faith in religion, which is characteristic of his general attitude, and a horror at those people who are shortsighted in their overall view.

The full value of this magnificent work can be appreciated only by actual reading of some of the great organ-like lines, of which the following are typical:

Were the happiness of the next world as closely apprehended as the felicities of this, it were a martyrdom to live; and unto such as consider none hereafter, it must be more than death to dye, which makes us amazed at those audaci-ties, that durst be nothing, and return into their Chaos again.

But to subsist in bones, and be but

Pyramidally extant, is a fallacy in duration.

To be namelesse in worthy deeds exceeds an infamous history.

One of his most eloquent meditations deserves quotation in full:

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the Pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the Temple of Diana, he is almost lost that built it; Time hath spared the Epitaph of Adrian's horse, confounded that of himself. In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad have equall durations; and Thersites is like to live as long as Agamemnon. Who knows whether the best of men be known? or whether there be not more remarkable persons forgot, then any that stand remembered in the known account of time? Without the favour of the everlasting register, the first man had been as unknown as the last, and Methuselahs long life had been his only Chronicle.

Oblivion is not to be hired: The greater part must be content to be as though they had not been, to be found in the Register of God, not in the record of man. Twenty-seven Names make up the first story before the flood, and the recorded names ever since contain not one living Century. The number of the dead long exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the Aequinox? Every hour adds unto that current Arithmetique which scarce stands one moment. And since death must be the Lucina of life, and even Pagans could doubt, whether thus to live, were to dye. Since our longest sunne sets at right descensions, and makes but winter arches, and therefore it cannot be long before we lie down in darknesse, and have our light in ashes. Since the brother of death daily haunts us with dying memento's, and time that grows old in it self, bids us hope no long duration: Diuturnity is a dream and folly of expectation.

In many ways the most philosophically incontrovertible and stylistically memorable of Browne's statements in this work is the oceanlike roll of "Grave-stones tell truth scarce fourty years. Generations passe while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks."

One of the curiosities associated with Browne is the fact that the author of such a work as Urn-Burial should himself become a victim of persons interested for other reasons in burial places. His coffin was invaded in 1840 and his skull (a craniological wonder) was stolen and subsequently sold by the sexton of the church in which he was interred.

THE IDLER

Type of work: Periodical essays

Author: Samuel Johnson (1709-1784)

First published: 1758-1760

Joseph Addison and Richard Steele created with their Tatler and Spectator papers a vogue for the periodical essay that lasted almost to the end of the eighteenth century. One of their greatest successors in this genre was Samuel Johnson, who wrote three series of articles for weekly newspapers, naming them for the personae he adopted in each. The Rambler essays were published between 1750 and 1752; the Adventurer, in 1753 and 1754; and the Idler, in the Universal Chronicle, in 1758 and 1759.

Throughout his life Johnson lamented his tendency to while away his hours in inactivity, and he must have taken wry pleasure in beginning the third series by assuming the role of one who deliberately devoted his life to useless pastimes. In keeping with his role as the Idler, Johnson tried to keep the tone of these last essays lighter than that of his earlier works. However, he inevitably included some of his characteristic reflections on the burdens of life, commenting on the inevitable disappointments that follow most hopes, on the tendency of friendships to dissolve through suspicion, separation, envy, or competition, and on death and his hopes for immortality.

These serious reflections comprise only a small portion of the Idler; more often Johnson comments in an amusing vein on the follies of his age. Even his language is more informal than usual, for he has substituted a flowing colloquial style for the carefully balanced phrases and the Latin-ate vocabulary of much of his work.

Many of the Idler pieces purport to be letters from various readers, and through them Johnson gently satirizes social foibles of the mid-eighteenth century. A merchant, Zachary Treacle, writes to complain that his wife distracts him all day long in his shop, strolling about and asking "a thousand frivolous questions" when she might assist him, leaving the housework to a slatternly maid and spoiling their children. He considers the greatest indignity imposed on him to be their regular Sunday afternoon promenade when he is often forced to carry his child.

Betty Broom, a lady's maid, sends the Idler two letters describing her misfortunes as one who has more education than the world thinks her station in life entitles her. Another mistreated husband, Peter Plenty, complains of a wife who cannot resist sales, with the result that his house is full of unused and useless articles: "the dining room is so crowded with tables, that dinner scarcely can be served; the parlour is decorated with so many piles of china, that I dare not step within the door; at every turn of the stairs I have a clock, and half the windows of the upper floors are darkened, that shelves may be set before them."

Many of the essays are enlivened by briefer portrait-caricatures of familiar types. Tom Tempest and Jack Sneaker are the fanatical Jacobite and Whig, each convinced that the party of the other is the embodiment of all evil. Tempest whispers to his friends that a new monarch will soon replace the Hanoverians whom he despises, while Sneaker devotes his hours to worrying about new Papist conspiracies. Jack Whirler, characterized in another essay, is the man who is perpetually busy, so completely occupied in rushing from one task or engagement to the next that he never has time to accomplish anything. The traveler who finds every step a dangerous adventure is pictured in Will Marvel; he regales his acquaintances with vivid accounts of the perils he barely escaped on journeys that were, in fact, quite uneventful.

One of the most interesting of the portraits, one of Johnson himself, was contributed by his friend Bennet Langton, who submitted to the Idler the journal of a scholar, including the projects he planned to complete in three days and the way his hours actually passed. Distracted by visitors, outings, and new ideas, he made little progress on his proposed works, though sudden inspiration contributed to the creation of other pieces. This sketch fits well with what is known of Johnson, who always had a number of enterprises in hand and completed some of his best essays as diversions from the scholarly labors of his dictionary.

Each of Johnson's volumes of essays included literary criticism. In the Idler he introduces Dick Minim, a young man who, on acquiring an unexpected fortune, set himself up as an arbiter of literary tastes, gathering the bulk of his knowledge in coffee houses and at the theater and picking up a few critical clichés from books he studied when the playhouses were closed. His literary opinions were always those generally accepted. Faced with a new work he inevitably gave an equivocal judgment: "Till he knows the success of a composition, he intrenches himself in general terms; there are some new thoughts and beautiful passages, but there is likewise much which he would have advised the author to expunge." Minim was in his element when he had a pupil to instruct in platitudes, and he had a wide following of those who considered him a paragon of learning.

In several of the later Idler essays Johnson comments on various literary matters, among them biography, language, and the problems of translation. A renowned biographer in his later years, he considered the genre one of the most interesting literary forms, but he points out the difficulty in achieving objectivity and suggests that only in autobiography can a man be seen without the colorings of praise or blame.

In another piece Johnson defends the "use of hard words," noting that especially in specialized subjects precision can only be achieved through "difficult" language. If a man is describing a building he can convey a far clearer picture by using architectural terms than by employing the vocabulary of the layman. On the other hand, Johnson discussed the problems of writing "easy poetry," verse which is clear, simple and unadorned, noting that a colloquial or affected style is often mistaken for the pure one he advocates.

A large number of the Idler essays do not fall into any of the categories outlined above. Johnson seems to have written, usually extemporaneously, on any subject that happened to catch his fancy. Several essays are Oriental tales with moral themes. In others he makes an impassioned plea for the relief of those in the debtors' prison and argues convincingly that the creditors are partially guilty for allowing men to fall into their clutches. He praises the charitable impulses of his time in another paper and commends in particular the work of the charity hospitals. Interspersed among these relatively serious observations are a witty account of the ladies left languishing when the gentlemen go off to war and a mock tribute to the enterprising woman who rode a horse a thousand miles in less than a thousand hours.

Johnson has few compliments for the press of his day. Their treatment of war news is, he says, dull, and sets up a model story in which the events of a battle are carefully spaced out to enlist the readers' interest for a whole week; it is a mistake to put all the available information in the first article, then reiterate it for days afterwards.

In one of the most amusing essays Johnson ridicules the advertising in the papers, scoffing at the large claims made for bed coverings, face creams, and patent medicines: "The vender of the 'Beautifying Fluid' sells a lotion that repels pimples, washes away freckles, smoothes the skin, and plumps the flesh; and yet, with a generous abhorrence of ostentation, confesses, that it will not 'restore the bloom of fifteen to a lady of fifty.'"

The Idler reveals many facets of Johnson's talents; he succeeds equally well as a portraitist, a satirist, and a moralist. It is in the last, most familiar and most satisfying guise that Johnson concludes his series. He meditates on the sadness of ending any activity and suggests that all conclusions are little deaths: "An even and unvaried tenour of life always hides from our apprehension the approach of its end. . . . The uncertainty of our duration is impressed commonly by dissimilitude of condition; it is only by finding life changeable that we are reminded of its shortness." Though the Idler has been meant as entertainment, Johnson expresses the hope that his readers have come, through reading it, to realize that there approaches "the day in which every work of the hand, and imagination of the heart shall be brought to judgment, and an everlasting futurity shall be determined by the past."

IGNATIUS HIS CONCLAVE

Type of work: Theological satire
Author: John Donne (1572-1631)
First published: 1611

In Ignatius His Conclave, the Anglican divine John Donne wrote a satire that is at times fanciful, at times devastating, and on occasion screamingly vindictive against the Jesuits. In the final scene Ignatius Loyola, Spanish founder of the Society of Jesus, seats himself next to Lucifer in Hell. Ignatius His Conclave appeared in both Latin and an English "translation." A foreword purported to be by the printer but obviously by Donne states that the author was unwilling to have the book published but finally permitted the printer, who cites the examples of Erasmus and Luther, to publish it.

Intending to annihilate the Jesuits with satire, Donne allows his wit and invention to be overpowered by venom. Ignatius' lengthy oration listing the vices of the Popes becomes tedious. Even tedium, however, cannot darken the flashes of Donne's imagination which dart throughout the satire. The comments of his "disembodied soul" are almost always delightful. His awareness of Galileo's discovery of the telescope made public only a year before this satire was written and his use of the Copernican cosmography set Donne in advance of Milton, who preferred to follow Ptolemy. His conquest of space and awareness of "other worlds" on stars make him sound contemporary. The upside down standards in Hell in which vice becomes virtue foreshadow Fielding.

Donne says that his "little wandering sportful Soule" went traveling through the universe while he lay in an "extasie." He prefers to be silent concerning the Heavens rather "than to do Galileo wrong by speaking of it, who of late hath summoned the other worlds, the Stars to come neerer to him and give him an account of themselves." He "saw all the rooms of Hell open to my sight." In the most remote room, he finds Pope Boniface III and Mahomet contending about the highest room in the secret place of Hell reserved for the greatest innovators. Boniface glories in having expelled an old religion and Mahomet in bringing in a new. Donne thinks that Mahomet has no chance of winning because he attributed something to the Old Testament and his followers live in "barren unanimity." Boniface has a better chance because he had not only ignored but destroyed the policy of the State of Israel established in the Old Testament and his successors in the several orders "have ever been fruitful in bringing forth new sinnes, new pardons, and idolatries and King-killings."

As Donne's soul stands listening, pretenders to the eminence of innovator ask admission. The first is Copernicus, whom Donne is surprised to see until he remembers that the Papists have extended heresy to include almost everything. Copernicus says that, pitying Lucifer thrust into the center of the earth, he raised him and his prison the earth up into the heavens so that God no longer enjoys his revenge on him. He has "turned the whole frame of the world" and is "thereby, almost a new Creator."

Lucifer is in a quandary. He thinks that to deny Copernicus admission would be unjust but to admit one of his ambitions and undertakings is dangerous. Ignatius Loyola, who had subtly worked his way up to the Devil's chair, perceives this perplexity. Although, says Donne, Ignatius in life was ignorant and had never heard of either Ptolemy or Copernicus and might have thought that Almagest, Zenith, and Nadir were saints' names and "fit to bee put in the Litanie, and Ora pro nobis joyned to them," he had learned a great deal in Hell from the Jesuits arriving there daily. Ignatius asks

Copernicus if he has invented anything which benefits Lucifer. Ignatius thinks not. He also says that Copernicus' findings may be true. Ignatius thinks that Clavius, who designed the Gregorian calendar and denied Copernicus and "the truth which at that time, was creeping into every mans minde," better deserves admission. The new Calendar has "egregiously troubled" both heaven and earth. The saints no longer know when their days are. St. Stephen and John the Baptist have to be awakened ten days sooner so that they can come down to the places where their relics are preserved and work miracles. "Let, therefore, this little Mathematitian (dread Emperour) withdraw himselfe to his owne company." If the Pope should decree that the earth does not move and that an anathema shall be inflicted on all that hold with Copernicus, then he and his followers "may have the dignity of this place." Copernicus stands as still "as he thinks the sun."

When the next pretender says that he is "Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Paracelsus Bombast of Hohenheim," Lucifer trembles, thinking this a new exorcism, perhaps the first verse of St. John taken out of the Welsh or Irish Bible. When he understands that the words are the name of a newcomer, he recovers and asks what the new arrival has to say to the Great Emperor Sathan, Lucifer, Belzebub, Leviathan, Abaddon. Paracelsus (a German physician and alchemist, 1493-1541) asks to be admitted because his experiments and medicines have killed many while assuring them that their diseases, especially the pox, were curable. Thinking themselves in no danger, these ill people persevered in licentiousness. Also, Paracelsus made poison tasteless.

Ignatius asks why Paracelsus should be favored when the Jesuits, though untrained, practice medicine? He tells Lucifer that men like Paracelsus tamper with metals belonging to Lucifer. Why should these metals be used to cure disease when they could more fittingly be given as tribute to Lucifer's brother and colleague, the Pope? Paracelsus will have to be content to govern in chief that "Legion of homicide-phisitians, and of Princes which shall be made away by poyson in the midst of their sins, and of woemen tempting by paintings and face-physicke." Paracelsus accepts this decision.

Machiavelli decides to outwit Ignatius, who is making all the judgments. Instead of addressing Lucifer, Machiavelli speaks to Ignatius as next after Lucifer, his "beloved son." He intends to make Lucifer feel that Ignatius threatens his authority. Machiavelli says that Ignatius' sons have brought equivocation into the world. This they learned from "The secretest Records of Hell itselfe: that is out of the minds of Lucifer, the Pope, and Ignatius (persons truly equivocal) [who] have raised the life againe the language of the tower of Babel, so long concealed and brought us againe from understanding one another." Compared to the achievements of the Jesuits, his efforts, Machiavelli says, seem childish; yet he has provided the Jesuits with an alphabet and certain elements and was a schoolmaster to them. He says that he taught not only the prince how to possess a free commonwealth through perfidy and dissembling of religion but also the people under his oppression how to conspire and remove a tyrant "so that from both sides, both from Prince and People, I brought in an abundant harvest, and a noble increase to this kingdom."

Moved by his oration, Lucifer feels that he is bound to reward Machiavelli. Aware of Ignatius' ambition, he thinks Machiavelli a fit "instrument to oppose against him." However, Ignatius, more subtle than the Devil, throws himself at his feet and adores him. Finally, getting control of his voice, Ignatius charged that this "obscure Florentine" has transgressed against Lucifer, the Pope, and the Order of the Jesuits. He says that Machiavelli flatters Lucifer in order to trap him. Machiavelli, he says, in life did not even believe in the Devil, thinking that all his inventions came from his own wit. He has belittled the Popes by attributing to them the sins of common men when, actually, their sins were so enormous and unusual that most men would never have thought of them. He gives a long catalogue of the sins of the Popes, ranging from granting indulgences for twenty thousand years for preposterous sins, to Popes who were guilty of all licentiousness and aberration, and finally to transferring empires, ruining kingdoms, and deposing kings. Also, he says, Machiavelli had said that the Pope is the prime mover of evil and so had bypassed the Devil himself. There is nothing in Machiavelli's commentary which might be of use to the Church. Men knew how to lie long before Machiavelli. After a long discourse on the "reforms" in the Devil's religion comparable to the reformation in the Church, Ignatius concludes, "In all times there have been Friars which have far exceeded Machiavel."

Machiavelli, at last, vanishes. Donne says, "Truely, I thought this Oration of Ignatius overlong, and I began to thinke of my body which I had so long abandoned, lest it should putrefy, or grow mouldy, or bee buried."

When Lucifer decides to withdraw to his room and admit none but Ignatius, he is surrounded by a whole army of souls begging for admission. Among them is Christopher Columbus "who having found all waies in the earth and sea open to him did not feare any difficulty in Helle." Ignatius sees that Columbus and all the rest are turned away to lower regions. Lucifer, fearing for his authority, decides to make one decision of his own, to admit Philip Neri (Saint Philip, Filippo Nero, 1515-1595, Italian priest, founder of Congregation of the Oratory). After a long debate with Ignatius about Neri, Lucifer yields when he sees that Ignatius has given a sign and all his Jesuits are ready to support him. The English legion, he notes, is fiercer than the rest.

Seeing no way to leave out Ignatius, Lucifer tells him that he cannot divide his kingdom with him nor can Ignatius inherit it because Lucifer cannot die. However, he will write to the Bishop of Rome who will have Galileo draw the moon like a boat closer to the earth. All the Jesuits will cross to the moon, where they can easily unite and reconcile the "Lunatique Church" to the Roman Church. After the Jesuits have been on the moon a little while, there will grow naturally a Hell over which Ignatius may have dominion. He may even advance to the other stars, "which are also thought to be worlds." Lucifer tells Ignatius that he may "beget and propagate many Hells, and enlarge your empire, and so come nearer unto the high seat which I left at first."

A false rumor reaches Hell that the Pope has canonized Ignatius. Ignatius turns to find the seat next to Lucifer taken by Pope Boniface. Lucifer, afraid of losing his seat to Ignatius, helps him hurl Boniface from this eminence.

Donne's spirit returns to his body. He says that after seeing a Jesuit turn the Pope out of his chair in Hell, he suspects that the Jesuits will try as much in Rome.

IN MEMORIAM

Type of work: Elegy

Author: Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809-1892)

First published: 1850

In Memoriam A.H.H., Obiit MDCCCXXXIII, unquestionably one of the four greatest elegies of English literature, records the intellectual, emotional, religious, and aesthetic changes Tennyson underwent throughout a sixteen-year period following the early and tragic death of his closest friend, Arthur Henry Hallam in Vienna, on September 15, 1883. The year In Memoriam was first published, 1850, was also the year Tennyson married Emily Sellwood and succeeded Wordsworth as Poet Laureate.

In Memoriam as truly represents the chief Victorian conflict of science and faith as any work of its era; and Tennyson's attempt to reconcile the religious doubts arising from his personal sorrow and the effects of pre-Darwinian theories of evolution was hailed by thinkers of his time as an intellectual landmark. The cyclic change, the turn from private grief and despair to the larger public vision and concern for wider, social issues, that can be found in this poem reflects Tennyson's growing acceptance and reconciliation with the problems of his age.

It appears that Tennyson did not conceive publishing the one hundred thirty-one lyrics of In Memoriam until late in the 1840's, when he brought them together as one poem, arranging them so as to reflect in the three-year time scheme of the poem the sixteen-year period of his life which they actually represent. Since these lyrics were written over a long time span, they vary considerably in the tone and mood of reaction to Hallam's death, thus dramatizing lyrically Tennyson's psychological condition. Though many organizational schemes have been offered, the most generally accepted views the poem as illustrating a movement from initial grief (I-XXVII); to philosophic doubt and despair (XXVIII-LXXVII); to rising hope (LXXVIII-CIII); to affirmation of faith (CIV-CXXXI). But the actual growth is more subtle than this and requires close attention to repeated images, such as the two yew tree poems or the two visits to Hallam's house.

The "Prologue," dated 1849, and addressed to "Strong Son of God, immortal Love," expresses the poet's conviction that faith, not knowledge, leads to a harmonious union of the intellectual and the spiritual. The first section then relates the poet's nearly complete self-absorption in grief, but even here we notice a change, evident for example in the difference between "I held it truth" (I) to "I hold it true" (XXVII). Though Love provides a "higher life" for man hereafter, few can find immediate comfort for present loss in this promise of future tranquility. Nevertheless, the poet affirms his belief that "T is better to have loved and lost / Than never to have loved at all." This acceptance of his experience despite its accompanying sorrow comes only after intervening poems reveal the true depth of his despair; his identification, for instance, with the yew tree, a symbol of death, shows the poet's marked conviction that he, like the yew tree which is not subject to seasonal changes, is imprisoned in grief and can merely endure in "stubborn hardihood."

This fellowship with "Sorrow" (III) induces an intellectual despair and alienates him from comforting Love.

"The stars," she whispers, "blindly run;
A web is woven across the sky;
From out waste places comes a cry,
And murmurs from the dying sun. . . ."

In one sense this conception of the universe as a blindly run mechanism is the central intellectual conflict of the poem. In his deep melancholy, Tennyson questions not only the justice of Hallam's tragic death, but also the justice of the entire creation.

Like a passenger of a "helmless bark" Tennyson moves alternately from numbed despair to self-awareness (IV), and finds composing poetry an anodyne for pain (V). Poems IX-XVII constitute a group unified by the poet's meditation upon the return from Italy by ship of Hallam's body. A "calmer grief" now pervades his heart (XI).

The pain of grief "slowly forms the firmer mind" (XVIII), but locked in his heart remain the deeper sorrows that words cannot relieve (XX). He writes not to parade his emotions publicly, but because he must (XXI).

The second section commences with the first Christmas celebration some three months after Hallam's death. The poet hears the bells' message of "peace and goodwill" but almost wishes never to hear them again. Yet even in his despondency, the bells recall his happy youth, and, touching pain with joy, ease his misery. In the renewal of "old pastimes in the hall" they make a "vain pretense" (XXX), but find consolation in the thought of an afterlife for the dead, though what that afterlife may be "remaineth unrevealed" (XXXI).

The second yew tree poem illustrates a lightening of his burden, for he now sees the tree with "fruitful cloud," subject to change like his grief. The group of poems from XI to XVIII represents Tennyson's attempt to resolve the question about afterlife and also the possibility of a reunion with Hallam. These speculations are not meant to solve the problems, he tells us (XLVIII), but were "Short swallow-flights of song" which soothed his mind.

In LIV Tennyson expresses the vague "trust that somehow good/Will be the final goal of ill." But the two following poems call in doubt this qualified optimism, so that all he can permit himself is to "faintly trust the larger hope" (LV). In his agitated state of mind the poet views Nature "red in tooth and claw" (LVI). The remaining portion of this section deals with the former relationship of the poet with Hallam.

The third section opens with the second Christmas and finds the poet with the sense of the abiding presence of his friend. His subdued grief allows him to treasure their friendship.

Which masters Time indeed, and is Eternal, separate from fears.

Tennyson contemplates the possibility of a visitation by Hallam and experiences a "mystic trance" in XCV, when "The dead man touch'd" him "from the past." The third section concludes with a four-poem series relating to the Tennyson family's removal from Somersby, with its pleasant and sorrowful associations.

With the fourth and final section the poet turns from the past and his personal grief to the future of mankind; this change is signaled by the famous lyric "Ring out, wild bells" (CVI). Tennyson resolves not to allow sorrow to alienate him from society (CVIII). Hallam's qualities emerge clearly for the first time; in a series of poems Tennyson praises his friend, particularly for his attributes of leadership and dedication to social good.

Tennyson draws an important distinction in CXIV of the difference between knowledge and wisdom; with wisdom man does not fear death since wisdom is "of the soul," while knowledge must learn to submit to wisdom and "know her place." "Acknowledging "Love" as his "lord and king," Tennyson proclaims that "all is well" (CXXVII). His optimism is buttressed by his knowledge that Hallam

O'erlook'st the tumult from afar,
And smilest, knowing all is well.

As the elegy draws to a close the poet more strongly feels the certainty of cosmic design: "That all, as in some piece of art,/Is toil coöperant to an end." (CXXVIII). He feels more confident of Hallam's omnipresence: "Thy voice is on the rolling air;/I hear thee where the waters run" (CXXX). His love, though founded on their previous earthly relationship, is "vaster passion" now that Hallam's presence is spiritual and diffused through "God and Nature." The elegy concludes with the poet's self-confident assertion of the permanence of the "living will" which purifies our "deeds" and of the "faith" in truths not to be "proved" until our deaths.

In the "Epilogue" Tennyson celebrates the marriage of his friend, Edward Lushington, to the poet's sister.

History, to paraphrase Corinthians, is many things to many men. It is the record of what really happened and also the story of what men in later times have believed really happened. It is the story of what men thought and felt and did under the pressure and crisis of decisive action. It is concerned with the noble, the foolish, the violent, the base. It is the careful untangling of political, social, and economic motives and forces in the national experience. It is the unvarnished record of fact and it is also the romantic dream of something men have believed in and died for. It is a record of truth but never the final truth, for each age interprets the events and personalities of history according to its knowledge or need. So it becomes almost meaningless to talk about the "lessons" of history or their meanings: history is a story that is never quite finished because it is always open to reappraisal or new conclusions. The many-sided aspects of history provide one reason for the appeal it holds for its writers, professionals, and amateurs alike.

In the American Grain, one of the authentic classics of the 1920's, is a poet's venture into historiography. As such, it is unstated by conventional theory, without debt to academic authority, and as brilliant and idiosyncratic in purpose, insights, and structure as D. H. Lawrence's Studies in Classic American Literature. Also, like Lawrence's critical essays, it is a book written before its proper period. Only in recent years has it been recognized as a revitalizing view of the American past, an original work of considerable magnitude and weight.

At the same time, it was never without influence during the years when it was out of print and neglected by both the critics and the public. One literary debt that comes quickly to mind is found in Hart Crane's The Bridge. Traces of Williams' insights and idioms run through the poem. The half-title page of "Powhatan's Daughter," for example, requotes a passage from Thomas Morton's The New England Canaan, and there are obvious likenesses between the vision of Columbus in the opening "Ave Maria" section of The Bridge and Williams' essay titled "The Discovery of the Indies." Another poet who may have been influenced by In the American Grain is Archibald MacLeish in Conquistador, especially by Williams' description of the destruction of Tenochtitlan and his accounts of the conquistadores—Cortez, Ponce de Leon, and De Soto. There may be echoes also in the closing paragraphs of Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby, in the reference to Henry Hudson and his sailors when they saw for the first time the green shores of the New World and were filled with wonder at the promises the new continent held for men's westering dreams. All of this is not to say that these writers were guilty of plagiarism, only that In the American Grain offered to perceptive readers images and impressions to be held in memory and knowledge until they could be released in fresh works of the imagination.

Despite its significance as a seminal work, In the American Grain is even more important for the function it performs. Williams' purpose, briefly, was not to give a new interpretation of history or to consider its uses, but to discover the thing itself, its nature and the conditions under which it took shape. In "Père Sebastian Rasles" he set forth his aim in a discussion with Paul Valéry, who in the essay is called Valéry Larbaud. Impressed by the other man's knowledge of and interest in American history, Williams claims that everything which has happened or been produced in America springs from discoverable roots, rests on ground capable of being explored and mapped. In the face of the other man's urbane probing into Williams' mind and attitude, the poet insists that it is not possible to trust the men who have interpreted history, from the time of Cotton Mather on. He will go to the sources, he declares, not to uproot history but to make history reveal itself, to trace to their past beginnings the obscurities and partisan views that oppress him, to uncover in the documents of the time the evidence needed to separate fact from myth.

Williams' reordering of the American experience from the century of the Norseman to the Civil War is symbolic rather than philosophical. Clearly, his task involved more than the retrieving of a usable past from the leveling action of time and from legends growing out of the common imagination, or the attempt to find in the meaning of the past a way out of the unsettled present into the future. Exploratory in nature, the book is first of all an act of discovery and recovery, two aspects of the single process of knowing and understanding. Some events or personalities that most historians gloss over or ignore have been brought into the foreground; others recede into it. For Williams is not tracing the development of a society or justifying the culture it created. To speak of a culture implies an abstraction, a phenomenon of cause and consequence which allows no place within its long perspective for the accidental, the discrete, the contingent. This view reduces all history to a concept free of all the rich confusion of chance and circumstance that is life itself. Instead, Williams employs what Allen Tate has called the "Short View" of history, the particular stories of the particular lives of man engaged in contemporaneous interactions of place, time, and personality. Believing, like Emerson, that history is a record of the lengthened shadows cast by men on the earth, Williams reveals in this book the same qualities that we find in his poetry, a strong sense of the "Local"—which is not to be confused with local color—and a ruling passion to express his vision of the world as concisely and concretely as possible. To the poet who declared that there is no reality except in things, no other course was possible.

His experiment in historiography involved also an experiment in style. To give richness of historical content to his book he borrowed lavishly from his sources. Quotations from letters, chronicles, and journals are scattered through the sketches—passages from Columbus' journals, reports of the Salem witchcraft trials, letters written by Benjamin Franklin and John Paul Jones—to color the prose and give it vitality and the ring of truth. Sometimes this quoted matter complements Williams' own prose; sometimes it clashes with dramatic vigor. One is reminded throughout of one of Williams' statements on the writing of poetry: his declaration that the writer takes words as he finds them but transforms them, without destroying their clarity and passion, into an expression of his own feelings and perceptions so presented that they become revelation. It is not what a writer says, he claimed, that is important as a work of art, but the thing he makes with such intensity that it lives by its own force of outward movement and wild inward logic. In the brief narratives and essays making up In the American Grain the writer's historical imagination holds revelation of personality and meaning of situation in delicate but compelling balance, while the language gives the whole resonance and depth.

The book is divided into twenty chapters—dramatic narratives, lyric interludes, brief character sketches—ranging in space and time from the settlement of Greenland through the voyages of Columbus and the exploration of Kentucky to the Civil War, and dealing with such representative or illustrative figures as the conquistadores, Sir Walter Raleigh, Cotton Mather, George Washington, John Paul Jones, Aaron Burr, Poe, and Lincoln. The arrangement is chronological, but the scale of values accorded to the men and events is quite different from that found in the history texts. Benjamin Franklin, for instance, is no longer the wise founding father but the great apostle of catchpenny materialism and opportunism whose face, appropriately, now decorates the one-cent stamp. Aaron Burr, on the other hand, is not the self-seeking man who tried to upset the established order of government because of personal ambition; Williams sees him as a good soldier who brought into politics an element of democratic theory necessary to the times but neglected by other men already in power or aspiring to office, a champion of liberty at a time when freedom was subverted to bureaucratic tyranny, a man finally driven to the imprudence and excesses of which his opponents had already accused him.

Two themes run through the book. One is the failure of Americans to create for themselves a sense of place. The early settler on these shores was already an alienated man, an exile from European society, and on the new continent his feeling of separation became complete. He saw America not as a place to be sensed and assimilated but as a land to be conquered for selfish ends. The forces motivating him were external circumstances of time and place on the one hand, the opportunity to exploit a vast and rich continent, and on the other inward necessity, the need to justify his own identity as a new man in a new land. The first of these drives was public and pragmatic; it hastened the westward movement, created the myth of scientific progress, and laid the foundation for an industrial society and the comforts of an expanding, affluent technical economy, all the while ignoring the cost in terms of individual hardship, economic waste, and the erosion of human values. The other was private and moral. From it we get in part the restlessness, the violence, the communal guilt and shame, the inner fears, the secret loneliness and desire that agitate our society today. Only at rare intervals, in Williams' view, does history present an individual so completely and individually himself and so much at ease in his environment that he shows himself capable of acting as an American, not as a transplanted European or an alien in his own society: Daniel Boone as the explorer and settler, Aaron Burr as the politician, Edgar Allan Poe as the artist, Abraham Lincoln as the leader of a divided nation in conflict with itself. This conflict is implicit in the beginnings of our history. Columbus sensed without really understanding the meaning of America and saw with bright vision the possibilities of place and life in the New World. The opposite side of the picture is the story of the Spanish conquerors, the impact of the cross and sword of feudal Spain upon a pagan society. Occasionally the exploited land revenged itself on its despoilers; the disappointments of Cortez and the secret river burial of De Soto are in effect payment for the destruction of Tenochtitlan and the rape of Mexico and Peru.

Williams' second theme is the blight of Puritanism over the American land. Like Hawthorne, he viewed the Puritans as "miserable wretches" who possessed strength of purpose and will but not the tolerance of strength or the wisdom of purpose. Puritan bigotry and ignorance were demonstrated in the treatment of Quakers in New England and the Salem witchcraft trials. The abstract ideal of purity and salvation almost entirely excluded from Puritan life the idea of place or a sense of beauty as a concrete, natural thing. Williams finds Cotton Mather niggardly and narrow, a man of great but unassimilated learning, whose belief in the supernatural often verged on superstition. Hostile to a flowering of the spirit, the Puritans tried to convert all life into facts and figures, and Benjamin Franklin, as revealed in his maxims, was the inheritor of their materialism and morality. If In the American Grain contains a major flaw, it is found in Williams' treatment of the Puritan. Although he does not succumb to the Puritan-baiting popular among intellectuals in the 1920's, he sometimes criticizes Puritanism, or expresses his grudging admiration, for the wrong things. Today we realize that Puritanism was more than an abstract ideal of an earthly paradise, a theocracy of dogmatic belief and practice; it was also a seedbed of political freedom and independence of mind and spirit.

Because he himself was a poet, perhaps, the true hero of Williams' argument is Edgar Allan Poe, whom he calls the first writer to recognize the possibilities of American life in art and to give shape in language to the spirit of place and time. For Poe, culture was not something to be brought into the national experience but something to be revealed because it was already present in the conditions and circumstances of the world around him. In his poems, short stories, and criticism, he tried to find universal meanings in the local, not in setting alone, but in the American psyche, in apocalyptic visions of the American soul. In the end he was defeated by the forms and forces of culture inherited from the past, and he retreated into a region of grotesques. But at best he expressed with originality and vigor the spirit of place, used the creations of his imagination to suggest that literature is a serious business as logical and depth insightful as science or philosophy. He tried to clear the ground of colonial imitation and the growing belief that material advance was the only possibility offered by American life. His effort was moral as well as aesthetic, and for this reason Williams regards him not as a frustrated genius but as a heroic figure deserving the highest praise.

The book ends with a brief appreciation of Abraham Lincoln. The choice is an appropriate one. For Lincoln was our president in the period of the Civil War, the most deeply felt and possessed experience in our national life, the violent summation of all that had gone before and the adumbration of everything that has happened since. Lincoln is here a symbolic figure, an image of the shortcomings and possibilities in our history, a figure of tragic failure as well as a promise of hope. This impingement of the present upon the past gives In the American Grain an added dimension, a deeper relevance in our own understanding of the events and the men who have shaped our history. This is a poet's book as well as an amateur historian's, a work in which the writer's vision provides new insights into historical truths imaginatively viewed and passionately re-created in language. In it the local view strikes deep into the shape and meaning of the American past.

Until 1960, when he escaped to the West, Petru Dumitriu was head of the State Literary Society of Rumania; he was not only the most powerful man in the literary apparatus of Rumania but was also regarded as his country's leading writer on artistic grounds. Since his escape he has become recognized at least in Europe, as one of those few writers whose talents so far transcend the conventions of nationality as to make them something on the order of writers to the world at large. It is obvious in any case that Dumitriu's stature as an artist raises him above any poet or novelist in the entire history of Rumanian literature.

Incognito, like all of the novels of Dumitriu that have been translated into English previously, was written in French. Given the historical sympathy between France and Rumania and the natural desire of a writer to reach as wide an audience as possible, Dumitriu's adoption of this language was natural. Racially, culturally, and linguistically, Rumania is a Latin island in the midst of an Asiatic—Slavonic and Magyar—sea, and it is significant that his characters speak, when they speak of literature, not of Dostoevski and Tolstoy but of the poets of France, Italy, and Spain, while the first "foreign" author quoted in Incognito itself is Tacitus, in whose Histories the narrator, apparently intended to stand for Dumitriu himself, finds remorseless parallels with the state of Rumania in 1960.

It is almost as if, indeed, centuries later in the Rumanian microcosm, the Roman Empire had at last found a creative artist capable of capturing the whole sweep of its decadence and downfall, its decline and the subsequent reign of the Eastern barbarians. Incognito should not be read alone but in its proper sequence among all the body of Dumitriu's work thus far, that work which, written for the most part within a five-year period, attempts to render the essence of Rumanian history from the nineteenth century to the time of Dumitriu's own escape to the West. In particular, Incognito should be read as the companion piece to Meet- ing at the Last Judgment, to which it stands in much the same relationship as a Purgatorio to an Inferno.

Focused upon a smaller patch of time than Incognito and directed at depicting the character of a particular level in the Rumanian governmental hierarchy, Meeting at the Last Judgment describes a Hell on earth, Rumania as a colony in the Soviet bloc, and its inhabitants, the damned, many of them disillusioned, many of them still believing in the Marxist-Leninist cause, all of them in greater or less degree responsible for the creation of a country where life is genuinely intolerable, all of them thus genuinely damned. Their suffering, as it should be in Hell, is not physical but psychological, for the soul is where Dumitriu's interest lies: the country they live in, and particularly the social level, as high functionaries in the imperial apparatus, they live at, make such things as love, friendship, loyalty, self-respect, or charity impossible for them. Their Rumania is ruled instead by brutality, greed, lust, jealous hatred, duplicity, and sub-animal ambition, and one by one they take their turns as victims of this Rumania they have made.

In such a country the mere maintenance of sanity is an achievement; the maintenance of any other human characteristics becomes something of a miracle, a miracle which seems to testify in Dumitriu's eyes to the essential truth, despite all his own evidence to the contrary, in a conception of man as a creature at least capable of his own salvation, if not of any very much higher nobility. Consequently, though he is by no means an "optimistic" writer, one feels at the end of Meeting at the Last Judgment, as Dumitriu describes in a few quick pages the narrator's escape with his wife—Dumitriu's child was allowed to join her parents in 1964, having been held hostage for four years—a sudden sense of exaltation.

Incognito may be read as a kind of gloss on this exaltation. All of the characters in the book have already appeared in Meeting at the Last Judgment, the difference being that whereas in the previous novel we see them in their basest, most abject, and most superficial aspect, in Incognito we see into the secret nobility of their real selves, where it exists, or into the fear of self that creates a Judas.

The central figure of Incognito, Sebastian Ionesco, is, in fact, a kind of Christ. The major part of the novel is his autobiography, which he has handed over to the narrator, who has been entrusted by the hierarchy with the job of gathering evidence of a secret conspiracy against the state. This conspiracy actually exists. It is not, however, the kind of conspiracy which the state, thinking only in terms of dialectical materialism, can understand. It is a conspiracy of the soul itself, or of the spirit, and its situation, Dumitriu intends us to see, is exactly like that of primitive Christianity under the Caesars.

It has been customary since Gibbon to treat the conversion of Rome to Christianity as the result of a kind of bribe, the bribe of "everlasting life." Such an interpretation of this major event in Western history is naive in the extreme, ignoring as it does the testimony of the Roman Empire itself. From the melancholy of Vergil and the despair of Horace's Roman odes to the agonizing self-reappraisal of St. Augustine, the Latin writers bear increasing witness to an unease of the spirit which only Christianity, of all the hundreds of available religions (all of them equally proffering the offer of resurrection), could assuage. Rome chose Christianity, one may conclude, because it was "truer," because it replaced some form of consciousness which had been lost in the process of "civilization," because its implied description of human nature fitted with what seemed to be the human facts. Like primitive Christianity, Sebastian Ionesco's secret sect is thus a conspiracy of truth, a conspiracy against the mechanical lie of Rumania's Oriental masters.

Sebastian's narrative begins with his describing a day in his adolescence, when his country was still a kingdom and a kingdom still renowned for the paganism of its ways. Over every doorway might have been hung the mottoes "Si piace e lice" or "Fayce que voudras": life on a Danube estate like Sebastian's father's was a perpetual Thélème, a pastoral idyl as it might have been painted by some post-Giorgionesque Italian. In this setting we are reintroduced to Sebastian's brothers and to his sister Valentine, who figure in Meeting at the Last Judgment largely as promiscuous, ambitious schemers.

The real leader of the family, dominating the others not only through his own talents and strength of character but also through their pagan capacity to be intimidated by his beauty, is Philip, brilliant and licentious, a symbol, perhaps, of prewar Rumania, doomed to die in the wreckage of the house during a bombardment. The hint of incest, lurking in his younger brother Christian's relationship with their mother, becomes an apparent actuality, during the course of the day, in Philip's seduction of Valentine, which Sebastian stumbles on as a witness. It is this event, as much as any other, that drives him away from the comforts of home to join the army, then allied with the Germans in forcing the Soviets out of Rumanian territory and invading Russia.

Captured by the Russians, Sebastian is converted to Communism and repatriated by the Red Army's victorious drive to the West. What he hopes to find in Communism, just as he had hoped to find it in heroic sacrifice to patriotism, is purity; his conversion is an attempt to atone for the sins of his people. Nothing deludes like success and for a while, as he becomes one of the leaders in the movement to overthrow the kingdom and establish a Soviet state, Sebastian believes that he has found the purity he was after. He discovers that Valentine, Christian, and Erasmus, his third brother, have all found their way into the Party apparatus as well, following his lead despite the fact that he is the youngest and least prepossessing of all. Though never a Party member, Valentine in fact is destined to become the wife of one of the most influential men of the new regime, Basil Morcovici.

At the highest peak of his personal success within the Party, Sebastian again becomes disillusioned and resigns his position, a step that puts him automatically under suspicion and leads, by no very circuitous route, to a series of prison camps. It is while working as a slave laborer that Sebastian completes his final conversion, to a vision of life that is analogous to, if not directly derived from, the vision of the New Testament. From this point on his life becomes even more dangerous; persecuted though he has been in his search for his vision, he is now in a position to become a martyr, for his faith demands converts. Meanwhile a plot directed by Malvolio Leonte, one of Morcovici's rivals in the Party, has seen in Sebastian a chance to topple Morcovici through Valentine and the fact that she is Sebastian's sister. The narrator of Incognito, "Dumitriu" himself, has been assigned the task of facilitating Sebastian's martyrdom by exposing his creed and denouncing those who adhere to it, a task which he is reluctant to fulfill but which he fears he may have to carry out, to his own shame, for the sake of self-preservation.

In the votaries of Sebastian's sect the narrator finds his allies, in Valentine, Christian, and Erasmus Ionesco, and in Arthur Zodie, a character whose presence in Meeting at the Last Judgment always generates suspicion, but whose evasive acts and language are explained to us in Incognito as the ambiguous defenses, like Christ's "render unto Caesar," of a man living in a world whose rulers are hostile to his vision of himself. Unfortunately, such allies are powerless against the machinations of Party members more vicious than they. Malvolio Leonte soon finds his Judas in Leopold, a neurotic cripple. At the end of the book, however, we do not know what has happened to Sebastian; Morcovici has managed to turn the tide and Sebastian, now no longer a wanted man, has simply disappeared. In fact, whether Sebastian is dead or alive no longer makes much difference, for the conspiracy of soul of which he was the center has given signs of spreading even into the Byzantine cave of Soviet Russia itself.

In Rumania's recent "thaw" towards the West, as represented chiefly for Dumitriu's readers by the release of his daughter, we may perhaps be witnessing the result of some "conspiracy" like Sebastian's, for Dumitriu himself believes the thaw to be genuine and has remarked further that the people who have created it are the same people who helped put Rumania so firmly behind the Iron Curtain. Regardless of its value, however, as a piece of local prophecy, Incognito will remain a considerable work of art, made more considerable by the place it occupies in the total work of a writer who is already recognizably a classic. If Dumitriu has not wholly succeeded in conquering the eternal problem of expressing the experience of religion in words, it must be added that even so Incognito dwarfs Darkness at Noon and threatens to dwarf Doctor Zhivago, the two novels of the twentieth century with which it is most easily compared.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS

Type of work: Comic verse

Author: "Thomas Ingoldsby" (The Rev. Richard Harris Barham, 1788-1845)

First published: 1840, 1842; 1847

Principal characters:

THOMAS INGOLDSBY, Gent., editor of the family legends

CHARLES SEAFORTH, in "The Spectre of Tappington"

LORD TOMNODDY, in "The Execution"

SIR RALPH DE SHURLAND, in "Grey Dolphin"

SAINT DUNSTAN

SAINT GENGULPHUS

SAINT ODILLE

SAINT MEDARD, in their respective "Lays"

"Captain Swing," the symbol of proletarian revolt in England in the 1830's, makes several appearances in Richard Harris Barham's comic verse, always in a contemptible light. The rick-burning associated with the "Captain" may have been abhorred by the poet and his middle-class public as a foreign import of violence, but it was also a sure sign of the depression which closed the decade and the one which followed. A very different sign of the temper of the times was The Ingoldsby Legends themselves; they increased the flow of comic verse initiated by Hood and continued by Lear, Carroll, and Gilbert among a host of minor talents who parodied everything they could lay their hands on and produced comic versions of every familiar object from fox hunting to the history of England. Although the fashion spread to America and the colonies, and lasted into the early decades of this century in Punch, it was so much confined to Victorian England as to become a characteristic of that time and place.

The Ingoldsby Legends first appeared in 1837, the year of Victoria's accession, in Richard Bentley's Miscellany. This was a new publishing venture, edited by Charles Dickens, which ceased shortly before Barham's death in 1845. The volume now titled The Ingoldsby Legends was largely collected from the Miscellany pieces which had previously been published in two series in 1840 and 1842. Apart from a few occasional or sentimental pieces, the legends comprise about fifty long poems and six short stories. The best-known of the latter, "The Spectre of Tappington," initiated the Legends and explains in a final note that this is a story or legend of the Ingoldsby family of Tappington Everard in Kent, the family mansion of the Barhams. Later the legends continued to be published under the pseudonym of "Thomas Ingoldsby," who was supposed to have found them in an old oak chest in the manor and who edited them for publication in the Miscellany.

Barham's pseudonym was preserved for a time and maintained in his letters from "Thomas Ingoldsby" to Bentley prefacing the two series published in his lifetime; but the pretense must soon have been penetrated. Barham in 1837 was forty-nine and well-known in London ecclesiastical, theatrical, and journalistic circles. For sixteen years he had been a Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral and was now also Vicar of St. Mary Magdalene; he is supposed to have been a model parish parson but it is difficult to see how he combined those duties with editing the London Chronicle for a number of years and religiously attending the theater. A minister of the Church of England was obviously in the early nineteenth century a gentleman above all else, and as such he was expected to go out in society and to possess some accomplishments such as the ability to turn out light verse. Barham had already shown such ability in the comic verses and the novel he had published before he began the Legends which are now his claim to fame.

Some of the Legends are still anthologized, "The Jackdaw of Rheims" being the best-known; but the volume as a whole is likely to become wearisome to the modern reader when read right through. The early Victorians found the work amusing because the Legends are long stories in comic verse ending in a mock moral: they were intended to occupy one's time, to entertain, and to instruct. The peculiar mode evolved by Thomas Hood and developed by Barham, that of comic verse, accounted for the length of the stories (over one thousand lines in some poems) and for the sly humor of the moral conclusion.

A comparison of "The Jackdaw of Rheims" and "The Spectre of Tappington" will fix most of the qualities of the Legends. Both deal with the apparently magical disappearance of objects, in the former the Cardinal's turquoise ring, in the latter Charles Seaforth's whole wardrobe of trousers. Many of the Legends deal with the disappearance of treasure—"The Lay of the Old Woman Clothed in Grey," for instance—and that the treasure in one case is trousers is typical not only of oddly coy references to a garment that Barham several times says he can only allude to but also of his general tendency to reduce the exotic and rare to homely proportions. In "The Jackdaw of Rheims" the gorgeous procession of "six little Singing-boys" ends as

One little boy more
A napkin bore,
Of the best white diaper, fringed with pink,
And a Cardinal's Hat mark'd in permanent ink.

In both tales there is a rational explanation for the disappearance. Charles Seaforth, for example, in "The Spectre of Tappington" sleepwalks and buries his own trousers. But the Cardinal's curse apparently causes the return of the ring. More than half the Legends deal with medieval superstitions, generally ghosts and witches, some of them a retelling of popular stories, as in "The Lay of St. Dunstan," which recapitulates the tale of the sorcerer's apprentice. Most of the Legends return to the past rather than dealing with contemporary events; the largest single group is the "Lays" of Saints Dunstan, Gengulphus, Odille, Nicholas, Cuthbert, Aloys, and Medard. The prose "Spectre" reads like one of the comic Irish tales of Charles Lever and restricts Barham's fancy by necessitating dialogue and scenes; he prefers to embroider verbally so that the stanza gradually moves away from the object it is describing and sometimes even returns on itself, as in "The Auto-Da-Fe":

And no one, I am sure, will deny it who's tried a Vile compound they have that's called Olla Podrida.
 (This, by the by, 's a mere rhyme to the eye,
 For in Spanish the i is pronounced like an e,
 And they've not quite our mode of pronouncing the d.
 In Castile, for instance, it's given through the teeth,
 And what we call Madrid they sound more like Marreeth.)

The most obvious feature of comic verse is the complexity of rhyme and meter, providing an elaborate surface to the poems that minimizes their content and is sometimes strained in effect, devices that Gilbert, for instance, gradually toned down in the Bab Ballads and was able to use effectively in the dramatic context of his operas. The variety of stanza forms reflects the complexity of other devices, but is also used to change the style of a whole poem, as in the ballad quatrains of "St. Medard," or the tone of a poem when some grave matter must unfortunately be introduced. The grave element in these poems often deals with the deaths of foolish women, such as the Maiden in the mock-ballad, "Bloudie Jack of Shrewsberrie," or of wicked strong men, such as Sir Ralph de Shurland in the prose tale, "Grey Dolphin," and is usually made ridiculous.

One of the shortest Legends is "The Execution: A Sporting Anecdote," sometimes anthologized under the name of its hero, Lord Tomnoddy, a young man about town who relieves his ennui by throwing a party for his fellow "sports" to watch a man hang; the party becomes so drunken that all the young men miss the execution, which is described in couplets or triplets without the internal rhyme of the rest of the poem.

In the "Auto-Da-Fe" the mass burning of Jews is described in comic verse:

While similar treatment is forcing out hollow moans
 From Aby Ben Lasco and Ikey Ben
 Solomons, Whose beards—this a black, that inclining to grizzle—
 Are smoking, and curling, and all in a fizzle;
 The King, at the same time, his Dons,
 and his visitors,
 Sit, sporting smiles, like the Holy Inquisitors . . .

But the scene is preceded by a long apostrophe of righteous horror at the tradition of the Inquisition and the cruel auto-da-fe, addressed to Seville and couched in trochaic-iambic tetrameter:

Those shouts from human fiends that swell,—
 That withering scream,—that frantic yell,—
 All, Seville,—all too truly tell
 Thou art a MARVEL—and a HELL!

The tripping meter is almost always anapaestic tetrameter; to prevent monotony and the effect of doggerel the succession of twelve-syllable lines is broken by dimeters in the same measure, generally two to a line to give an internal masculine rhyme which is also used by the line or lines that follow:

But whatever she said, It fill'd him with dread,
 And made all his hair stand on end on his head. . .

Barham's verse is chiefly remarkable for its rhyme rather than its meter. He can extend the rhyme of a couplet to eight lines; the triple or feminine rhymes he evolves are his most distinctive feature; usually a polysyllable is made to echo a concluding run of monosyllables or part of another polysyllable which is broken in two. Byron's well-known "intellectual . . . henpecked you all" in Don Juan is outdone many times by Barham, as in the following examples, "temper or . . . Emperor," "College, I . . . Acknowledge, I," "in fine a . . . Agrippina," "Rostopchin . . . drop chin," "Apollo, cost . . . holocaust," "condemn none . . . Agamemnon," "dragon he . . . agony," "dupe colour'd . . . pea-soup-colour'd." It was this verbal dexterity which the Victorians loved, and Barham had a long reign in the parlor, schoolroom, and nursery.

Barham's popularity declined because his verbal dexterity is simply verbal dexterity. When one tires of the juggling virtuosity only the tone and content remain, and both may be distasteful to modern audiences, not because of the constant laughing at church ritual ("Father Fothergill brewed an XXX puncheon of holy water") but for the quality of social and racial snobbery expressed in many of the poems. But these faults are not apparent if the The Ingoldsby Legends are read as they should be, at intervals and in the context of Victorian verse. They belong in the anthologies.

THE INHERITORS

Type of work: Novel

Author: William Golding (1911-)

Time: The Paleolithic period

Locale: A mountainous, wooded countryside not far from the sea

First published: 1955

Principal characters:

THE PEOPLE

MAL, the old leader

THE OLD WOMAN

HA, the wisest of the younger people

NIL, a young mother

THE NEW ONE, Nil's baby

LOK, the People's clown

FA, a young woman

LIKU, a child

THE OTHERS

MARLAN, the leader, called "the old man"

TUAMI, his successor

VIVANT, Marlan's woman, called "the fat woman"

TANAKIL, a child

The Inheritors, William Golding's second novel, was first published in England in 1955. Like Lord of the Flies, The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin, and The Spire, it has a setting remote from our own lives and civilization. In these isolated situations Golding explores man's struggle for survival: the struggle with his fellow men, with his physical environment, and with himself. Although these preoccupations are, in themselves, common to many novels, one of the distinctive features of Golding's work is that at the opening of each novel his characters are already at their hour of reckoning, or, in other words, of extreme peril.

The success of Golding's approach is achieved by an exercise of great imaginative power and the ability to create an environment of great solidity and reality, so that what has gone before is apparent through implication and the way in which the characters react to their confrontation with fate in terms of their previous experience. For the Neanderthal people of The Inheritors the natural, physical world of tree, mountain, river, and rock is the prime reality; when forces alien to their known world intrude, Golding begins their story.

Each spring Mal has led his small tribe, the last of their kind, from their winter quarters by the sea to a terrace and overhang above a waterfall that is their summer home. The way leads over a river that divides around a rocky island. "The people" fear water and had never considered going to the island. When they discover that the log by which they have always crossed the river has disappeared, they are confused until Mal "pictures" a past time when wise men took the original log and bridged the water with it.

These "pictures" are the people's embryonic thought processes: they serve both as memories and ideas. The pictures are rarely consecutive and fade as soon as the need for them has passed, for they are an instinctual and not a rational function. The people can share their pictures without words or express them in simple sentences.

The people have retained the strong senses of animals, but they have also developed their own human rituals concerned with food, fire, and burial. The Old Woman always carries the fire from the winter to the summer home. When the smells of smoke and woman come to Lok from the island, he is bemused and, tricked by his senses into following the familiar scent, he almost falls into the river. As the rest of the people have not caught the faint scent, Lok cannot communicate his picture, and this second intimation of otherness is forgotten in their eager journey to the security of the overhang. Lok almost recaptures his experience while guarding the people that night, but the "picture" fades before he can recapture it.

The people's failure to retain ideas not relevant to day-to-day life makes their survival impossible when faced with the existence of "the others." Also, and this is one of the main themes of the novel, their lack of the knowledge of evil inevitably makes them powerless to combat it. When Ha disappears, although the people can tell by the scent that he has encountered another, their emotions are grief at loss rather than abiding fear because people in this simple, distant world understand one another. This simple, moving statement of faith is the pivotal point of the novel. That the remainder of the book proves it false is Mr. Golding's grim assertion that the meek do not inherit the earth.

After Mal's death and Ha's disappearance, Lok is the only surviving adult male; it is his task to seek out the others. These others are true homo sapiens with the power of reason, for their senses are reduced, their artifacts far more sophisticated than the people's. They use animal skins for covering, have bows and arrows, canoes, drinking vessels, and crude alcohol. They also know sexual jealousy. However, because they cannot eat the bulbs, slugs, and fungi that sustain the people (who never kill for food) and because hunting early in the year is poor, they are near famine.

When the others capture Liku and the New One on the people's side of the river, Lok hears Liku's screams and tries to reach her. He thus exposes himself to the others' arrows. These weapons merely interest him, although he senses danger when he smells the poison on the barbed heads. Lok's apprehensions of danger are lulled at various times by the others' obvious hunger and by his sympathy for them as they work together.

Finally, only Lok and Fa remain; the old woman was drowned, and Nil slain. Lok rejects Fa's suggestion that they escape and survive (the instinct for the preservation and continuation of life is much stronger in the women, protecting the home and finding food the aims of the men) and insists on trying to rescue Liku and the New One.

The others move their camp from the island to the people's side of the river to hunt for deer. The new camp is made by a hollow tree where Lok and Fa hide from the others. From this tree the two people witness an incomprehensible day of ritual and night of debauchery including, while Lok sleeps, the killing of Liku.

The only communication between the people and the others had been Liku's growing friendship with Tanakil, a girl of her own age. They are able to exchange names and Liku has fed Tanakil fungus when she was hungry. This deed, together with the others' need for a sacrifice to make their hunting successful, caused them to kill her.

In an attempt to snatch the New One from the camp, Lok becomes separated from Fa and, believing that she is dead, mourns for her. Although he feels that he is the last of his people, his hope is still sustained by the presence of the other, and at that moment he reaches his furthest point of comprehension, which he does not have the power to retain. Fa finds Lok again, but during a last effort to recover the New One before the others could take him upstream with them she is stunned and swept away in the falls. After the final disappearance of Fa and the departure of the others, Lok is alone and his humanity leaves him.

Solitary, Lok reverts to an anthropoid state. In a coda passage before the reversal of viewpoint in the last chapter, the first complete physical description of one of the people partly explains the others' destructive terror. The only human aspect remaining to Lok is the tears on his face as he lies down to die on Mal's grave.

In the final chapter, the others are named. Tuami, the younger leader, was known to the people, as was Tanakil. The old man is identified as Marlan; the most important woman, who suckles the New One, is Vivani. As Tuami steers the boat toward the open plains away from "the devils," he and all the others are overcome by grief and bitterness and Tuami cries out to ask what else they could have done. These people are now quite human and understandable, their actions against the Neanderthals having been dictated by the twin evils of fear and ignorance. But some grace has gone out of their lives forever; their slow-moving boat is a point of darkness between the light of sky and water.

This sad and serious novel graphically portrays the destructiveness of fear and the horror of ignorance which together destroyed innocence. But in spite of the irony in the bitter fact that the people and the others, could, together, have improved life, the book is not an allegorical plea. Like William Golding's other novels, it is a fable affirming man's will to survive.

AN INQUIRY CONCERNING POLITICAL JUSTICE

Type of work: Political theory

Author: William Godwin (1756-1836)

First published: 1793

In 1793, William Godwin, the first systematic exponent of anarchism, published his Inquiry Concerning Political Justice (its full title: An Inquiry Concerning the Principles of Political Justice, and its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness). This three-volume work gives evidence of being strongly influenced by the impulses of the French Revolution and argues that the rational being, man, must be given complete freedom to exercise his pure reason. All forms of government, being founded on irrational assumptions, are tyrannical and eventually must be eliminated. Because laws have not been produced by wisdom but by greed and fear, they should be replaced by the products of reasonable men's ability to make decisions. Accumulated property is a means of exploitation and, consequently, must be abolished. This last point was, however, modified in a later edition. With its varying degrees of indebtedness to Aristippus, Plato, Rousseau, and Helvétius, and despite its equivocating alterations in the final revision, Godwin's book gave evidence of original thinking and provided generations of revolutionary thinkers with both stimulation and guidance.

Godwin asserts that the general human objective is happiness, that politics, the promotion of individual good is man's most important pursuit, and that the two traditional articles of political liberty have been (1) "security of our persons" and (2) "security of our property." But, Godwin asks, would not a good government "take away all restraints upon the enquiring mind"? The early chapters of the book develop Godwin's view that all through history government has had a corrupting influence, but only because man has not lived up to his potential truthfulness, his ability to see what is evil and what is good. The assumption is that if man will define clearly to himself the genuinely good principles of life, government will improve.

Godwin surveys historically the destructiveness and futility of war, and to emphasize its irrational causes, he quotes at some length from the satire on war in Book II of Swift's Gulliver's Travels. In the present condition punishment is the only means of repressing the violent revolt of the deprived masses. But if government is a subject for discussion, then men might reasonably agree about it some day and see the advantages of freedom and equality.

From these premises Godwin proceeds to demonstrate that, of the three principal causes of moral improvement, both literature and education, though beneficial, have limitations, and that the third cause, political justice, is strong where the first two are weak; that is, in the extent of its operation. When political justice is equally addressed to all, it will impart virtue to all. Since error and injustice tend to destroy themselves, it is doubtful whether they could be perpetuated without governmental support, for government "reverses the genuine propensities of mind, and instead of suffering us to look forward, teaches us to look backward for perfection." To exemplify how political institutions have in the past militated against moral improvement, Godwin points out the destructive passions engendered by the inequality of property, the magnificence accorded to enormous wealth, and the insolence and usurpation of rich persons. Traditionally, both legislation and administration of the law have favored the rich and have repressed the freedom of the poor to stand up to the rich.

Godwin asserts strongly that man's most distinguished and most important characteristic is his perfectability, by which he means not the capacity to become perfect but, rather, the capability of perpetual improvement. Evidences of man's progressive nature are the development of language and the invention of alphabetical writing. Having asserted that all science and all art are capable of further perfection, Godwin asks why the same should not be true of morals and social institutions. On the usefulness of history in this regard, he comments: "Let us look back, that we may profit by the experience of mankind; but let us not look back as if the wisdom of our ancestors was such as to leave no room for future improvements."

The true instruments of moral influence, in Godwin's opinion, are not direct physical causes such as climate but, rather, such concepts as desire and aversion or punishment and reward. Definitely restrictive to moral progress are the institutions or professions which always operate to produce a certain character or stereotype and thus suppress frankness of mind. The example cited by Godwin is the priesthood, which requires that all priests must be alike in their subservience. And Godwin is certain that free men in any country will be "firm, vigorous and spirited in proportion to their freedom," as, conversely, slaves will be "ignorant, servile and unprincipled."

When the magic of the indoctrinated idea is dissolved and the great majority of any society seek true benefits, the struggle need not involve tumult or violence. Indeed, "the effort would be to resist reason, not to obey it." Just views must be infused into the liberally educated, but this process must come about gradually. Man's basic error in politics is the supposition that a change is impracticable, with the result that he does not look forward incessantly to its accomplishment. Men do not choose evil when they see it to be evil. Therefore, once having shaken off an injurious evil, a society will not permit its revival unless its conviction of truth becomes obliterated.

An Inquiry Concerning Political Justice develops a theme which is in close agreement with Thomas Paine's belief that society, being produced by our wants, is a blessing, but that government, necessitated by our wickedness, is at its best a necessary evil. Godwin defines the term justice as meaning that the individual should contribute everything in his power to the benefit of the whole, not the concept of all for the state but of each individual for the other individuals. The importance to the general weal must be the only standard, and a benefit conferred upon an individual to the detriment of the society is wrong. Even one's self-preservation must be based on the premise of one's good to the society—to all mankind. An important theme in this book is the propriety of applying more justice in order to ascertain political truth.

Society is bound to do for its members everything that can contribute to their welfare. In Godwin's view, that which most enlarges the mind—virtue and consciousness of independence—contributes most to this welfare. Individuals, for their part, must follow the best knowledge obtainable. Regarding the possibility that a wrong action may result even from the individual's best intention, Godwin says: "If the disposition by which a man is governed have a systematical tendency to the benefit of his species, he cannot fail to obtain our esteem, however mistaken he may be in his conduct." Virtue is essentially the incessant search for accurate knowledge about utility and right, in which search the exercise of private judgment and the dictates of individual conscience must be accorded primary importance. Since pleasure is to be desired and pain to be avoided, individuals should contribute to the pleasure and benefit of one another and should oppose the despot's power, which is based on indoctrination and is productive of pain.

Moral equality consists in "the propriety of applying one unalterable rule of justice to every case that may arise." Two persons cannot have opposite rights; men really have no rights. Since rights can apply only to totally indifferent things (where to sit and the like), and since intelligent man immediately becomes moral man with duties, rights and duties are absolutely exclusive of each other. Although society, composed of individuals, also has no rights, we must, under the present inadequate government, assert some "rights."

Because judgment is founded on evidence, compulsion cannot bring men to uniformity of opinion. Government needs to be perfected away from the concept of compulsion; the insignificant individual must be made free to criticize the august senate. Countries in which decrees instead of arguments are ultimate contain "mere phantoms of men," who give no indication of what men might be if they were entirely free to follow the dictates of conscience and to speak and act as they think. Finally, individual justice—equality and freedom—must be the basis and goal of improvement in government.

Having set forth the underlying principles of his theory, Godwin proceeds to criticize existing society, develop his system of social ethics, and predict conditions of the future. His confidence in the power of reason gives the book an optimism which has frequently been criticized as unresponsive to the lessons of history. While it is true that his emphasis on necessity (cause and effect viewed as an invariable sequence) is inconsistent with his simultaneous assertion of the efficacy of education, Godwin has been unfairly criticized for maintaining that enlightened education could rectify the falsity and the ignorance of man's judgments. Such a criticism cannot be fairly administered until after the society has made a concerted effort to educate itself as Godwin proposed.

INVISIBLE MAN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Ralph Ellison (1914-)

Time: The late 1930's

Locale: A small city and a Negro college in the South, and New York City

First published: 1952

Principal characters:

THE NAMELESS NARRATOR-HERO

DR. BLEDSOE, the college president

MR. NORTON, a trustee of the college

BROTHER JACK, the leader of the Brotherhood

RINEHART, a racketeer, lover, minister

RAS THE DESTROYER, the leader of the black nationalists

SIBYL, a married white woman

"Keep this colored boy running" is the theme of both Ellison's Invisible Man and William Faulkner's Light in August. That Faulkner, a Southern white, published his novel in 1932 while Ellison, a Southern Negro, published his in 1952 is a mark of the important but snail-pace progress from one generation to the next. Yet what distinguishes these novels is not the social protest but the profoundly imaginative use of a particular social injustice to dramatize the outrageous situation of all men. And it is here that we can differentiate the writer of the 1930's and the writer of the 1950's. "Keep this colored boy running" suggests a game which, however malicious, is still a game; both writers see life as a mad game, and both seize on the comic dimensions of situations filled with terror. The signal difference between Faulkner and Ellison is that while Faulkner's attitude toward this grotesque and absurd world is one of outrage, Ralph (Waldo) Ellison's is one of comic acceptance.

Invisible Man is narrated by a nameless Negro living in a coal cellar lighted by 1,369 bulbs. The narrator's background is established in two childhood episodes. First is his brutal initiation into the club world of the Southern white man. Having graduated from high school as valedictorian, he is invited to a gathering of the town's leading citizens to receive a scholarship; but before the award he is mixed into a group of Negro toughs and compelled by the drunken, jeering whites to gaze at a naked blonde, fight a blindfold "battle royal," and grab for coins on an electrified rug. The second episode is a comic introduction to a mad-house world. The boy, now studying at a Negro college, is asked to guide a white trustee through the campus and the neighboring countryside, and they end up at the Golden Day. This is the local roadhouse, where each Saturday a group of disabled Negro veterans are taken for a day of whisky and women. Here the boy and the trustee witness a chaotic orgy, a slapstick but savage rebellion of the inmates against their giant attendant, Supercargo; and they listen to the perceptive ravings of a mad Negro doctor.

The scene at the white man's club ends with the young hero, limp and swollen, enthusiastically delivering again his graduation speech on the social responsibility of the Negro. At the Golden Day, the mad doctor shrewdly observes that the young hero, so dedicated to becoming a leader of his people, has already learned to suppress not only his feelings but his humanity, that he is an invisible, walking personification of negative man. In both scenes Ellison shows great control in moving from an attitude of profound sympathy with his protagonist to one of ridicule, and we see a human victim suddenly turned puppet.

But Ellison does more than satirize the blind self-righteousness of an adolescent. In the white man's club he shows how the boy is forced into the role of the lusty, greedy, violent Negro stereotype; how he is compelled to become a puppet by the white gods who manipulate him; how he is denied his identity—his visibility—by the social forces of the American South. In the Golden Day, which is a transmutation of the white man's club, where the chaos is intensified and expanded, we see that the boy is made a "mechanical man" not just by his blind self-righteousness nor by the white man's injustice, but by an anonymous and generalized authority which the mad doctor sums up in the third person plural pronoun. Now we see that the whole world is governed by wanton powers that make both the Negro and the white man ludicrous puppets. We are now prepared for the novel's conclusion that all men are invisible.

The movement from the white man's club to the Golden Day forms the dominant rhythm of the novel; it is the movement from the local to the universal, from the rational to the grotesque. The hero, expelled from college, leaves his idyllic campus, the comparatively logical South, the relatively simple life of an adolescent for the chaotic adult world, echoing the phrases of Candide as he left the Westphalian castle of his childhood.

But unlike Voltaire, Ellison jettisons his logical style. In an interview printed in The Paris Review, Ellison explains how he devised three shifts in style to lead the reader of Invisible Man from a world that is intolerable but credible and explainable to one that is totally bewildering. In the South, where the hero tries to fit into an unjust but traditional pattern, the style is naturalistic. In New York, where the hero loses his sense of certainty, the style becomes expressionistic. And when the hero falls from grace in the Brotherhood, his last rational grip on reality, the style turns surrealist. Since the style follows the development of the narrator-hero, it reflects a changing attitude that will finally accommodate and affirm the chaos he encounters.

The Northern city is to the rural South as the Golden Day is to the white man's club. In New York the hero assumes a series of roles: a young man seeking employment, a semi-skilled laborer, the Harlem leader of the Brotherhood, a speaker on women's rights. Blind to the potential of freedom, he is manipulated by an anti-union fanatic, a psychiatrist, a higher official in the Brotherhood, a black nationalist—successive embodiments of the mad doctor's third-person-plural pronoun. The order of events in New York is senseless; it will become meaningful when the hero, like Camus' "stranger," accepts the senseless order as the absurd logic of his life. He is blindly mistaken when he joins the Brotherhood in the belief that history is rational and that human identity and brotherhood can be achieved by a conscious subordination to its logic. But even in his mistake he has advanced beyond the stage where identity equals Negro and where history is limited to the record of his race. And this stage is necessary before he can renounce identity and history altogether, renounce naturalism, determinism, reason, and accept the condition of man as invisible and free.

Before he can accept the outrageous logic of his life he must gain an objective perspective and see the world as ridiculous, as a mad dream filled with grotesque puppets and clowns. The hero begins to see with new clarity when he is made to wonder what the world and life would be like if history were a gambler, if man were not a creature capable of reason but a madman. He becomes a clown in the madman's game when, in order to escape Ras the Destroyer, the black nationalist, he buys the wide hat and green glasses of the zoot-suiter. Mistaken in his new guise for Rinehart, the chameleon-like racketeer, lover, minister, the hero marvels at the man who can assume such varied roles. When he looks at the world through his green glasses and sees the dark merging of shapes, he realizes that this is the way Rinehart must see life, full of possibilities and boundless. And he sees that freedom is not recognition of necessity alone but recognition of possibility as well. Now we come to understand that Ellison's world is chaotic and threatening, but because there is no order there are infinite possibilities for improvising. Seen through the green glasses the absurd world becomes comic and therefore capable of affirmation.

Rinehart exploits the possibilities of the world but also contributes to its destructiveness, and the hero's final step toward independence will be the rejection of Rinehart. This is accomplished in the most purely comic scene in the novel, where he assumes the role of a Rinehart to gain as mistress a spy into the Brotherhood hierarchy. Here he gets his white girl (the promise of his ritual in the white man's club), a married woman who wants only to be raped by a Negro. However, when duty calls him back to Harlem his first thought is to get Sibyl home safely; he instinctively rejects his Rinehart role.

The scene with Sibyl is full of mistaken identity and pantomime, as the hero tries to evade her fanatic desires; a comic version of the scene in the white man's club, its lines recalling the "battle royal," it leads to a more bitter and hilarious version of the Golden Day. The Harlem riot is a re-enactment of the mad veterans' attack on Supercargo, but the figures instead of being madmen are grotesque fantasies in a dream circus. In the description of the looting we see one old woman struggling bowlegged beneath half a cow, and we hear another demand that her husband get only Wilson's bacon. Figures pass in stolen wigs and dress coats, and carry dummy rifles. A huge woman atop a milk cart ladles free beer. A man wearing three hats and several pairs of suspenders leads a group to burn down their rat-infested tenement, ignoring the pleas of a woman about to give birth. Blond mannikins hang from lampposts. Ras the Destroyer, dressed as an Abyssinian chieftain and riding a black charger that had been used the day before to pull a vegetable cart, throws spears at the police.

The hero, running for his life, falls into a coal cellar. In the dark he can recognize that the nightmare circus is reality, and that the joke of the human condition is man's invisibility: the unique self cannot be seen. Now he can renounce all signs of his factitious identities, laughingly accept his ridiculous situation, and prepare to return to the world of light.

There are two insoluble problems in this unusual novel: first, how to develop a hero who until the very end lacks a personality; second, how to make the final affirmation convincing and concrete. If Ellison's hero is shallow, the voice of his narrator is fully developed. If Ellison, as Irving Howe complains, cannot specify the possibilities his hero would find in the world above ground, the narrator does discover and explore a rich range of possibilities in recounting the story of his life from the viewpoint of his final realization. In describing a world where the Negro is kept running, Ellison avoids the narrow view of the protest novel. In describing a world that has long been termed absurd by the Existentialists and to which Faulkner, a more brilliant comic artist, could only respond with outrage, Ellison establishes a new posture. For in a world where both the blind and the rebellious are turned to puppets, one way to maintain independence—identity—is to play the puppet, that is to choose the role of clown. Earl Rovit compares the form of the novel to the improvisation of a jazz musician. It is also like the improvisation of Harlequin, who could always turn the tables on Authority and who could survive his beatings with a wry smile.

IRISH MELODIES

Type of work: Poetry

Author: Thomas Moore (1779-1852)

First published: 1807-1834; 1835

Few men of letters have been able to write on Thomas Moore without disparaging the financial and social success of his life or the great mass of his work, mostly verse, from which so little of any worth is still remembered except the Irish Melodies. The quantity of his work and the ready charm which contributed to his success in London society are largely attributable to the fact that Moore, like many another aspirant from the provinces, had to get on as best he could. Starvation in a garret may be the mark of genius but only posterity can decide between the respective merits of Chatterton and Blake. Moore took no chances; he stuck by the Whigs and forswore his early Republicanism and modulated his Irishness into its most acceptable form in the London drawing room, the real source of political power and hence patronage in Regency England. He sang Irish songs and at the same time gained practically the only claim he has on our memory and affections. The rest of his work fills up that yawning gulf of trivia which kept the publishers of London prosperous, their readers contented, the popular authors wealthy, and the best of contemporary English writers—Shelley, Keats, Blake—out of sight.

Yet Moore was in his way a pioneer. He always claimed to have originated modern Irish poetry, enjoying a personal application of the song which takes its title from the opening words:

Dear Harp of my Country! in darkness
I found thee,
The cold chain of silence hung o'er thee long,
When proudly, my own Island Harp! I unbound thee,
And gave all thy chords to light, freedom and song!

In the rest of the lyric Moore sums up his subjects—death, love, mirth, and patriotism—and specifies his technique: "wild sweetness." The revolutionary effect of this combination in London when he began the composition of Irish Melodies in 1806 (seven years after his arrival there from Dublin) was more noticeable because of the stolidity of the serious verse of the time and popular light verse, to both of which Moore had contributed enough to acquire a lucrative government post in the Bermudas. He left London in 1803 to take up the post, but soon returned and set to work on his Irish Melodies, exile from London having apparently sharpened his love for Ireland. The new style of drawing room entertainment Moore often provided in person (he was an accomplished musician) was soon earning him five hundred pounds a year. The lyric was restored to popularity in English literature not by the Lyrical Ballads or by Burns or by Blake, all of whom came before Moore, but by the Irish Melodies.

Moore had given a sample of his ability to write lyrics to folk tunes in the feebly satirical Poems Relating to America, published in 1806: the "Canadian Boat Song" which he heard his "voyageurs" sing as they rowed all the way down the St. Lawrence from Kingston to Montreal. The poems were published in ten parts from 1807 to 1834, words and music, with editions of the words alone appearing from 1820 on. Time has established the concert repertoire selected from the songs: "The Harp That Once Thro' Tara's Halls," "Believe Me if All Those Endearing Young Charms," "She Is Far from the Land," "'Tis the Last Rose of Summer," "The Minstrel Boy," "Sweet Inishfallen, Fare Thee Well," to which may be added the "Canadian Boat Song" and two later songs, the "Vesper Hymn" and "Oft in the Stilly Night" from National Airs, lyrics and arrangements of folk songs from most European countries.

Generally only one of the lyrics is now anthologized as a poem apart from its setting: "The Time I've Lost in Wooing." It shows Moore's abilities to advantage: the rhymes are feminine in the longer lines and in triples (wooing . . . pursuing . . . undoing); the shorter lines (none is long) end in masculine rhyme; the alternations give a pleasing variation to the run of the poem; the poem in three stanzas reaches a witty conclusion that echoes the Caroline poets. In the conflict between Wisdom and Beauty the poet's time has been wasted in pursuit of the latter; he knows this but still cannot cease his pursuit:

Poor Wisdom's chance
Against a glance
Is now as weak as ever.

Of the language of the lyrics Edmund Gosse observed that "words of a commonplace character are so strung together as to form poetry easily grasped and enjoyed by the ear." The secret of Moore's original and present popularity lies in providing acceptable poetry for the ear, not for the eye, and since we have largely lost that gift so enjoyed by Elizabethans it is little wonder that our ears have to be assisted by folk tunes.

In the collected editions of Moore's works the Irish Melodies now number one hundred and twenty-five, beginning with "Go Where Glory Waits Thee" and ending with "Silence Is in Our Festal Halls," Moore's elegy for Sir John Stevenson, who wrote the arrangements for the parts. Most of the parts as they were issued contained dedications to patrons from Moore and advertisements from his publisher, Power, to the general public insisting that there were plenty more "airs" in the treasury of Irish folk song for future parts. A certain amount of national feeling is evident in both advertisements and dedications, especially in that to the first part which includes a letter from Moore referring to the Irish reputation for song as "the only talent for which our English neighbors ever deigned to allow us any credit." A more important preface is that to the third part or number. As well as dealing with the age of Irish songs, their resemblance to Scottish song, and the harmonic peculiarities of Irish music, Moore refers to three aspects which in their way sum up much of the Melodies: their national feeling; their peculiar mixture of defiance and despondency; and their being lyrics to songs, not poems as such.

On the last point he begs exemption from "the rigors of literary criticism" because he can "answer for their sound with somewhat more confidence than for their sense." This statement is admirably sensible but makes it difficult to discuss the Irish Melodies as if they were poems. If Moore's guiding principle was to make them singable, only a singer can argue the point and many a trite phrase and conventional rhyme can be excused on this ground. Moore's other two remarks point to two obvious features in the lyrics. They often begin strongly and fade into resignation at parting, death, the passage of time, the decay of good customs. Where the poems reach a strong conclusion they do so by denying the resigned close, generally by appeal to the Divine or to Ireland. The endings to two patriotic poems illustrate the difference: "Let Erin Remember the Days of Old" declines into

Thus, sighing, look through the waves of time
For the long-faded glories they cover.

On the other hand "Sublime Was the Warning" challenges Irish national aspirations by appealing to the success of Spanish independence after the Napoleonic wars and concludes:

The young spirit of Freedom shall shelter their grave
Beneath shamrocks of Erin and olives of Spain.

The Irish quality of the poems is most apparent in their subjects. Some are taken from Irish history; others contain references to Irish legends and customs; but the one thread that runs through the volume is "Erin." Much of the reference to Ireland is a prophecy of longed-for independence; a purely poetic exercise Moore's contemporaries in London must have thought it, but history has realized Moore's longing, and it would be an interesting point to settle how much his songs had to do with maintaining Irish nationalism during the struggles of the nineteenth century—songs like "Where Is the Slave?" "Erin, Oh Erin," "Oh the Shamrock," and the better-known "Minstrel Boy" and "The Harp That Once Thro' Tara's Halls." The most curious of these is "As Vanquished Erin," which describes how the Fiend of Discord persists in sending "his shafts of desolation . . .

through all her maddening nation." When Erin asks the "Powers of Good" when this will end, the Demon answers, "Never." This is possibly the truest statement Moore made about Ireland.

The phrase that sums up the quality of the lyrics in the Irish Melodies is Moore's "wild sweetness," an unusual and romantic combination of opposites, its Irishness, one may say. But the "sweetness" of the verses is obtained by both technical dexterity (Moore maintains, as he must, the rhythm of the melody in a variety of meters) and a neatness of phrasing that might be called Irish wit were it not that, except in a few light pieces of which "The Time I've Lost in Wooing" is the best, this gift is usually spent on general topics and does not show to advantage:

Love, nursed among pleasures, is faithless as they,
But the love born of Sorrow, like Sorrow, is true.

Much of the "wild" note comes from the subjects of war, chains, heroic death, but also from the ecstasy of the love poems, tinged as they generally are with sadness. Oddly enough it is probably the romantic combination Moore achieved which was responsible for the gradual disfavor into which the Irish Melodies fell about the turn of the century, though they are still referred to in Joyce and O'Casey. When the Gaelic Revival and the independence of Eire finally arrived, a more genuine folk song with real Irish lyrics seems to have lessened Moore's popularity and reduced it to the proportions of the man himself, whom Scott once called "a little, very little man."

JEFFERSON AND HAMILTON: THE STRUGGLE FOR DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA

Type of work: Political history

Author: Claude G. Bowers (1878-1958)

Time: End of the Eighteenth century

Locale: New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Paris, and London

First published: 1925

Principal personages:

GEORGE WASHINGTON

THOMAS JEFFERSON

ALEXANDER HAMILTON

GOVERNEUR MORRIS

JAMES MADISON

ALBERT GALLATIN, a Jeffersonian from Pennsylvania

AARON BURR

MRS. WILLIAM BINGHAM, a social leader of Philadelphia

JOHN JAY, United States Minister to Great Britain

THOMAS PINCKNEY, United States Minister to Great Britain

CHARLES C. PINCKNEY, Jefferson's opponent for the presidency

JOHN ADAMS, a statesman from Massachusetts

The dramatic and picturesque aspects of the birth of the United States are presented in Claude G. Bowers' book about the political struggle of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. The surrender at Yorktown ended one phase of the Revolution, only to begin another, a battle of fundamentals of government. Should the new republic develop along aristocratic or democratic lines? Leaders in the conflict were Thomas Jefferson, who believed in the political sense of the common people, and Alexander Hamilton, who did not trust an illiterate people to develop government.

Professor Bowers shows how much more logical Hamilton's distrust was than Jefferson's faith in the common man. Yet because Jefferson was willing to try to organize and discipline not only the independent and individualistic towns but the remote farms and the vast open spaces of the West into a unity, he was able, in spite of the weaknesses and lack of ability of his helpers, to achieve success against a powerful opposition. Hamilton, despite his genius and the unquestioned ability of many in the Federalist Party, failed because he did not understand his countrymen and the spirit of the times.

Though Jefferson's name heads the title, Bowers begins his study with a look at Alexander Hamilton after setting the stage in the capital of New York City, on September 12, 1789, as the Congress was about to meet. As he points out, Hamilton looked the born leader. Though he was not of commanding stature, he impressed men by the dignity of his bearing. But Hamilton had other qualities: an ability to write clearly and to assemble and present facts to convince an audience and not merely appeal to their emotions. Strangely, Hamilton was most certain of his genius as a military leader, though never given an opportunity to demonstrate it. He was honest and generally a man of integrity, with a capacity for long stretches of concentrated work.

Bowers also points out his flaws. Perhaps his success, despite his humble origin, and the praise given his brilliant youthful efforts had convinced him that he was superior to most people. Therefore he was unable to inspire enthusiastic co-operation. He showed himself opinionated and dictatorial, and his early insults to Jefferson in Cabinet meetings grew out of his feeling that he was really Washington's Prime Minister. Jefferson disliked him as a man, in addition to distrusting his political beliefs.

The first step in the Jefferson contest with Hamilton was taken when James Madison tried in Congress in April, 1790, to force discrimination between the Revolutionary soldiers holding warrants given in payment of wages, and the speculators who had been buying them at a small portion of their value. After the House voted down his motion, it was learned that nearly half of those opposing had been acquiring warrants, confident that they would be redeemed at full value.

This was a set-back for the Jeffersonians, but the public discussion that followed helped defeat by a few votes Hamilton's next proposal that the government assume the debts of the states. Great was the consternation of speculators who had counted on passage of the proposal.

On March 24, 1790, Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State for the United States, had arrived in New York. He was willing to agree to a reconsideration of the Assumption Bill, in return for moving the capital out of New York. But following its transfer to Philadelphia, he rarely agreed again with Hamilton. They clashed over Hamilton's plan to use an excise tax on liquor as means of raising money to pay off the states' debts. But when the Federal machine pushed the bill through, Jefferson, having reached the end of his patience, prepared to challenge the policies and powers of his political opponent.

So far there had been no clash over their basic conflict. That came when Jefferson sent to a Philadelphia printer a copy of Thomas Paine's The Rights of Man, with a covering note expressing his delight at this reply to the political heresies of the time. The printer used Jefferson's letter, under his signature as Secretary of State, for the preface to the work. Many Americans, to whom democracy was anathema and republicanism was viewed with cynicism, were enraged that a pamphlet suppressed in England should be reprinted in the United States; but the discussion aroused served Jefferson's purpose and was actually the opening move in the ten-year war between Jefferson and Hamilton.

The Federalists were well organized. The various Chambers of Commerce were like Federalist clubs; the intellectuals mostly championed Hamilton; and the press was generally either for him or indifferent. However, Jefferson believed he could count on the farmers, the ex-soldiers cheated of their war pay, those exasperated by the excise tax, and liberals antagonistic to the aristocratic pose of those governing them.

Earlier, Jefferson had declared that he would rather have a newspaper without a government than a government without a newspaper. Now he set out to find a journal equivalent to the Gazette of the United States, edited by John Fenno to extol the Federalist doctrine. For him Madison turned up Philip Freneau, the "poet of the Revolution," who founded The National Gazette in Philadelphia. Soon its bold satire had everybody talking.

Angry, Hamilton made anonymous attacks on Freneau, and the struggle became so violent that President Washington tried to bring peace, but the approaching political campaign, which eventually made Adams president, provided more ammunition for the battles between the Federalists and the Jeffersonians.

The outbreak of the French Revolution helped Jefferson, for his was the popular side. Hamilton's followers, on the other hand, sympathized with the French aristocracy. The beheading of the French monarchs swung the scales. The Federalist war party was able to pass the Alien and Sedition Acts giving the President power to expel dangerous aliens and to punish citizens who defamed the government. Jefferson then won a victory over the Federalists by easing tensions caused by the XYZ Papers. But the final confrontation came on the eve of the election of 1800, in the new capital of Washington.

Most Federalists were scheming to elect Aaron Burr instead of Jefferson. Hamilton was too great a patriot, despite his personal feelings about his rival, to favor Burr, and so he helped make possible the outcome of ten days of balloting, the election of Jefferson to the presidency of the United States.

After that, Hamilton went into isolation. The brilliant party he had created had fallen, as he himself would fall four years later before Burr's pistol. Ex-president Adams, for whom Bowers displays a lukewarm admiration, returned to Massachusetts. But as Jefferson took his oath of office, there was on the political scene evidence of the right of the common people to create their own government and make their own laws.

JOHN DRYDEN: THE POET, THE DRAMATIST, THE CRITIC

Type of work: Critical essay

Author: T. S. Eliot (1888-1965)

First published: 1932

There is always interest in hearing what one great poet has had to say about an important predecessor, or what one dramatist has had to say about another, or what one influential critic thinks of an earlier critic. When T. S. Eliot wrote about John Dryden he spoke with peculiar and noteworthy authority: he was one famous poet-playwright-critic assessing another famous poet-playwright-critic.

There are many parallels between the careers and reputations of Eliot and Dryden. Both are better known for their poetry than for their plays, and both, perhaps, are as well known for their criticism (or will be, as the long-range influence of Eliot becomes clear) as they are for their poetry. Each man discarded the poetic conventions of a previous age, set the tone for an age to come, and dominated the age in which he lived. (Dryden was the great man of English letters during the last quarter of the seventeenth century; Eliot was his counterpart during the second quarter of this century.) And just as Eliot considers Dryden to be even more important for his influence than for his actual work, so too the generation after Eliot is beginning to focus more and more attention on his historical significance—his influence.

This volume consists of three separate but interrelated essays on the poetry, the plays, and the criticism of Dryden. In the first essay, the main point Eliot makes is that Dryden reformed the language by devising a naturally flowing, speaking form of speech in verse instead of an artificial and dead form. It is a misconception to think of his style as artificial. It is likewise a mistake to make too much of Dryden's debt to his predecessors, for the style was due more to his rebellion against the artificial sounds of the old verse, than to an imitation of it.

In the previous age Donne had also been a reactionary by updating the language, doing away with the conventions of the regular lyric verse of the Elizabethans, and introducing into lyric poetry a conversational flow of normal speech. But by Dryden's time the vitality of Donne's reaction had dissipated and the normal had become false. So it was left to Dryden to restore English verse to normal speech. Dryden's reformation of language, moreover, has been lasting.

Eliot is not primarily concerned in this essay with particular poems of Dryden. Of Dryden's translations he felt only that they aided in forming our present-day language almost as much as did his original poems. Eliot merely mentions the great satires, MacFlecknoe and Absalom and Achitophel. He lingers briefly over The Hind and the Panther and Religio Laici, the two poems that kept reason even in verse, observing that in the former, which Eliot considers the greater of the two, political-religious thought is uplifted into poetry for the first and last time. Eliot's only comment on Dryden's lyrics is that, in such poems as "Song for St. Cecilia's Day" and "Alexander's Feast," he perfected the form that was not handled as well by Cowley but which he bequeathed to Gray, Collins, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Tennyson, who used it with skill. Otherwise, we would not have the Ode: Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood.

Although he certainly does not depreciate the poetry, Eliot considers Dryden more important for his influence, particularly on the language, than for his poetry itself. He feels that the reason why Dryden's poetry did influence other poets was the fact that he was not so great as to be unable to influence them. Shakespeare and Milton were greater poets, but because they were greater they were less imitable; they had mimics but not followers. Dryden did not overshadow all followers by being too great; therefore he could influence others. Dryden's influence, in Eliot's view, has been enormous: Dryden felt that the English were without proper speech and so he gave it to them. For this reason no one has dominated English literature for as long or as completely as Dryden.

The least important of the three essays in this volume is that which deals with Dryden as a dramatist, and this is probably a reflection of the fact that Dryden achieved greater success in poetry and criticism than he did in drama. Eliot's main interests in this chapter are, as in the first chapter, Dryden's language and his influence. Eliot wastes little time in dismissing Dryden's comedies. Instead, he gives most of his attention to Dryden's heroic dramas, discussing in turn the plays in blank verse and those in rhymed couplets.

Eliot acknowledges Dryden's skill in blank verse, particularly in All for Love, observing that he escaped the sour influence of the final followers of Shakespeare, with their methods of overusing everything to the point of destruction. Dryden accomplished the wonder of re-awakening. Eliot hazards the debatable opinion that blank verse dramatists have written better works when they wrote more in the style of Dryden than in the manner of Shakespeare. And yet, he says, there is not a verse in All for Love which carries the conversational tone of any of Dryden's best satires. This effect is accounted for by the fact that blank verse was not easy for him.

The rhymed couplet, on the other hand, is perfectly suited to Dryden's abilities, says Eliot; what Dryden could not do with the couplet simply could not be done, and his couplet is living speech. The main reason is that Dryden knew the limits of the rhymed couplet in creating dramatic effects. If Dryden's use of blank verse was an improvement over that of Shakespeare's imitators, his use of couplets was even more of an improvement, for his firm masculine couplet was better than the feathery Jacobean verse of Fletcher.

The main point Eliot wishes to make in the middle essay is this: although Dryden was not a dramatist in the natural sense, for drama was not a form of literature to which his talents were best suited, and although his plays themselves have but a limited degree of interest, his influence on the history of drama was considerable. This influence was largely negative: he killed off the worn-out Jacobean tradition, substituting for it his own form of heroic play, which was representative of the period.

Dryden's prose writings, says Eliot, are noticeably important in two ways: in the historical development of the style of English prose and in the background of English criticism. The influence of Dryden's prose style on the development of the English language was not, however, "dominant" because his prose influenced prose less than his verse probably did. Nonetheless his prose style is admirable: elegant, urbane, and finely polished. Dryden did not waver in his writing abilities; he kept a wit which overshadowed that of his contemporaries.

But what is chiefly important about Dryden's literary criticism is not the style but the fact that it is the first conscious criticism by an English poet in English on a large scale. English criticism had Dryden as its first master.

Eliot does take exception to some of Dryden's critical pronouncements, referring, for example, to his misunderstanding of the Aristotelian theory of the unities of time and place as absurd. But he explains that here, and in his strictures upon Shakespeare, Dryden's rigid appeals to authority are the outcome of a sense of form and order in conflict with the disorder of the Elizabethan stage. These, in other words, are limitations imposed upon Dryden by the age in which he lived. What is truly praiseworthy about Dryden is that in him we find an almost perfect balance between creative poet and critic.

In contrast with other great poet-critics, Dryden is what Eliot calls "the normal critic." Coleridge could not hold himself to plain criticism but ran into discourses on philosophy and aesthetics.

Wordsworth was engaged in preserving his own practices, and Matthew Arnold was too busy searching for the moral lesson. Dryden's great merit as an influence in criticism is the fact that he stayed within the bounds of critical poetry. Dryden was a "normal critic" in that his only bias is in favor of common sense. In other words, his theories were all aimed at what the poet could intelligently attempt. And, concludes Eliot, Dryden stands, both as poet and critic, for he practiced in his poetry what he preached in his criticism as the great champion of sanity at a time when English poetry and criticism alike were greatly in need of sanity.

JOURNAL OF A TOUR TO THE HEBRIDES

Type of work: Diary

Author: James Boswell (1740-1795)

First published: 1785

Principal personages:

JAMES BOSWELL, the author, a young Scottish lawyer

SAMUEL JOHNSON, his aging friend, the great essayist, biographer, poet, and critic

LORD AUCHINLECK, Boswell's father, a noted Scottish judge

In August, 1773, James Boswell finally succeeded in persuading his distinguished friend Samuel Johnson to accompany him on a tour of his native Scotland, a country for which the learned Dr. Johnson's scorn was legendary. Boswell kept a detailed journal for most of their journey together, and he published it, in a version edited and revised with the help of the Shakespearian scholar, Edmund Malone, in 1785, as a companion volume to Johnson's own account, the Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, that had appeared in 1775. Boswell's original journal was discovered with many of his other private papers in this century, and the modern reader has the opportunity to peruse a considerably franker account than the one that was first issued to the public.

The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides is at once a fascinating travelogue, an unusually full record of life in the Scottish highlands and on the remote islands of the Hebrides, a character sketch of Johnson, and, like Boswell's other diaries, a mirror of his personal idiosyncracies. Boswell seems especially anxious to show the respect and deference with which his friend was greeted by his countrymen; he wanted to prove to Johnson and to the world that the Scots were indeed capable of being scholars and gentlemen, closely in touch with the world of learning, and, being himself, he naturally felt pride in having the privilege of introducing so great a figure to the professors and noblemen of his homeland.

Perhaps the greatest appeal of Boswell's account lies in the absolute naturalness of both style and content. Discussion of the quality of the food and the beds at every inn along the way is interspersed with Johnson's comments on whatever volumes of prayers, sermons, or poems he was able to procure and with accounts of long conversations between the scholar and many of his hosts on religion, philosophy, politics, and literature. As the trip went on, Boswell tended to fall farther and farther behind in his account, and throughout the journal he casually tossed in collections of Johnsoniana after having forgotten the specific occasions of many of the doctor's comments. He chose, too, to stop his narrative at intervals to give geographical and historical details.

Boswell is brutally frank, in his unpublished account, about the character of some of their hosts. He is relatively sympathetic when treating the weakness of Donald MacLeod, a young kinsman of the chief of the MacLeod clan of Dunvegan, on the isle of Skye, who took their money to town to have it changed and squandered a portion of it on his own refreshment, much to his later chagrin and shame. The arrogance and lack of hospitality of Sir Alexander Macdonald, whose manners seemed to Boswell entirely out of keeping with his station in life, are treated much more harshly. Boswell gives a particularly amusing account of their visit to the Duke and Duchess of Argyll at Inverary. The duchess refused so much as to acknowledge his presence, because he had opposed her in a celebrated law suit, but both she and her husband welcomed Johnson cordially.

Johnson appears throughout the journal as a man remarkably willing to adapt to circumstances, however uncomfortable they might be; it was Boswell, many years his junior, who was most disturbed by the lack of clean bedding and almost overcome by fright when they ran into a storm as they traveled from one island to another in a small boat. Dr. Johnson teased the young daughters of his hosts, flattered and complimented the elderly ladies, and, for the most part, restrained himself from severely attacking those with whose views he differed violently, especially on such questions as the once burning issue of the authenticity of James MacPherson's Ossian poems, published, Johnson thought fraudulently, as translations from the Gaelic.

One of the most delightful episodes in the journal is Boswell's description of Johnson's meeting with his father, Lord Auchinleck, a staunch Whig and Presbyterian. Johnson was an equally dogmatic Tory, whose sympathies with the Jacobite cause led him to inquire with great interest about the activities of "Bonny Prince Charlie" when he escaped to Skye after the disastrous battle of Culloden; he was so loyal a member of the Church of England that he read his own prayers throughout most of his trip rather than participate in Presbyterian services. Boswell cautioned Johnson to avoid the controversial topics of politics and religion whenever possible, and the encounter of the two men the young lawyer revered most was, for a time, smooth. But the "collision," as Boswell calls it, finally came. A medal with Oliver Cromwell's portrait on it was the cause, introducing the subject of Charles I and the Tories, with the inevitable results. Boswell discreetly withholds the details of the argument, but he does mention that afterwards his father dubbed Johnson "Ursa Major," the great bear. In spite of their altercation, however, the two aging gentlemen apparently parted on terms of mutual respect, if not of friendship, and Boswell appears well-satisfied at having brought them together.

Boswell's portrait of himself in this account is less revealing than that in the London Journal; age had apparently curtailed some of his frankness and unself-consciousness, but even here, in the original diary, though not in the published version, he describes in some detail his spiritual experiences in several of the old ruins he visited, and he records with chagrin how quickly his resolutions for increased temperance and self-control were overcome by the offer of a fresh bowl of punch. His concern for his wife, whom he had left at home in Edinburgh, runs throughout his pages, and he had what proved to be false premonitions of disasters befalling her and their children. His uxoriousness did not, however, curtail his critical judgments of the various young ladies he and Johnson met on their travels.

Among the most interesting sections of the book for the modern reader are those that describe in detail the daily life of the heads of the various clans that inhabited the western islands. The civilized manners of the MacLeods of Raasay had made their daughters welcome at fashionable gatherings in Edinburgh and London, yet the lords and their young heirs were acquainted with the most menial tasks involved with the running of their estates. The wide reading of many of the Highlanders, especially of the clergymen, and the education of the young people also surprised the travelers, and Johnson on one occasion presented an arithmetic book to a bright young girl with whose family he had lodged. However, the primitiveness of many of the tenants of the great landholders is presented in sharp contrast to the sophistication of their masters.

The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, like Boswell's other biographical and autobiographical writings has had and will continue to have great appeal for readers, primarily for the spirit of life that infuses every page. Servants, obscure clergymen, elderly Scotswomen, and youthful lords come to life vividly as do Boswell and Johnson themselves, and the naturalness of Boswell's style makes his work contemporary and fascinating throughout.

A JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR

Author: Daniel Defoe (1660?-1731)

Time: 1665

Locale: London, England

First published: 1722

Principal character:

H. F., the narrator, a London saddler

Unlike Defoe's more obviously fictional books and novels, A Journal of the Plague Year is rarely read as a whole, though a number of writers, such as Virginia Woolf, testify to its impact. On the other hand, it is more likely than the novels to be anthologized in college compendia of English literature, where its presence is justified not as background material (like Pepys) but either as especially fitted for extraction by its episodic construction or as historically significant. Both grounds are valid and together indicate the nature and worth of the whole work. The book shows on every page more clearly than Moll Flanders or the other episodic novels posing as "true accounts," the intricate and slow development of the English novel which attracted writers away from sermons and polemics in the early eighteenth century and established a formal tradition good for some two centuries. Thus when John Drinkwater called Defoe "the founder of the English novel," his justification may be found as much in the Journal as in Robinson Crusoe or Roxana.

The first problem in the development of the novel was to establish a working relationship between fact and fiction; the traditional novel still begins with a factual introduction to assist the "willing suspension of disbelief" so necessary to the novelist's manipulation of material and reader. Defoe's invention was to use a hard core of statistics, tabulated on the pages of the Journal, of the weekly death "bills" or returns from the ninety-seven parishes in the City of London and the sixteen or so in Southwark and outside the city limits; but the tables are disposed artistically throughout the work instead of being appended and are surrounded by further particulars which become more hedged with conditions as Defoe elaborates them. In a very short time the reader is in a region of rumor which Defoe first solemnly reports, then rationally dismisses or qualifies. Rumor is the middle ground between statistics and the imagination, and Defoe is careful to allow us to believe it or not as we wish. We accept such folklore at face value, perhaps, because gossip is more entertaining than truth. Thus the first sentence of the Journal does not begin "Once upon a time," but specifies September, 1664, as the date the narrator first heard that the plague had come to Holland for the second year running. The first paragraph then expands with rumors about its place of origin: "they say . . . some said . . . others . . . all agreed."

The subtitle of the Journal—"Being Observations or Memorials of the Most Remarkable Occurrences, as well Publick as Private, which happened in London during the last Great Visitation in 1665. Written by a Citizen who continued all the while in London. Never made publick before"—is a bland lie which indicates the second way Defoe encouraged the reader's imagination to work for him: "Observations or Memorials" sufficiently confuses the distinction between what was recorded at the time and what was remembered later. Defoe's sources, beyond the death bills, were not extensive and his memories second-hand, but his imagination was fertile. He carefully controlled and encouraged it by the threefold organization of his Journal. Contrary to its title it is not a daily record, and the time references shift from September to August and over the whole summer of the plague. Instead of daily entries Defoe used time references, from September 1664 to December 1665, as ways of beginning and conclusion of his narrative, ending with the doggerel quatrain which celebrates the narrator's deliverance. Within the work he preserves a gradual movement of the plague from the west to the east parts of the city, ending with a central holocaust; and scattered throughout the work we find his tables of statistics. Neither the geographical, the chronological, nor the numerical progress of the plague is consistently followed. The jumps in geography and time make one want to restore logical order to the work and thereby turn it into a literal "journal," at the same time risking loss of its imaginative qualities.

Defoe's imagination proceeds mechanically but energetically by considering one general topic and its subheadings at a time. Thus we get several pages of increasingly horrific detail about the practices of nurses or a catalogue of various kinds of quacks, fortunetellers, prophets, and necromancers who flourished during that awful summer; the section on women in childbirth, for instance coolly divides their tragedies into those who died in childbirth with and without the plague, and the former are further subdivided into those who died before giving birth, or in the middle of giving birth, or before the cord was cut. Defoe's narrator could see little of these matters for himself, but "they say" and "I heard" fill up the paragraphs one after another until all possible contingencies have been covered.

Defoe's imagination works with three classes of corroborative detail: the quick summary, the brief anecdote, and the extended story, each of which could have supplied him with many more narratives, and did indeed in his Due Preparations for the Plague published about the same time in order to catch the same apprehensive market as his Journal. The summary paragraph often introduces a series of brief anecdotes but sometimes stands alone, as in his brief recital of the killing of forty thousand dogs and two hundred thousand housecats as a precaution against the spread of the plague. There are many brief anecdotes, such as the frequently anthologized account of purifying a purse, which exhibit at once the common-sense cautiousness Defoe admires, the honesty of the Londoner, and the current belief that the plague was spread by contaminated air. The longest of the stories, filling about one tenth of the Journal, is that of the three men and their company who spent the summer camping in Epping Forest. Defoe tells the story at length to show what happened to Londoners who left the city and retired to places where his narrator could not follow them.

Defoe's subject was epic in scope: ■ great metropolis in the midst of a boom following the Restoration is slowly strangled by a hidden enemy. The size of his subject gives ample scope for the inclusion of all sorts of material, but his handling of it is typically original. Instead of a heroic poem we get the sober account of an average Londoner, a superior type of the real heroes of his book—those from Lord Mayor to beggar who did not abandon their city. The narrator is simply identified by the subscription of "H. F." to the Journal (possibly an allusion to Defoe's uncle, Henry Foe) and is described as a saddler engaged in the American trade. This, like all trade and manufacturing, ended with the onslaught of the plague in June, 1665, and left his narrator free to observe the reactions of his townsfolk.

Defoe's choice of narrator serves to control his material by presenting it soberly and thus to press Defoe's own views on the prevention of the plague, as in his saddler's criticism of shutting up the living with the sick when one plague victim was found in the house. But the opinions of the narrator seem contradictory in two respects. The first is purely technical; the saddler recommends shutting up one's house at the beginning of the plague but acknowledges that supplies have to be brought in by servants and thus the plague spreads. He shuts up his house and servants but wanders through the streets even to the deathpits (he observes that one in his parish of Aldgate holds eleven hundred and fourteen corpses when full); he must wander in order to write his "journal." Except for a period of three weeks when he is conscripted as an "examiner" he remains an observer and thus uncharacteristic of the energetic and resourceful citizens, the details of whose organization seem practical and whose spirit Defoe lauds during the plague and bewails when it passes as the plague diminishes.

In a second respect the ambivalence of the narrator is more striking: he lauds common sense and courage where he finds it but ascribes to providence the salvation of the city in the despair most felt at the end of September, when deaths numbered over ten thousand weekly. Then, suddenly, the weekly bills showed a dramatic decrease. To whom should go the praise? Defoe has it both ways, as he had done when he solemnly introduced the scandalous history of Moll Flanders as a moral tract. It is this ambivalence which is the true foundation of the English novel, a recital of fictions which rings, and is, essentially true.

THE JOURNAL OF THOREAU

Author: Henry David Thoreau (1817-1862)
First published: 1906

About Thoreau's Journal no single statement is more appropriate than Walt Whitman's words about his own Leaves of Grass: "This no book,/Who touches this touches a man." Thoreau began his journal on October 22, 1837, soon after he had been graduated from Harvard, apparently at the suggestion of Emerson. On the first leaf, Thoreau wrote: "What are you doing now?" he asked. 'Do you keep a journal?' So I make my first entry to-day." Practically every day thereafter, almost to the time of his death, he entered his thoughts, sometimes long, sometimes brief, but all the essence of the man. In 1857, Thoreau entered the thought: "Is not the poet bound to write his own biography? Is there any other work for him but a good journal? We do not wish to know how his imaginary hero, but how he, the actual hero, lived from day to day." Thoreau's actual hero recorded in his journal "all his joy, his ecstasy." But he tried to keep his perspective and not misdirect his effort. In February 8, 1841, when he was twenty-three years old, he recorded: "My Journal is that of me which would else spill over and run to waste, gleanings from the field which in action I reap. I must not live for it, but in it for the gods."

Because the Journal was so completely the full life of the man, when he came to write his other works he naturally mined his daily recordings for ideas and recollections, which he then amplified and modified to fit his more immediate purpose. Apparently Thoreau never intended to publish his journal as such, for it was a secret and private depository of his thoughts: "'Says I to myself' should be the motto of my journal," he recorded in 1851. Thoreau's family after his death also felt that the Journal was too private to be of public interest. Finally, however, the work was issued in 1906 in fourteen volumes. Though called complete, this version was in fact far short of the total work, which in Thoreau's private recording had reached nearly two million words. At least two other volumes of his early journal were omitted. One has subsequently been published, as Consciousness in Concord, edited by Perry Miller. And another volume of Thoreau's early journal, consisting of some 42,000 words, is now in the keeping of the New York Public Library.

Because his journal was a private depository of Thoreau's observations and reactions daily replenished, it ranges through the full breadth and depth of its author's experience. During the earlier years it quite naturally was filled with Thoreau's naive reactions to life, to the books he was reading, and to his exuberant reactions to the philosophy of Transcendentalism espoused by his mentor Emerson and adopted by himself. Thus we find such entries as the following: "All this worldly wisdom was once the unamiable heresy of some wise man" (July 6, 1840). "We should strengthen, and beautify, and industriously mould our bodies to be fit companions of the soul,—assist them to grow up like trees, and be agreeable and wholesome objects in nature. I think if I had had the disposal of this soul of man, I should have bestowed it sooner on some antelope of the plains than upon this sickly and sluggish body" (January 25, 1841).

Occasionally, the plain good sense and restraint of the young man is overwhelmed by his uncontrolled poetic impulses and he shapes a line or figure more florid than effective: "Nature refuses to sympathize with our sorrow. She seems not to have provided for, but by a thousand contrivances against, it. She has bevelled the margins of the eyelids that the tears may not overflow on the cheek" (July 27, 1841).

Beginning on July 4, 1845, and continuing for two years and two months, Thoreau lived in a hut at Walden Pond. After his return he lived for a year in the Emerson home. After these years Thoreau's mood was one of expansiveness and universalism, stimulated by the air of freedom he breathed in the open country around his native village. The Journal entries reveal his spirit: "I do not prefer one religion or philosophy to another. I have no sympathy with the bigotry and ignorance which make transient and partial and puerile distinctions between one man's faith or form of faith and another's,—as Christian and heathen. I pray to be delivered from narrowness, partiality, exaggeration, bigotry. To the philosopher all sects, all nations, are alike. I like Brahma, Hari, Buddha, the Great Spirit, as well as God" (1850).

The practical Yankee nature never did understand Thoreau. After his death, Thoreau's best friend, Emerson, even deprecated his lack of accomplishment in worldly affairs, lamenting that "instead of engineering for all America, he was the captain of a huckleberry-party. Pounding beans is good to the end of pounding empires one of these days; but if, at the end of years, it is still only beans!" In Thoreau, however, there ran a wide and strong stream of humor which allowed him to accept without irritation the misunderstanding of his neighbors as long as it allowed him to go his individual way. Often in the Journal, as in the famous chapter on "Economy" in Walden, he entered his humorous observations in aphoristic understatement, as in "Some circumstantial evidence is very strong, as when you find a trout in the milk" (November 11, 1850).

During the early 1850's Thoreau was reaching the full maturity of his powers. As he more and more balanced his inner strifes and conflicts, he increasingly turned his rapier observations and wit on the disharmonies of the exterior world. He still felt himself undeveloped but his potential great: "Here I am thirty-four years old, and yet my life is almost wholly unexpanded. How much is the germ! There is such an interval between my ideal and the actual in many instances that I may say I am unborn" (July 19, 1851). On another occasion, soon afterwards, he again cautioned himself to exploit himself: "Drain the cup of inspiration to its last dregs. . . . The spring will not last forever" (January 24, 1852). On numerous occasions he lashes out at the injustices of the world, as when he sees a small child, on a cold day, dressed in only one layer of clothes and holey shoes, trudging to school. Tho-reau's whole nature is revulsed: "This little mass of humanity, this tender gobbet for the fates, cast into a cold world with a torn lichen leaf wrapped about him,—oh, I should rather hear that America's first-born were all slain than that his little fingers and toes should feel cold while I am warm" (January 28, 1852).

One of the great ironies in the history of the appreciation of literary works concerns Thoreau's first book, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, the outcome of which is wryly entered in his journal. This book had been published in an edition of one thousand copies. On October 28, 1853, Thoreau recorded that 706 copies had been returned to him in a wagon. Of the 294 disposed of by the publisher, some seventy-five had been given away. Of the fate of this literary adventure, Thoreau remarked with great irony: "I have now a library of nearly nine hundred volumes, over seven hundred of which I wrote myself. Is it not well that the author should behold the fruits of his labor?"

Up to the very last days of his life, Thoreau's attitude continued to clarify and solidify. Though his attitudes became less and less flexible, he never became a hardened cynic. Always he maintained his faith in himself, not with a blind egotism, but with the feeling that he was representative man. As he said in Walden, "If I seem to boast more than is becoming, my excuse is that I brag for humanity rather than for myself." As typical man he felt that his story was worth telling, though confided privately in his journal. One of his late entries states: "Wherever men have lived there is a story to be told, and it depends chiefly on the story-teller or historian whether that is interesting or not" (March 18, 1861).

The story Thoreau told in the Journal is one of the most intimate and revealing ever recounted in American literature.

JOURNAL TO ELIZA

Type of work: Sentimental diary

Author: Laurence Sterne (1713-1768)

First published: 1904

Principal personages:

YORICK, Sterne's alter ego, the writer of the journal

ELIZA DRAPER, the object of his sentimental passion

Laurence Sterne's Journal to Eliza has been considered by unsuspecting readers as conclusive evidence that its author was a lachrymose sentimentalist. Yet anyone familiar with Tristram Shandy and A Sentimental Journey will recognize touches of that humorous view of eighteenth century sentimentalism that makes Sterne's novels so appealing.

Sterne was neither a parodist nor a satirist in the usual sense. He seems, in fact, to have enjoyed dramatizing his emotions on numerous occasions, and he could not have created some of his finest fictional scenes without real sensitivity to nuances of feeling. Nevertheless, an ironic humorist always occupied one corner of his mind, ready to appear at any moment to undercut the effect of a particularly touching episode. He was always aware of the ridiculous aspects of human behavior, and he appropriately adopted the name of one of literature's most famous jesters for his alter ego. It is as Parson Yorick that he sheds copious tears over the departure of his beloved Eliza and, in A Sentimental Journey, invokes her name to protect him from the amorous intrigues that awaited him at every coach station.

The Journal to Eliza is not an easy work to analyze; numerous readers have puzzled over its tone. Is it to be considered as an autobiographical document, as a purely literary creation, or as something between the two? Sterne met Eliza Draper, the wife of an employee of the East India Company, in 1767, the year before his death. Extant letters suggest that he fancied himself in love with her, while she regarded him as a friend, but no more. It was not out of character for Sterne to indulge himself in a literary romance that existed primarily in his imagination. Some of the letters he wrote his wife before their marriage are almost identical to the effusions of his journal, and he later addressed other ladies who struck his fancy in similar terms. Whatever his feelings may have been, Sterne was the same man who was composing the brilliantly witty A Sentimental Journey during the last months of his life, and it is difficult to believe that he did not perceive the essential absurdity of some of his outpourings of emotion in the Journal to Eliza.

Yorick's diary, which is really an extended letter, begins just after Eliza has left for India with her husband. He has promised his "Bramine" that he will record his activities and his feelings every day, and he begins with extravagant protestation of grief at her departure. Few external events find a place in the journal; Yorick visits friends, travels from London to his country home, and, in the latter part of the book, anticipates a visit from his estranged wife and their daughter, but most of the pages are filled with accounts of the parson's illness and the torments of his sorrowing soul.

His laments over his solitary dinner are typical of the ludicrous sentimentality of the work: "I have just been eating my Chicking, sitting over my repast upon it with Tears—a bitter Sause—Eliza! but I could eat it with no other—when Molly spread the Table Cloath, my heart fainted within me—one solitary plate—one knife—one Glass! O Eliza; 'twas painfully distressing. . . ."

The disjointed phrases, the apostrophes to the absent lady, the potent emotional effects of everyday objects charac-terize the style of the entire journal. The work abounds in tears from start to finish. Yorick weeps over his dinner, over Eliza's picture, over dreams of her; he joins their friend Mrs. James in lamenting his pale, wan countenance, and he sobs with his maid, Molly, who feelingly comments on how much Mrs. Draper is missed. Sterne is a master of the language of overwrought emotions, and it is not surprising that some readers have taken him completely seriously.

There are, however, clues along the way which suggest that Yorick's laments are not quite what they seem. It is typical that the writer who filled Tristram Shandy with bawdy double entendres should make much of the fact that Yorick's illness, brought on by grief at Eliza's leaving, has been diagnosed as venereal disease. He protests vehemently "'tis impossible, at least to be that, replied I—for I have had no commerce whatever with the Sex—not even with my wife, added I, these 15 years." This is not the kind of comment one expects to find in a truly "sentimental" work. Yorick's apology for bringing up the subject simply enhances the humor of the situation: "Tis needless to tell Eliza, that nothing but the purest consciousness of Virtue, could have tempted Eliza's friend to have told her this Story—Thou are too good my Eliza to love aught but Virtue—and too discerning not to distinguish the open character, which bears it, from the artful and double one which affects it."

Immediately after this statement Sterne the novelist comes to the fore: "This, by the way, would make no bad anecdote in T. Shandy's Life." Other references to his writing later in the journal provide reassuring intervals of everyday life in the morass of sentiment.

Yorick began his journal in April, and the entries for that month are long and impassioned. Sterne evidently became less interested in his romance in May; the daily comments are briefer and more perfunctory, although there is an occasional burst of emotion: "Laid sleepless all the night, with thinking of the many dangers and sufferings, my dear Girl! that thou art exposed to—" At the end of the month Yorick records his journey from London to his country cottage, where he nurses himself, fancies Eliza beside him in every picturesque spot in his garden, and daydreams of a sequence of events that would allow them to marry.

The entries for early June initiate a new autobiographical episode that is the chief focus of the rest of the journal. Yorick receives a letter from his daughter announcing that she and her mother, who is throughout the book referred to as Mrs. Sterne, will visit him to discuss financial arrangements to enable them to retire to France permanently. The monetary details, discussed at length, are probably fairly accurate, as is the resentment with which Yorick predicts that the ladies will carry off all his household possessions: "In short I shall be pluck'd bare—all but of your Portrait and Snuff Box and your other dear Presents."

It is, perhaps, significant of Sterne's state of mind that the entries for the month after the receipt of Lydia's letter are much longer and more emotional than those which preceded it. There is considerable discussion of all the happy expression of concern about the forthcoming visit, and one is tempted to speculate that Sterne is using the journal less as a literary game and more as a means of putting his mind at ease. In any case, he seems finally to have grown tired of the project toward the end of the summer. The July entries are fond, but increasingly less frequent, and on August 4 Yorick writes that his family is soon to arrive and that their presence will put an end to his diary. A single paragraph, dated November 1, concludes the work. Mrs. Sterne is to retire to France with an annuity of 300 guineas a year, and Yorick is free to think again of Eliza: "But What can I say,—What can I write—But the Yearnings of heart wasted with looking and wishing for thy Return—Return—Return! my dear Eliza! May heaven smooth the Way for thee to send thee safely to us, and joy for Ever."

The Journal to Eliza has attracted considerable attention as a biographical document, though it is one of somewhat dubious value, and as a work illustrating eighteenth century sentimental writing. Unfortunately, it falls far below Tristram Shandy and A Sentimental Journey in literary interest; the unceasing protestation of love, grief, and despair must inevitably become monotonous, as Sterne himself seems to have discovered. Readers will continue to turn to the journal for the insights it gives into the author's peculiar genius, but his reputation rests not upon it but on the two novels.

JOURNAL TO STELLA

Type of work: Letters

Author: Jonathan Swift (1667-1745)

First published: 1766

The Journal to Stella consists of the letters of Jonathan Swift to Esther Johnson. Begun in 1710 and ending in 1713, they mark the long period of separation when Swift was deeply involved in the literary and political affairs of London. Esther Johnson was the woman whom Swift first knew as a child, whom he educated, whom he befriended, and with whom he fell in love. The journal is not, however, in any sense of the word a collection of love letters. The relationship of Swift and Stella was an intellectual one, and the journal is about the ideas and experiences which linked them. It is a great document of life in Augustan London, and of the early life of its author.

The letters are first of all a very detailed picture of Swift's fortunes in the capital. He wrote of his friendships with men such as Harley and St. John, who controlled, for a brief time, the government of the nation. Swift was an adviser and friend to these men, and the journal reveals to what extent he was in their company, how deeply he enjoyed their confidence, and how much they relied on his judgment. It indicates too the exact nature of the day-to-day issues about which they consulted. The central matter was the establishment of a Tory system of government, and of this Swift has a good deal to say. Some of the events mentioned in the letters, in fact, come up in disguised form in the later Gulliver's Travels.

Swift was one of the champions of the Tory party, and his considerable powers of satire were often called on for its support. The journal reveals that he was animated by belief in the meaning of Tory principles of government—and by the conviction that he had a good deal to gain personally from his association with that party. Swift devotes a good deal of time to explaining the extent to which he believed he deserved rewards, and he is particular in recording the degree to which his claims were honored. The journal explains to Stella the reasons for the many affairs of state he attended and the conviction, spoken and unspoken, that he ought to have a voice in matters of policy.

The tone of the letters is noticeably ironic. Swift writes of a great many persons and events, but he does not grant them the heavy seriousness and meaningfulness that other men might too easily have given. Consistently throughout these letters is a tone which sets the great and near great in their places. Over and over again Swift describes people and their varied affairs, but he rarely descends to find in either the people or the events anything of particular consequence. One of the refreshing things about the letters is the fact that people with very little other than their aristocratic positions to recommend them are seen through the prismatic insight of a very liberated intelligence. Swift notes that a servant seems to be drunk and that a lord seems to be stupid. In both cases Swift is habitually insulting, but in both he is also objective. As a memoir this work has distinct advantages over history, for it gives the domestic and mundane side of events that, after all, existed in more than the public dimension.

There is an extraordinary amount of what must be admitted is pure gossip in the journal. This material is present, evidently, for several reasons: it must have pleased the reader; it evidently pleased Swift; and it functions to give a thick social context to the judgments Swift frequently passes on mankind. Swift includes an enormous amount of detail on the private lives of the people among whom he lives and on the methods by which he came by his knowledge of them. Much of it was by word of mouth, although some of it came from the ferociously revelatory newspapers and pamphlets of the time. Swift reveals why certain officers were dismissed from the service (they had dressed a skeleton as the Prime Minister and shot pistols at it); where Richard Steele spent some time unwillingly (in jail for debt); what he thought of certain people attached to the court (they were for the most part idiots). In short, the journal allows the writer to express himself with a good deal of honesty and a certain amount of useful prejudice about the life he is engaged in. To the author of Gulliver's Travels such an exposure to the life of the ruling classes was bound to be useful.

One of the greatest themes of this collection of letters is the personal life of the author. He writes often of the hopes he has for his future and of his own estimation of himself. Both were high. The note generally sounded is that of distress as Swift writes of the failure of people and institutions to live up to his conception of their function. He writes of the labyrinthine politics and intrigues of those years and, quite honestly, of his part in some of them.

The journal has a strong element of tenderness towards its object, Stella. Swift continually reveals the strength of his respect for her and the quality of the emotions she causes in him. The personal note, even in a narrative of affairs of state, is never dropped. Swift uses what he called the "little language" of affection between himself and Stella, the language he first used to her when she was a child. In this language both she and he have nicknames, and he refers to these continually rather than to more formal address. Swift makes plain the depth of his feeling for Esther Johnson in his many allusions to the state of her health (she was not entirely well, and died early) and to the frequency of his thoughts about her. In strong contrast to the coldness with which he treats the characters of the journal is the emotion with which he addresses the recipient. He makes plain the loneliness of separation in his frequent admissions that he prefers her company to all of the power and politics of the capital.

The journal is a kind of testing-ground of Swift's humor, and one of its most consistent characteristics is the satirical attitude it displays towards human pretensions. His account of Addison and Steele in a letter of December, 1710, describes their responses to a favor and ironically points out the pride and sullenness which prevents them from benefiting from a kindness. Like the characters of Gulliver's Travels, Book I, they are the victims of "rancour of party." In other letters of the same month he reflects with detached amusement on the changes in position of the social puppet-show. He describes a steward who has become a millionaire, a shopkeeper who has become a soldier, and other changes that have resulted from the caprices of the human will. Even Swift's own party is not spared from the objectivity of his wit. In one letter he reflects coolly on the many promises made to him and on the likelihood of these promises ever being honored. Here, as in his literary works, he makes a strong distinction between "promise" and "pretence." The constant attitude is that of skepticism.

As a historical document the journal has provided a fund of information on early eighteenth century events. The attempted assassination of Harley in 1711 is one of the most interesting and detailed of Swift's descriptions and is often referred to by historians. Swift begins by noting that he has written a full account of this matter to his superiors in Dublin and that he is trying to establish a true account of an event that would otherwise be distorted by rumor. He gives the particulars of the stabbing of Harley by Antoine de Guiscard, a man apprehended in the act of treason. In a tense, reportorial manner Swift outlines the event, its aftermath, and the probable consequences for national policy—a later essay in the Examiner (number 33) goes into the matter in greater detail, and reveals that the first entry in the Journal, hasty but objective, is the basis for the longer study. Other entries in the Journal clarify the uneasy relationship between Harley and St. John, the two leaders of the Tory party. These men were both partners and rivals; the letters to Stella have many remarks on the nature of their private and public differences. Swift outlines the many difficulties of their relationship with Queen Anne, as well as other matters having to do with the Whig minority and the very combustible elements of the Tory party itself. In short, the journal accomplishes two major objectives: it gives some idea of the depth and quality of feeling that the famous satirist had for the woman he admired, and it establishes a social context for some of the most important political events of its writer's time.

THE JOURNALS OF ANDRÉ GIDE

Author: André Gide (1869-1951)

First published: Journal, 1889-1939, 1939 (The Journals of André Gide); Pages de Journal, 1939-1942, 1944 (Extracts from the Journals, 1939-1942); Journal, 1942-1949, 1950; Deux Interviews imaginaires suivies de Feuilletés, 1946 (Dialogues on God)

André Gide's Journals, which he kept over a period of sixty years from 1889 to 1949, are the personal expression of a writer whose intention was to reveal himself explicitly in his works. In the informal Journal the reader may apprehend in its complexity Gide's protean personality, which he controlled and utilized in his novels, plays, and essays in accordance with his rigorous ideals of the formal, factitious nature of art. Gide said, however, that he was afraid that his journals would give a false impression of him since he kept them most faithfully during periods of depression when he used them as a sort of discipline, and not during periods of health and happiness when he was absorbed in his work. Be that as it may, the Journals touch on numerous aspects of Gide's work, personality and thought; there are explications and elaborations of the great Gidian ideas and themes; records of Gide's reading and sometimes comments upon the authors he read in which one may see something of Gide's relationship to other thinkers; anecdotes about the artistic people of the time who were his friends, and often opinions about their work; observations on his travels, his gardening, his piano practice, his daily life, often written with the humor and perspicacity which Gide employed so fruitfully in his other works. As Jean-Paul Sartre said of Gide's work in general, the Journals give the reader a sense of the authentic experience of a man in their original multiplicity, the many directions of a mind which both expressed and represented the temper of their time.

Gide's expression of his ideas in the Journals reveals how a sensitive mind responded to the ideas that were current during his time and how the artist effected a synthesis of them through his personality. Gide's life—his background, his culture, his actions, his dilemmas—were in many ways so representative of his society that he has become, as Albert Guerard has observed, a symbolic figure of the modern crisis of individualism.

The Journals are an invaluable document for the study of the development and expression of Gide's individualism. Gide said that his life was dominated by the ideal of being, according to the Gospels, a man "in whom is no guile," to express himself sincerely in his actions, and to reveal himself with the greatest limpidity in his writings. The famous Gidian sincerity ultimately produced the infamous Gidian "immoralism." The account records the progress toward immoralism of an ascetic young Huguenot brought up in the strictest Protestant tradition, a development revealed in his trips to North Africa, a country which came to represent for Gide, in contrast to the austerity of France, a sort of province of la volupté, and in his friendship with Oscar Wilde. The Journals also reveal the ways in which Gide's native Protestant bourgeois ethic continued to influence his life and thought. To express the most radical inclinations of his self, Gide often chose the language of religion. In the Journal of 1893, he prays to the Lord to give him the strength to break the confining ethic in which he lived, and he says that he had to impel himself toward pleasure. Gide's individualism and immoralism required not only the open acknowledgment of his pederasty, but the cultivation of the sensual faculties in an effort to induce a state of "receptivity" or "availability" to experience. He made an effort, Gide says in the Journal of 1923, to discover beneath the factitious self formed by society an unspoiled, more "natural" self. But in the same passage he adds that such an effort to achieve the greatest personal sincerity required all the power of his will, and he concludes that he was never more moral than when he had decided to be immoral. As Ramon Fernandez said of Gide's "receptivity," will and reflection themselves make possible, in a cultivated person, an un-willed and un-reflective existence. What in many thinkers would be paradox becomes in Gide, because of the autonomy he attributed to personality, resolution.

The Journals, in statement and in style, often reveal Gide's capacity for entertaining seemingly contradictory forces. Just at the time of his marriage to his cousin, Gide wrote in all sincerity a eulogy of what he called "nomadism," a theory close to the existentialist concept of freedom. Despite his expressed belief that a man should disassociate himself from family, country and personal possessions, Gide said that many of his books were written under the pious influence of his wife. He says also in the Journal of 1923 that he never left Cuverville, his estate in Normandy, without a feeling of heartbreak.

In like manner, Gide never completely repudiated the religion of his childhood, but reinterpreted the Gospels according to his own personal lights. In his journals Gide records his unorthodox views and his dialogue with his Catholic friends, of whom Paul Claudel is the most famous, who feared Gide's peculiar antinomian Christianity. Sin, Gide says in Numquid et Tu . . ., part of the Journal written between 1916 and 1919, is what is not done freely. Gide often reveals a Manichean conception of evil, and in the Journal of 1916 he postulates the heretical idea that God is not original, that He is molded through man and will be the end of evolution; but he later modified this concept and said that God is both the creator and the end of creation. In the Journal of 1923, Gide records an interview with Jacques Maritain which succinctly illustrates Gide's opposition to the suppressive authority of orthodox Christianity; in reply to Jacques Maritain's plea that he not publish one of his books on the grounds that the truth it manifested was dangerous, Gide replied that the falsehood that covers the truth is, in a Christian society, even more dangerous. Gide affirmed his Protestantism in this interview when he said that the Protestant perhaps confuses truth with God instead of believing that truth is but one of the attributes of God. Gide recorded in his journals two instances when he was tempted to take refuge in Catholicism, once in 1906 and again in 1916. But Gide reasserted his individualism on both occasions and maintained this characteristic attitude until the end of his life. Ramon Fernandez attributes to Gide the "scientific spirit" and says that in the choice between security and truth which a man is obliged to make, Gide chose truth and refused to assuage his anguish in the arms of the Church. In the Journal of 1949, in one of the last entries written before his death, Gide still attributed to the body the importance he had given it in his youth; he said that in the identification of the soul and the body he had found harmony and that he could not attempt to subject one to the other as the Christian ideal proposes to do.

Gide, in defining his skepticism, said that his sympathies were neither materialist, cynic, nor epicurean, but rather individualist and particularist in the tradition of Montaigne. Gide, in fact, identified himself with Montaigne to the point of saying that it seemed to him that Montaigne was indeed himself; and Gide's journals are as much a fundamental expression of his personality as the Essais were of Montaigne's, both of them attempting in their daily observations to describe the multiple facets of their minds and to discover "l'etre veritable." But Gide thought of himself as an artist rather than a philosopher, and by the time he was twenty-five he had formulated his position on this point; what for the philosopher, he said, is skepticism, is for the man of letters a "state of dialogue," a disinterested sympathy, a deep insight into the beliefs and ethics of others. In the Journal of 1923, Gide said that while the state of dialogue is intolerable to many minds because it prevents action, it had given him equilibrium and harmony since it led him to the work of art.

The Journals accurately record the religious spirit Gide brought to the concept of art, and one can see in the work to what extent Gide's conception of classical style is related to the conservative elements of his personality. Jean Delay says of Gide that the more the man advocated a romantic individualism, the more the artist advocated formal classicism. Art, Gide says in the Journal of 1922, equals prudence, and he criticizes those authors who are said to be fertile merely because they do not know how to suppress. In the most extreme moments of self-abandon, Gide kept one eye open, the eye of the artist. He admitted, in the Journal of 1913, that he expressed his thought in his work in an ironic manner, and that perhaps his belief in art, the "cult" he had made of the work of art, prevented the pure sincerity which he demanded of himself. Of what interest to him, he asked, is any lucidity which is not an aspect of style? But Gide wanted his craft to be so discreet, so mysterious, that it could not be considered as a thing in itself; he wanted no manner but that which his subject required.

The Journals reveal the development of the personal skepticism in the interests of art that Gide maintained throughout his life in his encounters with the supporters of partisan thought, both of the right and of the left. Although Gide rejected his youthful affiliation with the Symbolist group around Mallarmé, he says that he adhered throughout his life to Mallarmé's belief that art partook of the eternal and degraded itself by serving even noble causes. For some time, however, Gide was attracted to Communism, and the Journals provide a record of the development of these sympathies. Gide said in the Journal of 1932 that he had come to wish for the upset of capitalism and of the injustices and lies it entailed, but that Communism should favor the individual. He refused, however, to join the Party and said that art and literature are not concerned with social questions and must not serve utilitarian ends. In the Journal of 1933, he said that "conversion" to Communism, like conversion to Catholicism, entails a renunciation of free enquiry, and that he suspected all orthodoxies. Gide believed that the artist should put his own works in order, and not the world around him.

Although Gide held the position of intellectual distinction in his own time that Jean-Paul Sartre has held since World War II, Gide always refused to be a "directeur de conscience." In the Journal of 1946 he answered a young man who had addressed him as "maître" by telling him not to seek masters, that submission and intellectual security will contribute to the defeat of the spirit, and that only the un-submissive, who are the "salt of the earth," can preserve civilization. Such a passage reflects the contours of Gide's mind and personality which are revealed in such detail throughout the Journal: the lack of nihilism in Gide's thought, the essential quality of ideals that were never revolutionary, his intention, as Germaine Brée has said, to revitalize traditions, and his use of culture to interpret personality rather than to support dogma. Gide's refusal to commit himself and the supremacy he attributed to art occasioned, upon his death, an outburst of criticism from the far right and the far left. Gide has been dismissed as a decadent aesthete or criticized, as by Jean-Paul Sartre, for having the ethic of the "writer-consumer." The Journals give the reader the opportunity of judging Gide's capacity to hold his own against his critics.

Written in Gide's elegant and impeccable style, the Journals should be read for their intrinsic literary value and interest as well as for their clear expression of Gide's thought and personality.

JOURNALS OF DOROTHY WORDSWORTH

Author: Dorothy Wordsworth (1771-1855)

First published: 1874; 1889; 1897; 1904

Principal works: The Alfoxden Journal, 1798 et seq; Journal of Visit to Hamburg and of Journey from Hamburg to Goslar, 1798; The Grasmere Journal, 1800-1803; Recollections of a Tour Made in Scotland, 1803; Excursion on the Banks of Ullswater, 1805; Excursion up Scawfell Pike, 1818; Journal of a Tour on the Continent, 1820; Journal of my Second Tour in Scotland, 1822; Journal of a Tour in the Isle of Man, 1828

The Journals of Dorothy Wordsworth offer surprising dividends to the reader who turns to them in search of information about the author's famous brother William, for Miss Wordsworth was herself a remarkably sensitive and perceptive observer of man and nature, as well as a gifted prose writer. Her surviving works are of two kinds. She left daily notes about her life at Alfoxden and Grasmere, where she lived with her brother between 1798 and 1803, and about holiday excursions in the Lake Country, Germany, and on the Isle of Man. Working from notes taken on two other trips, she composed long accounts of her tour of Scotland with Wordsworth and Coleridge in 1803 and of her travels on the Continent with her brother, his wife, and several friends in 1820. These journals were written simply for the entertainment of friends, but Dorothy's smooth narrative style and her gift for conveying local color make her pages worthy of comparison with Johnson's and Boswell's more famous accounts of their trip to the western isles of Scotland.

The journals of the years at Alfoxden and Grasmere inevitably have the greatest interest for the modern reader, for they reveal most clearly Dorothy's own personality and her relationship to her poet brother during the years in which he produced many of his finest works. Her description of her life during this period gives a vivid impression of her as a modest, self-effacing woman who dedicated herself to caring for her family and friends. The dominant force in her life was her passionate affection for William; at times she speaks of him in terms more applicable to a lover than to a brother. She kept house for him until his marriage to Mary Hutchinson, and she remained a beloved member of their household, helping rear several nieces and nephews and caring for the many friends who paid extended visits, among them Thomas De Quincey, Sir Walter Scott, and William Hazlitt.

Dorothy had boundless faith in William Wordsworth's genius, and she took upon herself the task of removing all the inconveniences, distractions, and practical matters that were obstacles in the way of his writing. She spent many evenings copying the poetry he had composed on his daily walks, and she indicates that she sometimes suggested improvements. Comments like these appear on almost every page of her journals: "William composing in the wood in the morning," or, "William worked all the morning at the sheepfold, but in vain," or, "William was afterwards only partly successful in composition."

Her concern for William's health and poetic powers was extended to his friend and colleague, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who was an almost constant visitor at Alfoxden and Grasmere. Dorothy and William watched with great distress Coleridge's increasing lassitude, his dependence on opium and alcohol, his despair over his uncongenial marriage that sapped his creativity. Among the saddest of Dorothy's comments are her resigned statements about his work; more than once she notes, "Coleridge had done nothing for the Lyrical Ballads."

Dorothy's aid to William did not end with cooking and copying. She had a fine mind, kept alert by wide reading; she mentions at various times enjoying Henry Fielding's Amelia, Boswell's work, Shakespere, and the poetry of Edmund Spenser and Ben Jonson. She shared her brother's feeling for the natural world. Often, immediately following a prosaic account of a domestic errand, will come a description of a scene she and William enjoyed on an evening walk: "A deep stillness in the thickest part of the wood, undisturbed except by the occasional dropping of the snow from the holly boughs." On another occasion she tells how they first observed the crescent moon, a silvery line, a thready bow, attended by Jupiter and Venus in their palest hues."

Dorothy shared in the early nineteenth century preoccupation with the picturesque; her evaluations of landscapes are reminiscent of the scene in Jane Austen's Northanger Abbey in which Henry Tilney instructs young Catherine Morland in the proper way to look at nature: "Catherine was so hopeful a scholar, that when they gained the top of Beechen Cliff, she voluntarily rejected the whole city of Bath, as unworthy to make part of a landscape." Dorothy brands a view from the top of a Lake Country hillside "mildly interesting," and commenting on a seascape she says that "had there been a vessel sailing upon it, a perfect image of delight." Touring the Alps in 1820, she was constantly in search of the sublime or the majestic scene.

Typical, too, of the Romantic frame of mind was her love for the wilder aspects of nature; she disapproved thoroughly of the "improvements" made by eighteenth century landowners who took pride in their formal gardens. She wrote after a visit to an estate near Alfoxden: "Quaint waterfalls about which nature was very successfully striving to make beautiful what art had deformed—ruins, hermitages, etc., etc. In spite of all these things, the dell romantic and beautiful, though everywhere planted with unnaturalized trees. Happily we cannot shape the huge hills or carve out the valleys according to our fancy."

The human scene was as fascinating to

Dorothy Wordsworth as the natural world. Her travel journals are filled with accounts of the individuals she met and the places where she stayed; she leaves the reader with an indelible impression of the odors and dirt of more than one inn, and she gives unforgettable descriptions of characters like the small Scottish boy who took Wordsworth to the Falls of Clyde and hid himself like a statue in a niche in the cave there. She had a housewifely interest in family customs, furnishings, and food that make her observations valuable evidence about the lives of the Scottish highlanders.

Typical is her description of the house where she waited to take a ferry across Loch Lomond; there two young girls chattered in Erse as they tried to choose a dress to lend the rain-soaked traveler; two boys played on the floor; an old woman sang doleful Gaelic songs to a fretful baby, with "all our clothes to be dried, dinner prepared and set out for us four strangers, and a second cooking for the family." The setting more than compensated for the poverty and confusion of the place; "the peep out of the open doorplace across the lake made some amends for the want of the long roof and elegant rafters of our boatman's cottage, and all the while the waterfall, which we could not see, was roaring at the end of the hut, which seemed to serve as a sounding board for its noise."

Dorothy's notes on life on the Continent are equally vivid. From her window in Cologne she watched passengers leave a ferry boat: "Peasants, male and female, sheep, and calves—The women hurrying away, with their cargoes of fruit and vegetables, as if eager to be beforehand with the market. . . . Two young ladies trip forward, their dark hair basketed round the crown of the head, green bags on their arms—two gentlemen of their party—next a lady with smooth black hair stretched upward from the forehead and a skull cap at the top like a small dish. The gentry passengers seem to arrange themselves on one side, the peasants on the other:—how much more picturesque the peasants!"

Dorothy had her brother's eye for the striking individual, the man or woman who stood apart from the rest of humanity by strength of character. Like William, she was drawn to the peddlers and beggars who passed by their home. She gives in the Grasmere Journal a brief sketch of the old leech gatherer immortalized in Wordsworth's "Resolution and Independence": "When William and I returned from accompanying Jones, we met an old man almost double. He had on a coat, thrown over his shoulders, above his waistcoat and coat. Under this he carried a bundle, and had an apron on and a night-cap. His face was interesting. He had dark eyes and a long nose. John, who afterwards met him at Wytheburn, took him for a Jew. He was of Scotch parents, but had been born in the army. He had had a wife, and 'a good woman, and it pleased God to bless us with ten children'. All these were dead but one, of whom he had not heard for many years, a sailor. His trade was to gather leeches, but now leeches are scarce, and he had not strength for it. He lives by begging, and was making his way to Carlisle, where he should buy a few godly books to sell."

Miss Wordsworth made no pretense of being a literary light in her day; none of her writing was meant for publication, and this fact is, in itself, a part of its charm. The journals invite the reader to share in the author's experiences and her feelings, to look at the scenes she found beautiful or sordid, to share in her fascination with all kinds of men and women, rich and poor, young and old. Dorothy Wordsworth will never rank as a major literary figure, but she is, in the pages of her diaries, a delightful companion.

THE JOURNALS OF LEWIS AND CLARK

Type of work: Record of exploration and adventure

Authors: Meriwether Lewis (1774-1809) and William Clark (1770-1838)

First published: History of the Expedition Under the Command of Captains Lewis and Clark to the Sources of the Missouri, Thence Across the Rocky Mountains and Down the River Columbia to the Pacific Ocean, 1814

Well before the Louisiana Purchase, Thomas Jefferson had realized the need for more knowledge of the vast lands to the west of the settled United States. As early as November, 1802, he had inquired of the Spanish minister the official reaction of his country to a suggested investigating party of Americans passing through the Louisiana Territory (which was then Spanish, though, everyone knew, it was about to be given back to France) up to the source of the Missouri River.

Jefferson's purposes were multiple. In the first place, it was wise, he recognized, for residents of the United States to become more knowledgeable about the vast and largely terra incognita that lay westward to the distant sea, especially since this land was claimed by foreign nations who through its use could wreak great damage to the young republic in case of war. In the second place, information about these lands could always be useful. In the third place, although Jefferson played down this side of his purpose, there was a good possibility that much of the rich trade in furs could be wrested from the Canadian monopoly. In the fourth place, there was great concern over the need for that will-o'-the-wisp that had long haunted people on the eastern seaboard impatient to get to the Western Ocean, a water route across the land, with a minimum of portages; Jefferson conjectured that by going up to the mouth of the Missouri travelers could transfer their loads to a river running to the Pacific Ocean with only one portage, and thus cut immensely the time and expense of going around the Cape by sea. In the last place, there was great need to reach the Columbia River and help establish beyond doubt the authority of the United States on that river basin, the supremacy over which was still in doubt.

With the Louisiana Purchase, Jefferson's plans could be put into motion. For his purpose he chose Captain Meriwether Lewis of the First Infantry, who was at that time serving as Jefferson's private secretary. Jefferson's instructions were practically general: "The object of your mission is to explore the Missouri river, & such principal stream of it, as, by it's course & communication with the waters of the Pacific Ocean, may offer the most direct & practicable water communication across this continent, for the purposes of commerce." Numerous side duties and explorations were also to be undertaken. For his aide, Lewis chose William Clark, the youngest brother of George Rogers Clark, who had seen some Indian fighting. Lewis was twenty-nine years old; Clark was thirty-three.

Each man was to complement the other in the enterprise. Both were experienced as rivermen, though Clark was the better. Clark was an engineer, geographer, and frontiersman, and he had had greater skill at handling delicate negotiations with Indians. Lewis was the diplomat and had been trained in botany, zoology, and celestial observation. Both were highly intelligent. Both were to share equally in the responsibility and command of the expedition. In fact, in few expeditions of this complexity and length have two men worked so harmoniously and helpfully together, each ready and able to fill in the speciality of the other when occasion demanded, as it frequently did. Likewise, seldom have two co-leaders been apparently so free of envy and rivalry in their achievements.

The expedition consisted of the two leaders, fourteen soldiers, "nine young men from Kentucky," plus two French-Canadians engaged as voyageurs, an interpreter, a hunter, and a Negro slave named York, owned by Clark. Never did the group consist of more than fifty persons, though the personnel in the lower ranks changed somewhat. The company, which trained during the winter, was camped on the east bank of the Mississippi close to St. Louis when on March 9, 1804, Louisiana was transferred to the United States. The first entries in the Journals are dated in May, 1804.

Journals were kept by various members of the expedition: by both Lewis and Clark, and by various other persons, with great or minimal perseverance. Lewis and Clark tried to make daily entries. Often their experiences had been similar or identical, and frequently the entries are virtually the same. Sometimes they are extended accounts, descriptions, including the flora and fauna, meteorological information, plus much more. At their briefest they are terse statements of the log of the day, the merest outline. Though there are other ways of distinguishing the entries, a notable one is Lewis' greater literacy.

The route of the journey led up the Missouri into what is now North Dakota, then to and across the Rocky Mountains to the Snake River, and from there to the mouth of the Columbia. On the return trip much of the journey led back over territory previously traversed, with an occasional break for needed rest, provisions, or other reasons.

The journey constituted one of the great expeditions of all times. Bernard De Voto hailed it as a trip in daring and with a consequent exaltation equal to the voyage of Columbus. Few discerning people will argue with this praise.

The records kept by Lewis and Clark are remarkable in several ways. They are given in straightforward, practical prose, obviously written by men who had much to do but who were determined to keep accurate accounts of all happenings. Thus are entered various events, all with equal laconic style, the earth-shaking with the trivial. The result is a detailed recording, the total impact of which reaches the reader more in the total than in the parts. Some sections are tedious and dull; some, had they not been presented in such a matter-of-fact way, would be wildly melodramatic.

One entry by Clark is typical. On Sunday, August 19, 1804, an Indian chief came to camp to have breakfast with the expedition. He begged for a sun glass. His people were all naked, "Covered only with Breech Clouts Blankets or Buffalow Roabes, the flesh Side Painted of Different colours and figures." After haranguing the Indians for a while, the men of the expedition brought out presents and gave some all around, including one "Small Meadel" to one of the chiefs and a "Sertificate to the others of their good intentions." After some confusion about the purpose and value of the certificate, the Indians passed it back to the whites, then asked for it again. At this point they were severely lectured for being more interested in goods than in peace. After further negotiations, the Indians were satisfied, and Clark's entry concludes with telegraphic speed: "those people beged much for Whiskey. Serjeant Floyd is taken verry bad all at once with a Biliose Chorlick we attempt to relieve him without success as yet, he gets worst and we are much allarmed at his Situation, all attention to him."

As the trip to the Pacific had been beset with extraordinary, sometimes fatal, hardships, so too was the return. At the time of supposed departure up the Columbia River many of the men were ill. Also, the Columbia was swollen by floods from heavy storms, the river was whipped by strong winds, and the boats of necessity kept to the Oregon shore in order to avoid the most powerful winds and currents. Adverse conditions were made even more contrary by lack of food and plaguing Indians who seemed to mean the men harm, though actually the natives were innocent.

One nerve-wracking incident occurred on this return trip. Lewis, after taking a short-cut to the Missouri, had his camp approached at night by Indians. Contrary to experience and seasoned judgment, he himself fell asleep during his watch. The Indians then surprised the party in an attempt to steal their guns and horses. Such adventures were in fact common. From beginning to end, although they were daily occurrences, want and danger were never far from the explorers. The outcome, however, was successful far beyond the expectations of all who planned and participated in the journey.

Read in their entirety, the Journals do in fact substantiate De Voto's claim that the trip was overwhelmingly successful and the account of it, as told by Lewis and Clark, superb.

KAMONGO

Type of work: Religio-scientific narrative

Author: Homer W. Smith

Time: The 1930's

Locale: A French steamer, the Dumbea, journeying through the Red Sea and the Suez Canal

First published: 1932

Principal characters:

JOEL, an American naturalist

THE PADRE, an Anglican priest

This book is the only semi-fictional work of the late Homer W. Smith, at one time chairman of the New York University School of Medicine and a noted physiologist whose major scientific accomplishment was "The Kidney: Structure in Health and Disease." Kamongo, though cast in thin fictional form, is not a novel in any conventional sense, and its story is relatively simple. Its two characters are Joel, an American naturalist, and the Padre, an English clergyman who has been stationed at Tanganyika. They strike up an acquaintance aboard the steamer on which both are returning home, and to the priest Joel relates his experiences in catching Kamongo, the lung-fish, at Lake Victoria. The lung-fish is of interest to Joel because it represents an unsuccessful experiment with life in the Devonian Age four hundred million years ago. However, the lung-fish could not survive on land because he had not perfected legs to sustain himself out of water. Consequently, the creature was compelled to remain stuck away in prehistoric mud. Joel's spirited account of the capture of Kamongo forms the first part of the book, the adventurous and by far the most satisfying part.

The remaining portion of the narrative consists of a debate between the two men. For Joel, the lung-fish represents certain aspects of crowded conditions on earth, with the stronger elements constantly pushing out and even destroying the weaker. The lung-fish could not maintain himself because he could not compete with more robust and vicious creatures. Also, Joel claims, the lung-fish was a product of overspecialization, one too highly individualized to adjust. As for the evolutionary process of which the lung-fish forms some link, Joel cannot find any evidence that it was all upward, and he rejects the Padres' assumption that it brought a quality of divinity to man.

The Padre cannot match Joel, the mechanist, in logic, for he has a layman's awe of the scientist with his impressive array of facts and proofs, and thus he has no ready rebuttal for Joel's claim that the protoplasmic jelly, the complex mass from which comes the cell of life itself is motivated for existence by nothing but a continuing will to live.

In such a vein the conversation progresses as the ship journeys through the Suez Canal into Port Said for anchorage. The Padre is unable to take a stand upon any moral or religious ground that Joel will allow. Joel even scolds his companion for attempting to seek a purpose in man's life when, as he explains, it is nothing more than a stream that flows on and on; and his own dour comment on the Padre's need to believe that life must have some goal is simply the fact that, like the lung-fish, man will perhaps turn out to be no more than a blind alley in the evolutionary scheme of things.

Kamongo is a debate on science and faith, cast in science-fictional form. Its two characters are not developed in fictional terms or even characterized except in broad general strokes. Generally the story is contained in the extended discussion between the two men, each of whom represents a special point of view in the issue of scientific doubt and religious belief. The book has some excellent descriptive scenes, and in the account of the ship's passage through the Red Sea and ultimately into the harbor at Port Said there are strong suggestions of Joseph Conrad. However, the author clearly is interested in the colloquy between the two men; and in making the debate so patently one-sided, without allowing the Padre to be a full-voiced exponent of his religious convictions, the author has seriously limited the range of the book. However, one can understand the appeal of the work for an older generation, for in the 1930's people were still attempting to attach moral implications to evolutionary theory. A more disillusioned generation of readers, accustomed to the incredible accomplishments of contemporary science, takes that argument to be merely academic; and Joel's scientific reasoning, from which eloquence is not missing, has for today's reader a slightly archaic and quaint flavor, even though his views carry conviction.

King Horn is the earliest English metrical romance. The Cambridge manuscript contains 1,530 lines in South Midland dialect of about the year 1225. The rhyming, accentual couplets show influence of Old English verse while attempting to conform to iambic tetrameter, the newer syllabic form introduced from France. The irregular, often trimeter, couplets are more bent upon telling the involved story than upon excellence of expression.

The story makes use of situations which appear in other romances: the sudden reappearance of a long-absent lover; the ring which identifies him; disguise; and, slightly, the return of a long lost child as an adult. The audience for which it was composed probably contained both women and warriors. To the one, the love motif may well have appealed, to the other, violence. For the twentieth century reader, King Horn has characteristics of both sentimental romance and the epic. The story is popular. There are several later manuscripts, and the return of the lover Horn is the subject of a ballad.

In the early manuscript, Horn, the fairest youth ever born, was bright as glass, white as a flower; his color was rose-red. In no kingdom was his equal. When Horn was fifteen years old, his father, King Murry of Suddene (Isle of Man) was killed by invading Saracens. His mother, Queen Godhild, found refuge under a rock, where she prayed for Horn's safety. Because of Horn's fairness, the Saracens spared him, setting him adrift with his twelve companions, including his brother Athulf and the wicked Fikenhild, on a ship which they expected to sink. The youths landed safely on the shore of Westernesse, where good King Aylmar, receiving them kindly, took an especial liking to Horn. Aylmar's daughter, Rymenhild, was also attracted to Horn and asked the steward, Athelbrus, who had been given charge of Horn's instruction, including harping, to bring him to her room. Disturbed over this command, Athelbrus brought Athulf instead. Mistaking him for Horn, Rymenhild told Athulf that she loved him. When she discovered that Athelbrus had tricked her, she threatened to have him hanged. Athelbrus then brought Horn to her. Immediately, Rymenhild asked him to marry her. Horn refused, saying that he was a foundling and unworthy. At this rebuff, Rymenhild fell in a swoon. Horn took her in his arms, kissed her, and asked her to have her father make him a knight so that he might marry her.

King Aylmar knighted Horn and permitted him to knight his companions. As soon as Horn was knighted, Rymenhild wanted him to marry her; but Horn said that he must first prove his merit as a knight. Rymenhild gave him a ring engraved with her name. She said that if he looked on this ring and thought of her, he would overcome all enemies. On a handsome black steed, Horn set forth on his quest. He quickly found and slew at least a hundred Saracens. The next day, Rymenhild told him that she had dreamed that a great fish had escaped from her net. The significance of her distressing dream was clear when Fikenhild, envious of Horn, told King Aylmar that Horn was planning to kill him and marry Rymenhild. He said that Horn was at the moment in bed with Rymenhild. This report was false; but Aylmar, rushing into his daughter's chamber, found Horn embracing Rymenhild. The king ordered Horn to leave the castle. Before departing, Horn instructed Athulf to guard Rymenhild. He told Rymenhild that he expected to be back in seven years; however, if he had not returned by that time, she was to take a husband.

Horn went to Ireland where he met two princes, Harild and Berild. He told them that his name was Cutberd. They took him to their father, King Thurston. The time was Christmas. Soon a giant came from heathendom to offer a challenge from paynims who had arrived in the land. One of them offered to fight any three of the Irish knights. The king appointed his sons, Harild and Berild, and Cutberd. Cutberd offered to take the challenger on alone. The champion fought with Cutberd and said that he had encountered only one man who was his equal, King Murry of Suddene. Shuddering, Horn realized that he faced his father's murderer. He looked on his ring, thought of Rymenhild, and smote the champion through the heart. The paynims turned to run to the boat. Horn and his companions followed and killed them all. Harild and Berild were killed in the fighting. Thurston then offered his daughter Reynild in marriage to Horn and planned to make the young knight heir to the throne. Horn replied that he would serve the king for seven years. At the end of that time, if he wanted his reward, including the princess for his wife, he would ask for it.

Back in Westernesse, Rymenhild had heard nothing of Horn. King Modi of Reynes (Turness in northern Lancashire), Horn's enemy, wanted to marry her. She sent a messenger to find Horn. The messenger succeeded in his mission, but on his return he drowned and was washed up at Rymenhild's door. Horn, meanwhile, asked King Thurston to help him regain Rymenhild. He promised his brother Athulf as husband for Reynild. Thurston gave him a ship. When Horn arrived in Westernesse to find Rymenhild's wedding to King Modi in progress, a palmer told him that the bride wept. Horn changed clothes with the palmer, disguised his features with dirt, and went to the wedding feast where he asked the bride for wine. Rymenhild gave him wine in a bowl as if he were a thirsty beggar. Horn refused, saying that he was a fisherman who had come to see if the net he set seven years ago had taken a fish. He said that he wanted to drink to Horn from horn. Rymenhild gave him wine in a drinking horn, and Horn dropped in it the ring that Rymenhild had given him. Rymenhild saw the ring and asked if Horn were dead. Horn replied that he died aboard ship after asking him to tell her of his death. Rymenhild threw herself on her bed and prepared to kill herself with the knife that she had hidden there to kill both Modi and herself that night. Horn wiped the dirt from his face and told her that he was Horn, her true lover. Rymenhild ran to tell Athulf, who jumped for joy. Returning to the wedding party with his Irish warriors, Horn killed King Modi and his followers. After convincing King Aylmar that Fikenhild had slandered him, Horn told the king that he would return to Suddene and regain his kingdom, then marry Rymenhild. Horn recovered his kingdom from the Saracens. He found that his mother was still alive.

While Horn was gone, Fikenhild, through bribery and intimidation of the king, was able to carry off Rymenhild to his castle. Warned of this action in a dream, Horn returned to Westernesse where he heard that Fikenhild had married Rymenhild. Disguised as harpers, Horn and his men gained access to Fikenhild's castle. He killed Fikenhild, hacked him to pieces, and rescued Rymenhild. He made Athelbrus, the good steward, King of Reynes in place of Modi. He took Athulf to Ireland to marry Reynild. Then he took Rymenhild to Suddene and there made her his queen.

THE LABYRINTH OF SOLITUDE

Type of work: Sociological essays Author: Octavio Paz (1914-)
First published: 1950

Widely acknowledged as the greatest poet of contemporary Mexico, Octavio Paz has led a life that in many ways is typical of the Mexican intelligentsia he describes in The Labyrinth of Solitude.

He has published ten books of poetry, fought with the Loyalists in Spain, and served his country as a diplomat. Deeply involved in the future of the Mexican land, he has fitted himself out for defining it to the world by a career that includes the experiences of intense action and intenser contemplation.

The Labyrinth of Solitude was first published in 1950 by Jesús Silva Herzog's famous and influential magazine, Cuadernos Americanos. The version that comes to North Americans through Ly-sander Kemp's translation is based upon a second edition, revised and expanded, published by the Fondo de Cultura Económica in 1959. This book is in effect the result of labors that span a decade, labors that show themselves best in Paz's mastery of his own implications: the labyrinth he describes is the modern world.

Paz begins with an analysis of the phenomenon of the pachucos, those youths of Latin descent who during the 1940's and 1950's alarmed the cities of the Southwest with their "antisocial" behavior, their peculiar dress, and their hostile acts and attitudes. He sees the pachuco as standing between Mexican culture and North American culture, in a Limbo, unable to accept the values of either, equally alienated from both. Moreover, says Paz, the pachuco has, without understanding them, reasons; for both cultures have cut themselves off from the flux of life, have failed in their separate ways to reconcile man and the universe. Unable to partake of communion, both the Mexican and the North American have thus become spiritual orphans, imprisoned in the sterility of solitude. If the Mexican seclusion is similar to stagnant water, Paz says, North America is similar to a mirror. Neither contains life any more.

The forces that confine the North American are summarized in the three sets of laws to which Paz pays at least lip service: the seventeenth century religious code of Calvin, the eighteenth century political code of the Founding Fathers, and the nineteenth century moral code of the American Victorians. Caged by these sets of laws, the North American has let himself become a cipher, handling the universe easily by simply denying any part of it that might conflict with these codes. As a man he lives, therefore, in a wholly artificial world, creating his psychological mothers and fathers out of the delusions of his own Panglossism. The Mexican, on the other hand—and here Paz has the support not only of innumerable Mexican observers but also of an informed outsider like Oscar Lewis—has no such delusions, but sees himself more or less clearly in his orphanhood, without a mother and without a father.

For a Mexican, life is a combat in which his role as an isolated individual can only be defensive. To North Americans with some experience of Mexico, the best image for this role is perhaps one that Paz, as a Mexican, is not in an objective position to suggest: the blindfolded child cautiously rushing in, stick raised but head averted, to smash the Christmas pinata. Concealing himself behind a mask of reserve, the Mexican is in reality blindfolded, violent, fearful, like such a child, as well as trapped in the lie of his own apparent stoicism. His interior turbulence is a torture, while his exterior defensiveness destroys even the possibility of the communion that might bring him happiness. Hence his world is hollow, self-consuming, masochistic, more or less devoid of love, for what love he knows is merely a form of narcissism. Paz says that the Mexican refuses to progress beyond himself, to free himself, to expose himself to the outside world. If North American happiness exists only in neutralizing illusions, Mexican happiness exists only in remotest theory.

Relief comes to a certain extent with the fiesta, a uniquely Mexican plunge into chaos from which the group emerges purified and strengthened, a drunken rapture during which the individual briefly confronts himself. The fiesta, however, cannot wholly offset the lack of communion; it is too impermanent, short-lived, unstable. The Mexican oscillates between intimacy and withdrawal, shouting and silence, fiesta and wake, without ever surrendering himself to anything but himself. Despite fiestas, the Mexican never really transcends his solitude.

Paz sees this solitude in Mexico as largely the result of the Reform movement which, following so many years after Independence, finally disrupted both the Aztec and Colonial traditions. The new Spanish American nations are not new, he claims. Instead, he views them as static or decadent societies, survivals of older, more integrated cultures. Reform was thus an attempt at social reanimation. Its method, however, was based not upon indigenous realities but rather upon abstract and geometrical reasoning imported from Europe. The profoundest effect of the liberal Constitution of 1857 was therefore the creation of a split between the individual Mexican and the native past which had given him birth. He became inevitably, at the moment of that split, the orphan that he remains.

The Revolution that came after Reform one sees as a movement meant to overcome this orphanhood, to reconquer the past, to assimilate it, and to make it live in the present. Paz finds particular significance in the Zapatistas, whose program to reinstitute the ancient systems of land tenure epitomized the Revolution on its ideological side. The Revolution was above all, however, a "fiesta of bullets," the orgiastic celebration of a total Mexico daring at length to be, and to be in communion with herself.

Mexico's success in maintaining this communion after the shooting ceased has been, for various historical reasons, sharply limited. The essential solitude which Paz describes in his earlier chapters still stands, of course, as tragic as ever, with its accompanying problems. These problems are not merely Mexican; they are universal. In his view the crisis of our time is not the opposition of two great and different cultures but an inward struggle of one civilization that, un-rivaled, is shaping the future of the whole world. Each man's fate involves mankind. Thus, Mexicans cannot solve their problems as Mexicans, for they are involved in matters that are universal, not merely national.

The existence of "underdeveloped" countries and of totalitarian "socialist" regimes in the twentieth century Paz regards as equally anomalous, equally scandalous, equally symptomatic of the social chaos that is the outward and visible sign of the labyrinth of solitude. Yet all too often an undeveloped country attempting to emerge from its economic prison becomes merely another victim of totalitarianism. The real cure for chaos and sterility, says Paz, must therefore lie in an outgrowing and a rejection of those false divinities that rule the modern world: endless, infinite work and fixed, finite, chronometric time.

Man today pretends he is always wide-awake when he is thinking, but this is not true; usually man's thinking leads him into the nightmare of reason. After the nightmare is over he may realize that he was dreaming, not wide-awake, and that dreams of reason are unbearable. With this in mind he may then close his eyes to dream once more. The only alternative to the continuing frustration of labyrinthine solitude are suicide or some new kind of creative involvement and participation, the exercise of loving imagination in communion with the rest of the world.

The Labyrinth of Solitude is a wise book. Years spent in Paris have not seduced Octavio Paz into succumbing to the pathetic charms still held out by a waning Existentialism. He avoids the promulgation of a doctrine, achieving instead the kind of essential statement that one should expect from a poet. Not only should the book prove stimulating to anyone who thinks at all about the kind of world we live in and what it does to us; it should also provide perhaps the best gloss yet available on Paz's own work,

His great poem, Piedra de Sol, for example, which one can read in English versions, embodies to near perfection the sort of loving and unsolitary imagination for which, in The Labyrinth of Solitude, he pleads.

NICEPHORUS BOTIANTES, a eunuch, emperor after Michael's abdication and poisoner of Messer Roussel

At a time when the historical romance seemed to be degenerating into thrill-seeking, shoddy journalism, or bedroom farce in costume, Alfred Duggan continued to produce works which are historical novels in the true sense of the word. In his books it is not the very pastness of the past that is important, the nostalgic appeal of the far away and long ago, but the realism of his presentation within the limits of his period. He had the ability to create against the background of the past a world so solidly constructed that his novels make ancient Roman or medieval times as real as the present. His men and women live in violent and picturesque periods, but the writer held them true to the experiences which have been common to mankind in all ages.

Partly his success came from his handling of a special point of view. In Duggan's novels there is no looking backward from our own century toward an earlier time, with all the curiosity or condescension which such a glimpse into the past usually involves. Sensitive to the mood of an age, he refused to let his characters think or feel as they would in a later period. In The Lady for Ransom, for example, there is no suggestion of anything in time beyond the spectacle of the great Byzantine civilization tottering to its fall and of the adventures of some Norman mercenaries involved in border wars between the Eastern Roman Empire and the Seljuk Turks.

The connection between these events and the First Crusade is made plain by the narrator, a monk who had been ordered by his abbot to tell the story of his experiences for the instruction of some young knights preparing to set out for the Holy Land under Count Bohemond's banner. The monk had been born Roger fitzOdo, the son of a Greek mother and a Norman smith, in the days when Norman adventurers were carving out principalities for themselves in Lombardy and Sicily. Orphaned during a rebel raid, he found a patroness in rough-mannered but kind-hearted Lady Matilda, wife of Messer Roussel de Balliol, liegeman to

Roger fitzTancred. Messer Roussel is the same valiant "Ursel de Baliol" of the ancient chronicles, believed by some to be the ancestor of the house of the same name among the claimants for the Scottish crown in the time of Robert Bruce.

Messer Roussel was a soldier who followed his overlord without much thought for the future. His wife was more ambitious. For every adventurer in those times there was the example of Duke William, who had seized a kingdom from Saxon Harold at the Battle of Hastings; surely a knight as brave as Messer Roussel was capable of securing some great fief his sons could inherit. When Romanus Diogenes, the new emperor at Constantinople, offered to enlist Messer Roussel and his three hundred mailed horsemen for an expedition against the Turks, Lady Matilda persuaded him that his acceptance would in no way violate his oath to Roger fitzTancred.

The Normans first took part in a campaign against the Patzinaks north of the Danube and then proceeded to Constantinople. There they were instructed in the mysteries of Eastern Roman politics. Romanus Diogenes ruled only as co-emperor with his stepson Michael. Although the house of Ducas held the Empire, its rival was the great house of Comnenus which the Ducases had supplanted. Two strong parties divided the government, the tax party and the war party. Messer Roussel was not a shrewd man, but he understood well enough that Romanus Diogenes needed to win a great victory in the field if he expected to keep his crown. Romanus hoped to rout the Turkish hordes who had broken through the eastern defenses of the Empire and were laying waste the richest cities and lands in Asia Minor.

The great army numbered one hundred thousand, the greatest force in Christendom, when it met the Seljuk Turks under Sultan Alp Arslan at Manzikert in 1071. The Christians had expected easily to chase the Turks back over the rim of the world, but mounted horsemen in their heavy mail proved no match for the desert tribesmen. By nightfall the host of Romanus Diogenes had been scattered or destroyed, and the emperor had been captured. This battle, one of the decisive events of history, broke the power of the Eastern Roman Empire for once and all. The results would have been even more disastrous if the Turks had followed up their victory, but at the time Alp Arslan was more interested in his war with the Sultan of Egypt than he was in the shattered power of Constantinople.

After the battle Messer Roussel withdrew and occupied the fortified city of Ancyra. There, for a time, he ruled as an independent lord. But when he added Sebaste to his holdings the Emperor Michael became alarmed and sent an army against him. The Normans defeated the Byzantines at the bridge of Zompi. Messer Roussel became involved in political conspiracy once more when he was persuaded to proclaim John Ducas emperor. While the rebel army was camped outside Constantinople, the Turks began to harry the lands he had left undefended, and he was forced to turn back to fight them. Artouch, a Turkish leader, defeated him and took four hundred prisoners at Mount Sophon.

Lady Matilda paid their ransom with the booty of earlier campaigns, but from that time on Messer Roussel was a broken man; and the troops would have disbanded if it had not been for his wife's example. She and Roger fitzOdo led the survivors back to Amasia. There matters went badly for Messer Roussel. Betrayed by the Turks, he was given as a hostage to Alexius Comnenus. He was not blinded, however, as he had expected, but was dealt with humanely in his prison. Emperor Michael and his advisers were prudent enough to foresee a possible use for Messer Roussel's services in the future.

So it turned out. When rebellion broke out in Thrace in 1077, Messer Roussel was released and put in charge of the city's defenses. He marched against the enemy and had occupied Athrya when word reached him that the Emperor Michael had abdicated and that Nicephorus Botiantes ruled in his place. Not knowing what to expect, Messer Roussel withdrew his small force to Selymbria. There the treacherous eunuch, Nicephorus, also a fugitive, poisoned him. Roger fitzOdo says at the end that if Messer Roussel had possessed half his wife's wisdom and resolution, a decent Frankish state might have been founded, thus keeping the Turks from the Bosphorus. Messer Roussel, he says, was indeed a gallant knight, but it takes more than mere courage to rule the East.

Alfred Duggan drew no parallels and pointed no moral. He simply re-created a picture of an age and its people, the violent, brutal, treacherous, yet strangely idealistic world of the Middle Ages, still pagan under its Christian beliefs, ignorant of its directions, cut off from its past. At the same time the human element rings true, sometimes with a sly, pawky humor, as when Lady Matilda advises her husband that it is always best to take an honorable course, especially if one does not lose by it; or when Roger fitzOdo, praises his master as a man who was capable of facing martyrdom even though he was a sinner, for he had been baptized and was never a deserter. Alfred Duggan also stayed close to actual facts. It is true that his story brings together imagination and history, but he wrote for the most part of real people, letting fancy take over only when recorded history supplies no answer to the motives or the plights of his characters in their far-off age of dimming splendor and resurgent barbarism.

LE LAIS

Type of work: Poetry

Author: François Villon (1431-after 1463)

First transcribed: Written at, or shortly after, Christmas 1456; doubtless circulated in manuscript, the Lais (Legacy) was first edited with Villon's other poetry in 1489: Le grand testament Villon et le petit. Son codicille. Le jargon et ses balades, 1489

François Villon's Lais (the "Little Testament" of early editors) is a youthful poem of bequests, ironic, equivocal, made to a very mixed group of acquaintances and enemies, whom the poet singled out for high-spirited mockery, sarcasm, insulting "gauloiserie" and spiteful attack because of their hostility or uncharitableness towards him. Each bequest fits its recipient's position in society, or his weaknesses, or his treatment of the "povre Villon." The difficulties of such a poem, written for the poet and his intimate friends, are obvious. However, it introduces the reader to the Villonesque manner and prepares him for the poet's greater work.

Longnon and Vitu's independent research into the archives and police records of Paris provided a major breakthrough in the understanding of Villon's allusions, and consequently of the poet's tone and manner. Yet we are still far from grasping all the innuendoes of the Lais, nor can we be certain precisely when and why the poem was written. Almost certainly it was written shortly after Villon participated in a robbery of the Collège de Navarre at Christmas, 1456, his first grave, deliberate criminal act. Villon was then twenty-five, a maître-ès-arts of the University thanks to his foster father, the canon Guillaume Villon, had had a profitable career in the church open to him, and knew influential men, such as Robert d'Estouteville, Provost of Paris. Yet he, no victim of society, if not a member of an organized band of criminals, at least chose to associate freely with the riff-raff of town and gown.

The Lais consists of forty eight-line stanzas of supple octosyllabic verse, rhyming alternately. The first eight stanzas tell us, in a parody of the courtly manner of an Alain Chartier or a Charles d'Orleans, that Villon, the "amant martir" of a treacherous mistress, has decided "Sur le Noel" of the year 1456 to escape the dangers of his "amoureuse prison" and leave Paris for Angers. At least in part the reason for his leaving, the girl becomes a butt of ridicule on two levels. To the ironic mockery of the courtly parody, she being no more a "lady" than he an "amant martir," Villon manages to add (Stanza IV) obscenity in a contrasting colloquialism:

Et se j'ay prins en ma faveur
Ces doux regars et beaux semblans
De tres decevante saveur
Me trespassans jusque aux flans,
Bien ilz ont vers moy les piez blans
Et me faillent au grant besoing.
Planter me fault autres complans
Et frapper en ung autre coing.

("And if I interpreted favourably those sweet looks and fair appearances, most deceptive in taste, which pierce me to the quick, I've had no change out of them, and they fail me in my greatest need. I'll have to sew my seed in other plots, go strike my coins in another mould.")

The uncertainty of the journey and of his return lead Villon to the formal establishment of the bequests, which take up the next twenty-six stanzas. Thirty-one individuals appear in the will: Guillaume Villon, the cruel mistress, representatives, high and low of the Parlement, the Law and the Châtelet prison, the Church, the nobility, the merchant and professional classes, the world of finance. Seven bequests are made to groups such as the sergeants of the guard, the Mendicants, the Filles Dieu, Beguines, Carmes, the hospitals.

In Line 51, Villon speaks of his "povre sens"; in Line 316, he describes himself in self-denigrating terms: "Qui ne men-jue figue ne date/Sec et noir comme escouvillon" ("who eats no figs nor dates,/Dry and black as a flue-brush"). This sense of poverty, physical and spiritual, a major theme of Villon's masterpiece, the Testament, here, incipient, muted in the high-spirited Lais, gives significance to the order of bequests. Following Guillaume and Villon's mistress, the next six victims are all rich men. They are never far from his thoughts, reappearing in Stanzas XXV to XXIX and at the end of the poem, Stanzas XXIII to XXXIV.

Villon's is a mercurial, though penetrating, mind whose thoughts follow one upon another in a kind of free association of ideas. Within Stanza XII, for example, his thoughts pass from Saint-Amant, a rich financier, to the Carmelites, hated order of Mendicants, quite possibly because Saint-Amant's wife "Me mist ou renc de cayement" treated him as a "mendicant," a beggar. One can speak of the unity of the Lais, but it is one of spite, psychological rather than logical.

A discussion of each bequest being inappropriate in brief space, a number of random examples must suffice to illustrate Villon's poetic manner. The irony of antiphrasis is at the very heart of his style. His last words on his mistress were "Mais Dieu luy en face mercy!" ("May God be merciful to her!"), The celebrated "trois petis enfans tous nus" ("three little naked children"), Stanzas XXV, XXVI, object of the Romantics' pity, were three of the wealthiest men in Paris. Villon similarly mocks Guillaume Cotin and Thibault de Victry:

Deux povres clers, parlans latin,
Paisibles enfans, sans estry,
Humbles, bien chantans au lectry;
Je leur laisse cens recevoir
Sur la maison Guillot Gueldry,
En attendant de mieulx avoir.

("Two poor priests who know their Latin, peaceful children, never squabbling, humble, fine singers at the lectern; I leave them receipt of revenue from the Guillot Gueldry house, until something better comes along.")

The biographical difficulties of the Lais for the modern reader are well illustrated by this bequest to the two rich, ignorant, quarrelsome, land-owning canons of Notre-Dame: rent from a ruined house whose tenant was bankrupt, until death overtakes them. The reader may refer to the Commentaires et Notes of Louis Thuasne's critical edition of Villon for a two-page discussion of the implications of this stanza.

The irony of giving what he does not have, or even of taking what he cannot hope to be given, appears often in Villon's Lais. Playing at "grand seigneur" in Stanza IX, he gave his foster-father, along with his reputation, "Mes tentes et mon pavillon" ("My tents and my pavilion"). Of his own relatives, quick to disown him, he wrote, bitterly:

On ne doit trop prendre des siens
Ne son amy trop surquerir.

("One ought not to take too much from one's relatives, nor request overmuch of one's friends.") Ambiguity is similarly fundamental to Villon's manner. Although he attacks with mockery, he proceeds with caution, perhaps the caution of an individual who feels himself to be on the periphery of society. We may recall that in January of 1456, on a plea of self-defense, he had obtained two letters of remission for the murder of Sermoise, one under the name "François de Montcorbier" (his name by birth), the other under "François des Loges, autrement dit de Villon." Equivocations, sometimes multiple, are therefore common in the Lais (the title itself is ambiguous, Legacy or Lay). Stanza XXIV contains simple examples:

Item, au Loup et a Cholet
Je laisse a la fois ung canart
Prins sur les murs, comme on souloit,
Envers les fossez, sur le tart,
Et a chascun ung grant tabart
De cordelier jusques aux piez,
Busche, charbon et poix au lart,
Et mes houseaulx sans avantpiez.

(Item, to Loup and to Cholet between them, I leave a duck caught in the usual way (or as we used to catch them), by the walls, over against the ditches, at dusk. And to each a great full-length friar's cloak, wood, charcoal, pork and peas; and my leggings without toe-caps.) In this picturesque thumb-nail sketch of the two poaching ditch-diggers (Villon included?—"comme on souloit") who became sergeants at the Châtelet prison, Villon seems to play on the colloquial expression "donner un canard"—"a gift of that which the giver cannot keep" as Cotgrave defines it in his Dictionnaire of the French and English Tongues. The "tabart" is to be used here to conceal the theft; the "houseaulx sans avantpiez" would be useless to watermen, but also possess an erotic connotation. In connection with Villon's obscenities and "gauloiserie" it might be remembered that he is simply using the language of his time, a language not shunned by contemporary preachers.

The Lais is not rich in imagery. In it Villon is not, as in the Testament, attempting to explain his own misfortune and, by extension, that of others like him. Nevertheless, the image of thirst, which recurs in the Testament and seems to be associated with the poet's misfortune, does appear in the Lais. Villon describes himself as "plus alteré d'umeur" than a "soret de Boulonge" ("More dried up than a Boulogne red herring"); he is "Sec et noir comme escouvillon." Black and white appear in his images but colors do not. For all the allusions to details of Parisian life in the fifteenth century, there are no "tableaux" of the streets and taverns so familiar to the poet. The conscious, elliptical, concentrated nature of Villon's poetry gives rise to its vividness and reflects the poet's way of thought:

Item, je laisse aux hospitaux
Mes chassiz tissus d'arignee,
Et aux gisans soubz les estaux,
Chascun sur l'oeil une grongniee,
Trembler a chiere renfrongniee,

Megres, velus et morfondus,
Chausses courtes, robe rongniee,
Gelez, murdris et enfondus.

("Item, I leave to the hospitals my windows hung with spiders' webs, to those lying under the market stalls, a punch in the eye, (I give them leave) to shiver with pinched faces, lean, tousled, chilled, bare-kneed and in tattered cloak, frozen, bruised, soaked to the bone.")

This stanza illustrates too some of the extremely rich, youthfully exuberant rhymes of the farcical Lais in contrast with the rhymes of the mature, introspective Testament.

The Lais closes with five enigmatic stanzas in which Villon, hearing the evening Angelus rung by the bell of the Sorbonne, stops to pray, falls into a mysterious state of semi-consciousness:

Ce faisant, je m'entroublié,
Non pas par force de vin boire,
Mon esperit comme lié;
Lors je sentis dame Memoire
Reprendre et mettre en son aumoire
Ses especes collaterales, Oppinative faulce et voire,
Et autres intellectuelles,

("So doing, I become confused, not from drinking wine, my mind being seemingly paralysed; then I felt Dame Memory take back and put into her store-house the faculties subject to her: opinative, false and true, and the other faculties of the intellect.")

As this obvious parody of scholastic jargon continues, the poet's reason ceases to function, giving way to the organs of feeling, aroused by the imagination. His will, the "souveraine partie," is kept in a state of suspension, deadened. Such is the recent interpretation of this passage by André Burger. Recovering from this "entroubli" (likened to drunkenness, Line 282; to the madness of a lunatic, Line 294), the poet wishes to return to the bequests, but finds his ink frozen, his candle burned out, and so he goes to sleep, wrapped up against the cold night:

Mais mon ancre trouvé gelé
Et mon cierge trouvé soufflé;
De feu je n'ausse peu finer;
Si m'endormis, tout enmoufflé,
Et ne peux autrement finer.

Burger's thesis is that the "entroubli" refers to the hours of the Collège de Navarre robbery, in which Villon was not an enthusiastic participant. But he needed the money to go to Angers, to René d'Anjou, hopefully as court poet, shaking off his criminal friends. Villon's last words are that he has but "ung peu de billon" left.

Villon's originality lies in the fact of his having written of lived experience, of his having achieved, in the Testament, a universal compassion through attempts to explain his own misfortunes. For all its complexity, the Lais reflects the same kind of lived experience.

THE LAIS OF MARIE DE FRANCE

Type of work: Poetry

Author: Marie de France (fl. late twelfth century)

First transcribed: c. 1175

Critique:

Marie de France composed verse romances in French with some English words around the year 1175. She may have been either French or English, and she may have written at the court of Henry II of England, whose wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine, encouraged writers.

With a light, sure style Marie tells her tales of magic and courtly love, her Breton lais. She gives her name in "The Lay of Gugemar." Here and elsewhere in the poems, she mentions the care with which she chooses her words and her awareness of the excellence of brevity.

Her skill saves her delicate verse romances from the level of the merely sentimental or the sensational. Usually, the heroine is an unfaithful wife faithful to her lover; the hero her lover; the villain the old, jealous husband. To Marie, love is far more spiritual and binding than marriage. To her characters, developed so slightly as hardly to deserve such designation, love is swift, overpowering, and enduring. It is usually adulterous, at best illicit. Her stories are fleet, their endings inexorable. Sometimes, as in "The Lay of Equitan," there is a moral stated. Violence, love's partner, is the dark shadow and part of the substance of the stories.

The Stories:

THE LAY OF GUGEMAR

In the days of King Arthur, Gugemar, a knight who loved no lady, was injured by an arrow with which he had shot a white doe. In human speech, the doe told Gugemar that he would have no relief from his hurt until he found a woman who would suffer as never woman did before and for whom he will suffer as well. Binding his wound with the hem of his shirt, Gugemar boarded an empty ship which he found in the harbor. He fell asleep and awakened in another land where he had been discovered by the queen, a young woman kept as a prisoner by her old lord. The queen took him home, concealed him, healed him; the two become lovers. They lived happily for a year and a half. As tokens of their love, the queen tied a knot in the hem of Gugemar's shirt which only she could untie and Gugemar fastened a girdle about the queen's waist which only he could unbuckle. They pledged that they would never take another love who could not unfasten the knot or buckle.

When the king discovered Gugemar, he allowed him to leave on the ship in the hope that it would wreck. He threw the queen in a tower where she stayed for two years. One day, finding the door unlocked, she went to the harbor and onto the empty vessel which carried her to the shore of a warlike prince, Meriadus, who lodged her with his unmarried sister and tried to win her love. Because he could not loose the buckle, he brought to her a knight who had a mysterious knot tied in his shirt. The knight was Gugemar. After the knot and buckle had been loosed, Gugemar wanted to take the queen away, but Meriadus would not let her go. Gugemar joined forces with Meriadus' enemy. They laid siege to the castle, captured it when its defenders became weak with hunger, burned the fortress, and killed Meriadus. The lovers then departed in triumph.

THE LAY OF THE DOLOROUS KNIGHT

In Nantes in Brittany, a beautiful lady loved by four knights but unable to decide which knight she liked best, sent presents and messages to all. Each carried her favor and cried her name in the lists. During an Easter tournament, three of the knights were slain and the fourth was severely wounded. All four of the knights were brought on their shields to the lady. Distressed, she had the three slain knights buried in an abbey and nursed the wounded knight back to health. Mourning for the three dead knights, she told the fourth knight that she was going to make a lay about their deaths and his terrible wounds and call it "The Lay of the Four Sorrows." The knight suggested that she call it "The Lay of the Dolorous Knight." His three comrades were past suffering, he declared, but he received every day only a few courteous, empty words from the lady but no love. The lady agreed that this was a good title. However, some still call it "The Lay of the Four Sorrows."

THE LAY OF ELIDUC

In Brittany, Eliduc, having lost favor with the king because of false rumors, was forced to leave the country. After he and his wife Guideluec had pledged faithfulness to each other, Eliduc took a ship to Totonois. There he helped an aged king defeat a prince who wanted to marry his daughter. The king gave Eliduc reward and honor, and the princess gave him her love. Although Eliduc reminded himself of his wife at home, he neglected to mention his wife to the princess. His own king, needing his help against an enemy, then sent for him. At home, Eliduc's wife was delighted to see him, but Eliduc was sad. He returned to the country of Totonois and sent word to the princess to meet him. They left secretly on a ship. During a heavy storm, one of the men cried that the princess was the cause of the storm because Eliduc had deserted his own wife at home. When the man desired to throw the princess overboard, Eliduc hit him with an oar and cast him into the sea. The lady fainted when she heard that Eliduc was married, and all believed her to be dead. Going ashore, they carried the princess to a chapel, intending to give her burial rites. Eliduc left her at the altar and went home in such a downcast mood that his wife decided to learn the cause. When she found the princess, she was overcome at the sadness of her death, even though she realized that Eliduc loved the maiden. Then she saw a weasel revive its dead mate by putting a red flower in his mouth. She took the flower, revived the girl, and told her that she would release Eliduc from his marriage vows. She took the princess to her home, released Eliduc, and became an abbess. Eliduc and the princess married and lived happily, but not ever after. For they parted and took holy orders, the princess going to the abbess, who received her as a sister. Eliduc and the princess sent messages between the convent and the monastery, each encouraging the other in the holy life. Their repentance was lasting.

THE LAY OF THE NIGHTINGALE

In the town of Saint Malo, in Brittany, a bachelor knight fell in love with his friend's wife. Although they seldom met, the two at last became lovers. Because their houses stood side by side, they were able to pass messages and gifts through the casements and gaze at each other. When the husband asked the wife why she spent her nights watching at the casement, she said that she was listening to the nightingale. He had servants trap the bird; then he wrung its neck and threw it in her lap. The wife, sad because she could not use the bird as an excuse to see her lover, embroidered the story of the nightingale's fate on white samite, wrapped the bird in the cloth, and sent it to her lover. The doleful knight had a little chest made of gold and precious stones for the body of the bird and carried it everywhere with him.

THE LAY OF SIR LAUNFAL

Because of trouble with the Picts and Scots, King Arthur was lodging at Caerleon-on-Usk in Wales. There, at Pentecost, he bestowed honors and lands on all except Sir Launfal, the son of a king in a distant country, whom he despised. Too proud to ask his lord for his due, Launfal was poor.

Riding unattended in a meadow near a stream, Launfal dismounted because his horse was trembling. He let the horse graze while he tried to sleep. Two beautiful maidens wearing purple mantles appeared and told him that their mistress had summoned him. He found the beautiful maiden lying on a richly covered bed within a silken pavilion with a golden eagle on top. She was dressed in white linen with a mantle of ermine trimmed in purple. When she offered Launfal her love, provided that he tell no one of her existence, he accepted. She gave him rich clothing and a purse that was never empty. Now wealthy, Launfal redeemed the captive, clothed the minstrel, comforted the stranger, and was completely happy. The beautiful maiden appeared whenever he called her.

At a party in the royal orchard, Launfal ignored the queen and thirty of her most beautiful maidens because they looked like kitchen wenches to him. Calling Launfal to her, the queen offered him her love. Launfal refused, saying that he would not betray his lord. Angrily the queen retorted that Launfal despised women. Launfal quickly replied that his love was richer than any there and that the meanest of her maidens excelled the queen in goodness and beauty. The queen fled weeping to her chamber.

When Arthur returned she told him that Launfal had sought her love and that she had refused him. At her refusal, she declared, Launfal had reviled her and said that his love was set on a lady whose meanest wench was fairer than the queen. Arthur swore that he would burn or hang Launfal if he could not deny his boast before his peers.

Because he had revealed her existence, Launfal lost contact with his lady. He wanted to die; instead he was compelled to appear before the court of barons. The barons said that they would look at Launfal's lady and decide if she was more beautiful than the queen. If so, there would be no trial. Because Launfal could not produce her, the barons were about to pass judgment upon him. At that moment, two beautiful maidens followed by two more beautiful maidens appeared and said that their lady was approaching. They were so beautiful that many said the queen had already lost. Soon the lady appeared, riding a white horse and wearing white with a purple mantle. Every man marveled at her beauty and cared no more for mortal women. She said that Launfal never craved the love of the queen but that he spoke hastily. The barons were overcome by her beauty and Arthur suggested that she stay a while at court. She declined and rode with Launfal away forever, perhaps to Avalon.

THE LAY OF THE TWO LOVERS

A king in Normandy had a fair daughter whom he did not wish to give in marriage, and he proclaimed that no one could wed her except that man who carried her to the pinnacle of a great and perilous mountain. Many tried and failed. The girl fell in love with a slender young man and obtained from her aunt a magic potion that would enable him to reach the mountaintop. Armed with this herbal, the youth asked and received the king's permission to carry the girl to the pinnacle. To lighten the load, the maiden fasted for several days and wore only her smock. The youth set out bravely but refused the potion in the presence of the watchers. As he went higher, the maiden urged him to take the potion; but he refused and finally fell dead of exhaustion. Flinging away the flask of potion, the girl died of grief holding her lover in her arms. A search party led by the king found them dead. The king was distraught. They buried the lovers in a marble coffin on the mountain where they died. Wherever the magic potion touched the barren ground, saving herbs sprang up.

THE LAY OF THE WERE-WOLF

At the insistence of his wife, who demanded an explanation of his absence from home three nights a week, Bisclaveret, a baron in Brittany, revealed that he was a were-wolf. He told her that he hid his clothing in a hollow stone near a chapel and that if he were to lose his clothing he could not return to man's shape. The wife, afraid of her husband, sent for a knight who had long loved her unrewarded. She told him that her husband was a were-wolf and asked him to steal her husband's clothing from his hiding place. He did so and married the wife. Bisclaveret seemed lost forever from the world of men.

More than a year later, the king, hunting in the woods, was surprised by a wolf that fawned upon him, and he took the animal home as a pet. Bisclaveret made an admirable pet until his wife's second husband came to court. Bisclaveret sprang for his rival's throat, but the king called him off. When Bisclaveret's wife came to court, he bit off her nose. Although men beat the wolf, they did not kill him, for a wise counselor pointed out that the wolf's malice was directed at only the woman and her husband. Questioned by the king, the woman revealed the truth. He made her return her first husband's clothing, but Bisclaveret ignored the garments. The counselor then suggested putting the wolf and the clothing alone in a room. Bisclaveret returned to his human form. The king, delighted, restored his fief. The wife and her second husband left the country.

THE LAY OF THE ASH TREE

When the wife of a knight in Brittany bore twin sons, the wife of another knight spread the story that two children had two fathers. A year later, the second wife had twin girls. Since she had spread the word about the double paternity, she was afraid to reveal that she had given birth to twins. At first she wanted to kill one. Later a serving maid took the child, wrapped in sanguine silk and with a rich ring tied to her wrist, and left her in an ash tree near a church. She was found and reared by an abbess, who called her Frêne, meaning ash.

When the beautiful Frêne was grown, a knight, Buron, loved her and persuaded her to run away with him to his castle. There they lived happily until the knights of the realm persuaded Buron to put Frêne away and take a wife. At last he agreed to marry another beautiful girl named Coudre, meaning hazel. Although the servants were angry with Buron, Frêne accepted this development with grace and decked her lord's bed with the sanguine silk in which she was found. After the wedding, Coudre's mother brought her daughter to the bridal bed and recognized the silk as that in which she had wrapped her twin daughter when she sent her away. She questioned Frêne, who showed her the ring. The mother obtained her husband's forgiveness and the Archbishop dissolved the marriage. Frêne married her lord and Coudre soon found another husband.

THE LAY OF THE HONEYSUCKLE

King Mark banished his nephew Tristan because he was in love with the queen, Isoude. Tristan went to his native South Wales but before long he returned to Cornwall to be near Isoude. Living in the forest, he sought shelter from friendly peasants. Hearing that King Mark planned to keep high court at Tintagel, Tristan entered a wood through which he knew Isoude would pass. He cut a wand from a hazel tree, peeled it, carved his name on it, and set it in the road where Isoude found it. To her alone it gave the message that Tristan was waiting and the fact that they were like the honeysuckle and the hazel tree, inseparable. She sent her knights aside, entered the wood with her maiden, Brangwaine, found Tristan, and spent a joyful hour with him. She told him that she was trying to reconcile Mark to him. After they parted, Tristan returned to Wales, where he made a new lay, this one.

THE LAY OF EQUITAN

King Equitan, a great but not wise lover, decided to win the love of his seneschal's wife. Although she refused at first, Equitan finally won her and they exchanged rings. When Equitan's people urged him to marry, the wife heard the news and came to him in tears. Equitan assured her that he would never marry unless her husband were to die and he might marry her. This declaration brought a plan quickly to mind. The wife asked Equitan to be bled with her husband at their castle; she would prepare a bath for both and make her husband's so hot that he would die. The king agreed and rode to the chase with the seneschal, after which the surgeon bled them. Beside each bed, the wife placed a bath, her husband's boiling. When the husband delayed his appearance, the wife and Equitan looked tenderly at each other while they sat waiting on the seneschal's bed by the steaming bath. The husband returned, brushed aside the maiden guarding the door, and found his wife and the king in each other's arms. The king, jumping up, sprang in the fatally hot bath. Enraged, the seneschal threw his wife into the same bath. So they both died. The moral of this story is that he who seeks to do evil to another often brings evil down upon his own head.

THE LAY OF MILON

Milon, a famous knight in South Wales, received word from an unknown maiden that she would give him her love. Milon accepted and she bore him a son. Fearing her father, the girl kept the birth secret, and Milon's servants carried the baby to his mother's sister, married to a lord in Northumberland. With the child went letters and his father's signet ring to be given him when he came of age. Then Milon went in search of reward in a foreign country, and the girl was given in marriage to an old lord.

Returning to South Wales, Milon was sad to learn that his love was married, but he was happy to know that they were not far apart. He sent to her a swan with a letter concealed in a feather. She was instructed to answer the letter but keep the bird unfed for three days before she wanted the letter returned. She did as he asked, although she was compelled to wait a month before she could get parchment and ink. The swan then flew home to be fed and delivered her letter. For twenty years the swan served as messenger between the lovers, who never saw each other during that time.

In Northumberland, the son, now grown, was known as the Knight Peerless. His aunt told him of his origin and gave him the signet ring. His fame spread to Brittany, where Milon heard of the unknown young knight and determined to joust with him in order to preserve his own fame. Milon crossed the sea and met the youth in tournament, where the boy unhorsed him. When Milon's helmet was knocked off, his white hair and beard were revealed. The Peerless Knight dismounted and apologized to his elder.

When Milon asked him his name, the boy told his story and showed Milon the ring. Father and son were joyfully united, and the son promised to kill his mother's husband. They set forth for Brittany, but when they landed a messenger met Milon with the happy news that his love's husband was dead. Milon and his son went to the mother, and the youth had the joy of seeing his parents wed.

THE LAY OF YONEC

In Britain, a rich old man married a young beautiful girl whom he guarded for seven years in a castle. One day, in desperation, she cried aloud that old tales telling how a young wife married to an old lord will find a lover cannot be true. In a few minutes, a falcon alighted on her window, entered the room, and turned into a handsome knight. He said that his name was Eudemarec and that he had come at her call. The two immediately became lovers. Because the wife appeared so happy, the husband became suspicious. He pretended to leave and set his older sister to watch. When she learned the secret and told her brother, the husband set sharp blades in the window to kill the hawk. When Eudemarec alighted there next, he received his death wound. He fluttered, bleeding, to his love's bed, told her that he would die, and promised that she would bear a son, Yonec, to avenge both his death and her suffering. The lady followed the hawk out the window and tracked him by the trail of blood until she found him dying in a royal bed. He gave her a ring which he said would cause her husband to leave her alone. He also gave her a sword as a gift to his son. When the proper time came, she was to go with her husband and son to an abbey where they would see a tomb. There she was to tell her son of his father and give him the sword.

These events came to be. At the tomb the wife told Yonec of his father and gave him the sword before she fell dead on Eudemarec's tomb. The son then took the sword and cut off the old man's head.

Because Eudamerec was king of the land,

the people proclaimed Yonec their lord as

THE LAST OF THE WINE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Mary Renault (Mary Challans)

Time: 430-402 B.C.

Locale: Athens and the Aegean Sea

First published: 1956

Principal characters:

ALEXIAS, a young Athenian

MYRON, his father

LYSIS, the intimate friend of Alexias

XENOPHON, a schoolmate and friend of Alexias

SOKRATES, the great philosopher

PLATO, the nickname of Aristokles, a follower of Sokrates

PHAEDO, a disciple of Sokrates

KRITIAS, an orator and politician, one of the Thirty Tyrants

THRASYBULOS, an Athenian patriot

ALKIBIADES, a brilliant but crafty orator and general

The particular triumph of Mary Renault's novel lies in the quiet authority and skill with which she restores the faded colors and blurred details in her picture of Periclean Athens during the decades of the Peloponnesian War. After more than two thousand years it is impossible to know for sure whether she presents the world as Sokrates and Plato and Euripides saw it, but her portrait of a turbulent age is at all times convincing and alive. This effect is no small achievement in itself, for of all periods of the past to which the historical novelist may be drawn, the life of ancient Greece is probably the most difficult to assay and quicken into life for the modern reader.

There is a paradox here. Since almost the whole of Western culture—philosophy, science, literature, art, democracy—is the lengthened shadow of a Greek city state which reached its peak of greatness about five hundred years before Christ, we tend to see ourselves as the direct heirs of Greek life and thought. Actually, our rights are those of discovery, not of direct inheritance, and we exercise them only because Christian Europe found in the remnants of Attic civilization a permanent source of wisdom and art. As

Virginia Woolf pointed out in one of her essays, between us and the Greeks there are sharp differences of language and racial temperament as well as a wide lapse of tradition. We may study Greek but we do not know precisely how the spoken language sounded. There are no speech echoes like those which in English carry us back to Chaucer and beyond, no sense of familiarity with scene that we are able to trace through the lives of our ancestors to a time when they lived in clearings between the black forests and the misty fens. King Arthur and his knights are real to us in a way that Jason's Argonauts and the Seven against Thebes, for example, can never be. To see the Greek world in its true perspective requires a different kind of vision: a view stripped of all romantic associations and rich detail, a way of seeing grounded in that deliberate, detached sense of fact which sets Greek poetry and prose apart from English literary tradition.

Mary Renault has used history, literature, archeology, and anthropology in order to reconstruct her picture of Athenian society and culture in The Last of the Wine. The tense of all fiction is the past, but only the historical novelist makes a virtue of necessity. In this novel the very pastness of the past is the primary condition of an art which aims at a re-creation of the special values of a vanished time and place. But no one can entirely repossess the past, either through scholarship or imagination. One test of the novelist's craftsmanship is the ability to travel backward into earlier periods unburdened by the intellectual baggage of prejudice and hindsight which a later century provides. Miss Renault passes this test admirably; her novel presents no tourist survey inspired by curiosity or colored by modern complacency.

Miss Renault's writing reveals a point of view circumscribed by the mind and spirit of that distant age as it is reflected in the experience of her hero-narrator. This sense of the past is subtle and expert. It does not exist chiefly for pictorial effect, like a scenic backdrop painted to match the costumes of the actors. It is the dimensional plane on which men and women have their being, a stage for the enactment of noble but somber, portentous events.

The story is told by Alexias, a young Athenian of good family. Born in the second year of the war with Sparta, while a plague was ravaging the city and the signs were unpropitious, only the chance absence of his father kept him from being exposed to die at birth. Growing up in a troubled age, he strives for excellence in the Greek sense. Xenophon is his schoolmate and friend. Lysis, who is briefly mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius and who appears also in the episode in which Sokrates questioned two schoolboys on the subject of friendship, is the male lover and comrade in arms whom Alexias accepts according to Greek custom. A pupil under Sokrates, or at least so we would call him today, he mingles with the group that surrounds the great philosopher—Plato, Phaedo, Kriton, and others who figure in the dialogues. Under that guidance he tries to master ethical and philosophical truth. As a soldier he fights in the border forays against Sparta and takes part in the overthrow of the oligarchs of Samos. As an athlete he is a victor in the Isthmian games held at Corinth. As an Athenian citizen he survives the horrors of the Spartan siege and lives to become one of the Men of Phyle and the slayer of Kritias when the rebel army under Thrasybulos destroys at last the Tyranny of the Thirty. Through Alexias we see how the Greek ideals of harmony, proportion, and order were a part of everyday Athenian life, even in that disordered age.

Alexias and his friend Lysis stand in the foreground of this novel, but its true center is Sokrates, that human gadfly of the state who spoke out as the conscience of his city when the Athenians lost their desire for integrity and justice in their lust for wealth and power. "The cause of all these evils was the desire for power which greed and ambition inspire," wrote Thucydides. This was the lesson Sokrates tried to teach by precept and example, and it was for this reason that he was feared by the cowardly and the insolent who sought his downfall. At the end of the novel Sokrates is still alive, but his accusers are beginning to murmur against him; the cup of hemlock he will drink within the year will vindicate his own search for truth and record indelibly the guilt of the citizens who condemned him.

The Last of the Wine has neither the ethical cast of Thornton Wilder's The Woman of Andros nor the archaic simplicity of Robert Graves' Homer's Daughter. A considerably vaster work than either, it is also more varied in its effects. Some of the most significant events—the savage destruction and enslavement of the Melians, for example, the disastrous campaign against Syracuse, the annihilation of the Athenian fleet at Aegospotami, and the death of Alkibiades in Phrygia—occur off-stage and are reported by a messenger, here an appropriately effective device because it was used for the same reason by the Greek dramatists. The novel shows all that was good and noble in Athenian civilization, but the writer treats with equal candor those elements which were weak and base. She makes no apologies, points no moral, and to do so would be to subject to special pleading her effort to present the whole spectacle of life in that great and tragically violent age. In this connection, particular mention should be made of the accepted convention of male love, a subject the writer treats with honesty and good taste, for the light it throws upon the idealized (according to the Greek idea) rather than the sentimentalized relationship between Alexias and his friend

Lysis, and also upon the Greek concept of marriage.

This book is clearly the result of sound scholarship and a disciplined imagination, qualities which make it an outstanding historical novel. With it Mary Renault took her place beside Sigrid Undset, Zoé Oldenbourg, and Marguerite Yourcenar, women who have reclaimed historical fiction from the levels of melodramatic journalism and costume romance to make it once more a significant work of art.

LAUGHTER

Type of work: Philosophical essay
Author: Henri Bergson (1859-1941)
First published: 1900

Laughter (La Rire), Henri Bergson's profound essay on the nature and source of laughter, grows out of his concern with nineteenth century mechanization of life. For Bergson life is ever in change through time and complex in spatial terms, and any divergence from these principles, any attempt to materialize life, which is, for him, instinctive and flexible, removed from the living the very origin of life. Bergson's famous principle of élan vital, the vital life force that underlies all living things, leads to the central motif of his theory of comedy, that "the mechanical encrusted upon the living" promotes laughter. Any time a living thing takes on attributes of death or mechanization or rigid automatism, it ceases to be wholly alive and inspires social laughter. And comedy in Bergson's view is a social gesture designed to promote organic health in the social body. Laughter, by ridiculing social outsiders, effects in the individual at whom we laugh a desire to purge himself of unsocial traits. Comedy attempts to return to life those half-alive people on society's fringes whose failure to adapt themselves impairs social well-being.

Bergson opens Chapter One, a general discussion of comedy, with three fundamental observations on the nature of the comic spirit: "the comic does not exist outside the pale of what is strictly human"; an "absence of feeling . . . usually accompanies laughter"; and laughter's "natural environment . . . is society," its function is social: it "must have social signification." We only laugh, Bergson asserts, at things which in some way man has stamped his. We do not laugh at landscapes, for instance, but at humans or animals in which we see human elements. Nor can we laugh at things without putting aside temporarily our emotions. We may laugh at one we pity, but our pity must first be silenced. Emotion stifles laughter; intellect kindles the comic. Viewing life disinterestedly, can disengage our emotions, permitting life to impress us as comic. Finally, laughter occurs in company with others; one does not often laugh in isolation.

A man who stumbles and falls as he runs along the street becomes an object of our laughter because of his "rigidity" or "momentum," his clumsiness, or as Bergson terms it, "lack of elasticity through absentmindedness and a kind of physical obstinancy." This involuntary comic movement caused by mechanical inelasticity is a failure to adapt oneself to circumstance, an inability to be flexible and responsive to change. It may be external, as when a person fails to notice his chair being pulled away from behind, or internal, as with the absent-minded individual whose mind is so engaged that he cannot function in the present because his mind is geared to the past. In either case, the more natural the cause of inelasticity the more comic the effect will be. In the instance of Don Quixote, whose absent-mindedness is largely due to his belief in an imaginary world, we have the whimsical madman with a systematic absent-mindedness "organized around one central idea." It is therefore doubly comic when he falls into a well while gazing at a star.

Vice may so affect a comic character that the rigidity of a fixed idea of, for example, avarice or jealousy infects his personality to the extent that he becomes, as it were, avarice or jealousy. The vice exists independently of the person, who becomes an automaton, and the character is comic "in proportion to his ignorance of himself." Awareness of others' laughter corrects our manners, making us try to appear less ridiculous, but self-correction cannot occur while ignorance of one's absurdity remains.

Because laughter has a social function and results from one's inelasticity or rigidity, society imposes on its members the necessity to adapt to circumstance. Life offers two forces, tension and elasticity, which enable man to avoid mere routine or habitual adjustment to life and to encourage a constant effort toward "reciprocal adaptation." Society fears eccentricity, which presupposes a separatist tendency in the individual, and endeavors to harmonize individual wills with one another. No cut-and-dried harmony may exist, however, since society demands a continual readjustment of wills. Society therefore must restrain the slumbering individual, who respects the group but lets his adjustment drift into dead conformity, as well as the eccentric, who gravitates toward non-societal values. Because laughter is the social gesture by which society imposes its lessons upon the eccentric or the conformist, laughter satisfies both aesthetic and utilitarian aims.

Having outlined this formula for the comic spirit, Bergson then proceeds to detail the sequence of comic forms, from a clown's horseplay to the most refined effects of comedy. The comic element resident in forms derives from the opposition of soul, supple and in perpetual motion, to matter, inertly resistant to movement; when matter or body succeeds, for example, in stereotyping fleeting glances of the face, it petrifies the "outward life of the soul" in some material, "mechanical operation" and achieves a comic effect.

It is this admixture of the human and the mechanical which accounts for the comic element of gesture and movement. As the "attitudes, gestures and movements of the human body" remind us of a machine they are proportionately laughable. Whenever mechanism appears in the human body, as in the gestures of a public speaker, the repetition elicits the comic response. When attention focuses on form instead of matter, on body instead of soul, comic response must occur.

In Chapter Two Bergson turns to the comic element in situations and in words. He again finds the comic residing in the dualism of the mechanical and the human: whenever acts or events give us, in a single combination, the "illusion of life and the distinct impression of a mechanical arrangement," comedy results. The ultimate formulae for the archetypes of the comic state are repetition, inversion, and reciprocal interference of series. Repetition reflects a mathematical or symmetrical ordering of life. Inversion is simply the reversal of roles, as when a prisoner lectures the judge. Reciprocal interference describes a situation, belonging simultaneously to different series of events, yet capable of two entirely different interpretations. The laughter of words also falls under these three headings; whenever the living quality, the suppleness, of language is contrasted to the rigid mechanism of language, laughter searches out this automatism and corrects it.

Chapter Three examines the comic element of character. Bergson asserts that laughter has a real social meaning, expresses a special lack of adaptation to society, and cannot exist apart from man. A character who removes himself from society is fundamentally comic; he illustrates the very basis of comedy which begins with a "growing callousness to social life." But comedy does not necessarily direct itself at moral faults; rather it usually aims to correct social aloofness.

Bergson places comedy midway between life and art. Art expresses true reality. Society constructs its values on the superficial perceptions of ordinary men, but art deals with the deeper realities. Comedy, because it accepts a social, utilitarian goal—correction of the social outsider—lies close to life; yet because it also aims to please, comedy belongs to art.

Comedy differs from tragedy in that the latter seeks the individual, the unique, while comedy presents the general, the type. Comedy depicts general characters, universals of humanity, categorizing men by the surface distinctions man makes in his everyday life. The comic poet observes inductively, surveys man for external, general eccentricities, never endeavoring to portray causes of social alienation for fear of engaging our emotions, hence endangering the comic element. Comedy tries to isolate the ready-made facet of character, the mechanical, and creates types. Tragedy plumbs the depths of the individual, gives an impression of life, and develops out of the poet's psychological observations. The tragic poet's characters are in a sense extensions of his own personality.

Comedy therefore is not disinterested as genuine art is. Comedy accepts social life as a natural environment; it even obeys an impulse of social life. In this respect it rejects art, which is a reaction against society and a return to nature.

THE LAY OF IGOR'S CAMPAIGN

Type of work: Poem

Author: Unknown

Time: Late twelfth century

Locale: The steppes of Russia

First published: 1800

Principal characters:

IGOR, Prince of Novgorod-Seversk

PRINCE VSEVOLOD, his brother

PRINCE VLADIMIR, his son

PRINCE SVATOSLAV, his nephew

THE GREAT PRINCE of Kiev

The Lay of Igor's Campaign, a heroic romance written about 1187, is the earliest great work of Russian literature. Moreover, it is the only surviving heroic poem of the Russian Middle Ages and it is the only piece of artistically great literature known to have appeared in Russia before the nineteenth century. The poem, of which the author is unknown, is admired by most educated Russians both for its place in the Russian tradition and its literary excellence. Although it is relatively unknown outside of Russia, it has been widely translated.

The subject matter of The Lay of Igor's Campaign is typically medieval: the expedition, defeat, capture, and escape of a knightly warrior—Prince Igor of Novgorod-Seversk (not to be confused with Novgorod the great, a much more famous and important city of old Kievan Russia). Igor's antagonists were the Kumans, a race of pagan nomads who inhabited the southern steppes around the Don River. Three other princes and their troops accompanied Igor's contingent: Igor's brother, Prince Vsevolod; Igor's son, Prince Vladimir; and Igor's nephew, Prince Svatoslav. However, while it is an early work, and while it did not appear in a culture notable for its literary and artistic achievements, and while it is ostensibly a heroic tale of warriors and battle, the poem is far from being a primitive and unsophisticated work. Like the other medieval national epics to which it is sometimes compared, such as The Song of Roland and The Song of My Cid, the poem is the product of a very skillful artist whose insight and poetic skill is of the highest order. In fact, the art of this Russian poem strikes one as being in some respects more subtle than that of either the French or the Spanish poem; it has been said with some justice that the sophisticated, symbolic technique of the lay has a striking kinship with contemporary poetic techniques.

The history of the poem is somewhat obscure. While it was probably written about 1187, memory of it was soon lost and it remained unknown until 1795 when Count Alexei Wanovich Musin-Pushkin, a distinguished literary amateur, discovered a manuscript copy of the poem. He purchased what was probably a sixteenth century codex from an ex-official of a recently dissolved monastery. The codex had been in the monastery library. The Lay of Igor's Campaign was one of several manuscript items included in it. The text was published in 1800, but little was known at that time about interpreting and editing early Russian texts and the edition was marred by errors and misinterpretations. Moreover, the sixteenth century scribe who had copied the text into the codex was himself unfamiliar with the twelfth century Russian language, and thus the manuscript itself was far from accurate. Before a second edition of the poem could be prepared for the printer, the manuscript was burned when Napoleon burned Moscow in 1812. Modern scholars have succeeded in repairing much of the damage of time, but nevertheless certain brief passages in the poem remain obscure. It should be noted also that it was for a time assumed by some that the story of the discovery of the poem in 1795 was a hoax and that the poem was a modern forgery. However, a portion of the poem has been found quoted verbatim in a manuscript made in 1307, and thus we know that the poem is genuine.

The unknown author of the lay composed his masterpiece late in the twelfth century, about one or two years after the events of which he speaks had actually occurred. This date can be determined by certain matters that are mentioned in the text. It is known that the characters and the events of the narrative are historical, for the story can be checked in certain surviving medieval chronicles. So far as we can determine from the poem, the author was a layman, very likely a soldier, who was the companion of some prince of Kievan Russia, perhaps of Igor himself. The poet was a city dweller but was familiar with the life of the steppes. He was also familiar with the literature and oral traditions, such as they were, of his times. We can tell from references in the text that there was a tradition of heroic oral poetry in the generations before the author of The Lay of Igor's Campaign wrote. The author refers to and quotes one of those older poets, one "Bayan the Bard."

However, the poem was not written by a professional singer to be sung, as was, for example, the French Song of Roland. That is, although the author did not hesitate to use the techniques of oral poetry to achieve many of his poetic effects, the lay is a purely literary work written to be read. The spirit of the poem, it should be noted is secular, heroic, and, crucially, patriotic; Russia as much as Igor is the hero of the piece. While the poem is nominally a Christian work, Christianity is only an incidental element in it. The older pagan nature worship of pre-Christian Russia has a much more integral place in the imagery and the tone of the poem.

Thus far we have called this a heroic poem, but in fact it is not a heroic tale per se. It is really quite difficult to classify. For while a heroic narrative is the foundation of the piece, much of it is a lyric lament for the feudal discord that characterized the poet's age; moreover, much of the time the object of the author seems to be to write a vigorous admonition to the princes responsible for the feuds and troubles of Kievan Russia, and to that extent the lay is an inspired piece of political oratory. At last we must conclude that the work is a blend of the narrative, the lyric, and the hortatory. Further, it is not a poem in the strict sense, but a prose poem in a uniquely Russian sense. The rhythm of the language is not the rhythm of verse, and the work is not composed in lines, but in the rhythmical prose typical of the old Russian liturgy; which, while it was sung, as The Lay of Igor's Campaign was not composed in verse. Nevertheless, it is emphatically poetic in its complex and vivid use of imagery, metaphor, and simile; and the total effect of the work can only be described as powerfully poetic.

Structurally, the poem falls into eight sections: (1) the poet's prologue in which the author comments on the literary usage of the past and the departures he will make to achieve his own literary ends; (2) the determination of Igor and his brother to make their expedition; (3) the advance across the steppes and Igor's initial success; (4) the defeat and capture of the Russian forces. At this point the scope of the poem expands dramatically. The poet begins to dramatize the meaning of Igor's defeat to the Russian people as (5) he begins a lyrical-oratorical digression first in his own voice and then in the voice of the Great Prince of Kiev. The prince, not yet aware of the disaster of Igor, has had a prophetic and symbolic dream of ill omen. Next (6), the poet apostrophizes nine other princes, asking them to end their quarrels and to join together to save Igor and Russia. This section is followed by (7) a lyric lament by Igor's wife on the walls of her city. The poem ends with (8) a brief account of Igor's escape from the Kumans and a closing apostrophe by the poet.

This architectonic structure is supported and interpenetrated by an equally important poetic structure of symbol and imagery based primarily on nature: the sun, light and darkness, the land, the rivers, plants, winds, and the ancient nature gods. The men of the poem, their actions, their emotions, and the political, military, and social forces in the world of the poem, are all perceived and expressed in terms of this nature imagery and symbolism. In the end, the picture that The Lay of Igor's Campaign presents is one of a totally integrated world in which there is no distinct line of separation between the world of men and the world of dynamic nature. For example, the expedition begins amidst ominous eclipses of the sun—the light-darkness idea is complicated throughout the narrative until at the end Igor escapes his captors under cover of darkness. Also, at the sight of Igor's defeat, the trees bow down in grief. Throughout the poem the foreboding and anxious voices of nature can be heard moving in the wind and the rivers; and as Igor escapes he holds a thankful dialogue with the pro-Russian river Donets while he sneeringly mocks the anti-Russian river Stugna. This interpenetrating structure of image, symbol, and action is too complex to more than hint at here. Nevertheless, for all its complexity of parts, when the lay is seen as a whole, it has, as do all great works of art, an overall simplicity and power that no serious reader can miss.

THE LEOPARD

Type of work: Novel

Author: Giuseppe di Lampedusa (1896-1957)

Time: 1860-1910

Locale: Sicily

First published: 1958

Principal characters:

DON FABRIZIO CORBERA, Prince of Salina

TANCREDI FALCONERI, his nephew and ward, an opportunist

PRINCESS MARIA STELLA, Don Fabrizio's wife

PAOLO,

FRANCESCO PAOLO,

CAROLINA,

CONCETTA, and

CATERINA, five of their seven children

DON CALOGERO SEDÀRA, a provincial mayor

ANGELICA, his daughter, wooed by Tancredi

COUNT CARLO CAVRIAGHI, Concetta's suitor

FATHER PIRRONE, chaplain in the Salina household

THE CAVALIERE AIMONE CHEVALLEY DI MONTERZUOLO, a Piedmontese politician

Giuseppe Tomasi, Duke of Palma, Prince of Lampedusa, was a Sicilian aristocrat born in 1896. He traveled widely but spent most of his days in his slightly dilapidated palace in Palermo, Sicily. He was a man of great culture and fine manners who had never published anything, but who had for many years thought of writing a book that would combine his own experiences with the biographies of his father and grandfather and with the historical events that had affected his family. At the age of sixty he began The Leopard and was able to complete it a year before his death in 1957. The manuscript was read by Giorgio Bassani, an editor for the firm of Giangiacomo Feltrinelli, and he was so impressed by it that he could not believe it the work of an unknown writer. The novel was published in Milan in 1958. In English translation it is somewhat mistitled, for a gattopardo, as the book was titled in Italian, is not a leopard but a serval, a species of tawny, black-spotted wildcat.

The Leopard became an overnight popular success, but its critical reception was not, in Italy at least, an unqualified triumph. When it was nominated for the Strega Award, the most important Italian literary prize, Alberto Moravia is supposed to have declared that a vote for Il Gattopardo was a vote against the modern Italian novel. It is not difficult to understand his attitude. Turning its back on the thematic and stylistic concerns to which most Italian writers have devoted their efforts since the end of World War II, The Leopard is a serenely solid, richly detailed, and strangely old-fashioned work bringing together various strands in the great European tradition of the novel: Stendhal, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Proust. Surprisingly, the work found a champion in Ignazio Silone and went on to win the award amid popular acclaim. In France and Germany it was hailed as a masterpiece and a literary miracle.

The novel opens in the year 1860, when the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies is being invaded by Garibaldi's red-shirted volunteers. In Sicily, a land reduced to political apathy by centuries of conquest and foreign rule, Don Fabrizio, Prince of the ancient feudal House of Salina, waits to see whether Garibaldi is only another upstart adventurer or a patriot dedicated to the unification of Italy under il galantuomo, Victor Emmanuel, the Piedmontese king. A tawny-haired man of passive disposition, great physical energy in the hunting field, strong sensual appetites, and some reputation as an amateur astronomer, the prince dominates the novel in the same way he rules his family and with unconscious arrogance lords it over the peasants on his estates. Although his allegiance is to King Francis II, his common sense tells him that the Bourbon regime in Naples is tottering and soon to fall. At the same time he is too shrewd and worldly-wise to expect that the Risorgimento will greatly transform a way of life that had been molded by Byzantine tax collectors, Berber emirs, Spanish viceroys, the Church, and the Bourbons. Faced with the necessity of choosing a side, he hesitates and in the end does nothing. For him, while all Italy is being shaken, life goes on very much as before. He ignores his pious wife, dislikes his heir, keeps a mistress close at hand for his body's needs and a browbeaten chaplain for his soul's salvation, and watches the stars.

The only person for whom he has any real affection is his penniless, scapegrace nephew Tancredi, Prince of Falconeri, in whom he finds a reflection of his own restless youth. Ironically, his fondness for the boy turns out to be his salvation. When Tancredi goes off to join Garibaldi in the hills, Don Fabrizio gives him a roll of gold pieces. This act, a gesture of love and family feeling, has political consequences. When the Garibaldists triumph, Don Fabrizio finds himself regarded as a supporter of the cause.

As for Tancredi, he bobs like a cork on the wave of the future. His philosophy, as he explains it to his uncle, is simple. He says that if they were not with the cause, the rebels would form a republic, and if they did not want change, then the rebels would make changes. He fights with Garibaldi in the hills, takes a commission in the Piedmontese army before Garibaldi and his ragged followers are defeated by il galantuomo's troops at Aspromonti, and to recoup his family fortunes courts and marries the beautiful daughter of a rich, vulgar provincial upstart.

Don Fabrizio also meets the future. The first time is in the person of Don Calogero Sedàra, the mayor of Donnafugata, who in the time of the Risorgimento bought, traded, and sold so shrewdly that before long his revenues almost match those of the Salina estates. The second occasion is the time of the plebiscite for unification. Don Fabrizio, knowing that there can be no return to the old ways, advises those who ask his opinion to vote Yes. Secretly, he knows that a number have voted against unification, but when the votes are counted in Donnafugata the return stands: Voters, 515; Voted, 512; Yes, 512; No, none. The wily mayor has stuffed the ballot box. The third time is in the person of Don Calogero once more when Don Fabrizio must eat his pride—the Italian phrase is “swallowing a toad”—as he goes to the town hall to ask the mayor formally for the hand of his daughter Angelica in the name of his nephew, Tancredi Falconeri. The scene is filled with wry comedy. In earlier times the Salinas had exercised a droit de seigneur over handsome girls like Angelica; in the new Italy spendthrift young noblemen would marry them. He is made no happier by the knowledge that his daughter Concetta also loves Tancredi and has now lost him to the daughter of a grasping, ambitious peasant father and a mother who had once tended pigs.

When the Cavaliere Aimone Chevalley di Monterzuolo asks Don Fabrizio to accept a post as senator in the new kingdom, the prince, being what he is, feels this to be no particular honor and pretends not to understand what being a senator means: Is it a title of honor? A decoration? Chevalley is sincerely disturbed, and so the prince undertakes to explain his attitude, the one occasion in the book when Don Fabrizio speaks openly and bitterly about the history of Sicily and the character of Sicilians, who never want to improve because they think themselves already perfect, whose vanity is greater than their misery. He explains that he is caught between the old world and the new and feels ill at ease in both. Further, he is without illusions and lacks the talent for self-deception, a necessary quality for guiding others. He is unable to blend personal interest with vague public aims and ideals. This speech, nearly nine pages long, is the only impassioned speech in the book and a clear statement of the prince's position. Don Fabrizio ends this remarkable discourse on time, mutability, and knowledge of tragic destiny enclosed in the ambiguities of the past by suggesting that Don Calogero Sedàra, a man for the future, be named to the new Senate.

The Leopard is less a historical novel than a story of time's ravages and erosions in a period of historical change, its feeling all the more compassionate and revealing because Lampedusa was writing about his own family. Like Proust's Remembrance of Things Past or Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard, the book becomes a haunting study in social decay. Two afterpieces round out the picture. In the first, dated 1888, Don Fabrizio dies, the survivor of a way of life that was feudal, despotic, but in many ways fruitful and good; he has lived to see the new class of money and bourgeois power exercising its authority with brutal realism. The other is dated 1910. Tancredi is dead and Angelica is now a dashing widow. Don Fabrizio's spinster daughters, Caroline, Concetta, and Caterina, live in pious seclusion amid religious relics and souvenirs of the past. Concetta realizes too late how she had lost Tancredi to Angelica because of her own pride and folly, how futile was the love which had caused her to reject Tancredi's friend, Count Carlo Cavriaghi, when he came wooing. Her final gesture is to throw out on a rubbish heap the moth-eaten pelt of Bendicò, her father's favorite dog. As it falls from the open window into the courtyard it assumes in the air for a moment the appearance of a dancing quadruped with long whiskers and one foreleg seemingly raised in imprecation—a ghastly travesty on the crest of the Salinas.

So traditional is the structure of this massive and evocative novel that only in retrospect does the reader see how deftly Lampedusa has employed symbols to convey his subtle meanings. None stands out more vividly than the partly dilapidated palace of the Salinas at Donnafugata, where in a season of sultry heat Tancredi and Angelica carry on their courtship during tours through empty rooms and deserted corridors musty with the smell of decay. Their rambles are more than a search for the strange and unknown by two young people in love; they are pursuing illusions. Time makes them tenants of an empty house, a symbolic mansion as doomed as any in William Faulkner's legend of the South.

If The Leopard, a moving and deeply resonant novel in effect, presents a moral, it is this: the true vanity of human wishes is man's attempt to direct the course of history or to shape his own destiny. Convincing in its characters, absorbing in its story, The Leopard is a book of deep insights and philosophical implications. As a recapture of things past, it goes beyond the dimensions of historical fiction to comment memorably on much that is universal and unchanging in the condition of mankind.

LEOPARDS AND LILIES

Type of work: Novel

Author: Alfred Duggan (1903-)

Time: The first half of the thirteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1954

Principal characters:

MARGARET FITZGEROLD

WARIN FITZGEROLD, her father, chamberlain to King John

BALDWIN DE REDVERS, her first husband

COUNT WILLIAM DE REDVERS, his father

YOUNG BALDWIN, Margaret's son by her first marriage

FALKES DE BREALTE, her second husband, captain of King John's crossbows

HUBERT DE BURGH, one of King John's counsellors, later Falkes' enemy

JOHN, King of England

HENRY III, King of England

The title, Leopards and Lilies, somewhat enigmatic as it is, offers a challenge to the reader. Actually, there is nothing mysterious about the title. One who remembers some of the lesser details of the history of the Middle Ages may recall the fact that in the period during which rebel barons forced King John of England to grant them the Magna Carta the leopard was the symbol of the House of Anjou, the side of John and his loyal supporters, while the lilies were the symbol of the rebels who received aid from the Dauphin of France. It is against the background of that confused struggle between rebels and loyalists in the years following the granting of the Great Charter in 1215 that this novel is laid.

The story, always absorbing, depicts the life of a young woman whose adventures begin when her father, a nobleman, marries her out of hand to the scion of the Count of Devon, to give some measure of safety to the girl in the troublous times of civil war. The girl, Margaret fitz-Gerold, is the daughter of Warin fitz-Gerold, chamberlain to the king. Lord Warin cannot take the girl to the court with him, for fear her chastity may be molested by the courtiers or by the king himself. Margaret, although less than fourteen years old, is calm and serene about marriage, being a child of her times; the thought of marriage means to her castles, servants, and overlordship, rather than the young lad, barely her senior, to whom she will be wed.

Margaret's career is a strange one, bound to the events of her age and inextricably tangled with the affairs of the nobility in a period when England was frequently a patchwork hastily thrown together politically as the fortunes of the rebel barons and their loyalist opponents ebbed and flowed across the island. Her first marriage to Baldwin de Redvers is somewhat less than satisfactory to Margaret, inasmuch as her husband is a mere child and Count William, her widowed father-in-law, hoping in that way to keep his fiefs and treasures intact and his position secure, tries only to be self-effacing in the struggle between the king and the rebels.

Although the ruler of a large medieval household for Count William, Margaret soon becomes bored with the isolated life at Plympton Castle. Her only real satisfaction is a pregnancy that results in the birth of a male heir to carry on the Redvers line for Count William. By presenting her husband and his father with a male heir, Margaret has, by the standards of her class and times, made herself a place in the world. Even so, young Margaret, ambitious and restless, felt boredom, knowing that other ladies of her station were busy defending castles, ransoming captive husbands, and riding with the armies, while she remained burdened with her pregnancy and then her child.

The calculating quality in Margaret is swiftly brought to light at the death of her husband barely a year following her marriage. The shrewd fourteen-year-old matron, anxious to preserve her place in the world as the mistress of vast fiefs, persuades her father-in-law to let her and the child seek refuge with the rebel barons in London, while Count William remains at Plympton to hold the castle for the king. Thus, no matter who wins the struggle, loyalists or rebels, the Redvers have a foot in the winning camp. Margaret hopes that she will have a chance to experience the glitter and gaiety of the court in London, where the Dauphin of France is supporting the rebels.

By the fortunes of war Margaret soon finds herself a prisoner of King John, who, as suzerain of her lands, has the disposal of her hand in marriage. As calmly as before, Margaret accepts a husband, a Norman knight named Falkes de Brealte, raised out of obscurity by the king. Disdaining her second husband's ancestry, disliking him, Margaret still does as she is bid. With the shrewdness of a child and a woman, she plans to have her marriage annulled if the rebels win. The king's victory leaves her married to an influential baron.

After eight years Margaret's second husband falls into disfavor and himself rebels against the boy king who is John's successor. When Bedford castle's defense is overthrown and her husband is deprived of his holdings and sentenced to banishment, Margaret, still scheming, shows her disloyalty by pleading that her marriage to Falkes was made under duress. But Margaret overreaches herself. Her disloyalty to a husband, even to one beneath her station, causes her to become a social outcast in medieval society. Her husband, to her dismay, appeals to the Pope for redress, and receives it.

Many aspects of thirteenth century life in England are presented in the novel: political, military, religious, and cultural. Their appearance does not mean, however, that the reader should look for a definitive account of these aspects of medieval life. The background is always present, playing its part in the action, but the realistic detail is given only insofar as it contributes to the story, for Duggan, in the tradition of the historical romance, is first and foremost a storyteller, the twentieth-century parallel of the trouvères who entertain the gentlefolk in the novel.

At first the political background to the story may seem to lack clarity. Three reasons may be offered in explanation. In the first place, the author took it for granted that the reader has some notion of the events surrounding the history of the Magna Carta, either from schooldays or, perhaps, familiarity with Shakespeare's King John. In the second place, the fluid political situation, in which medieval barons frequently changed sides, cannot easily be described. Lastly, the political situation is not the center of interest in the novel; it is simply a backdrop and partial motivation for the characters. Duggan used the medieval struggles much as Cooper used the Anglo-French conflicts in America during the eighteenth century in The Deerslayer and The Pathfinder.

As far as the military aspects of medieval life are concerned, there is a great amount of detail. The code of chivalry peculiar to the age and time, the place of knight and mercenary, and the anomalous position of the knight raised from the ranks are all made clear through the participation in the action by representatives of each group. Details of a siege are presented from the viewpoint of the besieged. Of especial interest is the surprise of the defenders when confronted with the results of a trebuchet used to batter down their defenses. Their surprise is comparable to the advent of new weapons and the effect on twentieth century people of atomic warfare.

Through every aspect of thirteenth century life the influence of the Church is made manifest in Leopards and Lilies. Agents of the Church are prominent; lesser figures, such as bishops, monks, and chaplains, are constantly in view, as they were in the medieval world. The Church's influence is felt by the characters, even to the king's granting time for absolution to condemned mercenaries lest their souls be lost, even though their lives were forfeit.

More difficult to assess than the political, military, and religious aspects of medieval life is the attention given by the author to cultural matters. Again the reader must be aware that details are not given for their own sake. They are written into the novel when they help explain action, characterization, and background. Yet many items about the routine of women, sources of water and food, table manners, dress, sleeping quarters, falconry, and hunting, are presented.

But it was in his characterizations that Alfred Duggan succeeded most admirably. His people are not twentieth century characters masquerading in the costumes of the thirteenth century against a background of museum bric-a-brac. The characters are all believable medieval folk. The bishops, the knights, the soldiers, the servants, and the rest, including the heroine Margaret, carry an air of authenticity. One can believe that they are thinking, speaking, and acting as people really did. In short, Alfred Duggan wrote a historical romance in the best tradition, and he re-created an entertaining, vivid part of the past in a manner both believable and intelligible to the modern reader.

LET US NOW PRAISE FAMOUS MEN

Type of work: A written and photographic documentary on the Southern cotton tenant farmers

Author: James Agee (1909-1955); Walker Evans (1903-), photographer

First published: 1941

In 1936 James Agee, a writer, and Walker Evans, a photographer on leave from the Farm Security Administration, were commissioned by the staff of a magazine to do an article on cotton tenantry that would be a photographic and verbal record of the daily lives of the average white sharecropper. As the two men carried out their assignment, they found it developing into a much larger project than that originally conceived. Ultimately, they were forced to return to their jobs much sooner than they wished and the work that they had done and assembled was refused publication by those who had commissioned it. Eventually it found publication on condition that certain words be deleted that were illegal in Massachusetts. By that time, 1941, Agee and Walker envisioned Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, complete in itself, as part of a larger whole to be called Three Tenant Families. The other part was never done. In its present form the book consists of sixty-two photographs followed by a lengthy text partly factual, partly imaginative, all extremely detailed. A narrative of fact, a regional study, a moving moral document, a lyric meditation on life and art, an exercise in style, it is one of the most remarkable books of the century.

First, as in a playscript, the members of the three families are listed, their ages, relationships, and their farms. In this list Agee casts himself as a spy, traveling as a journalist, and Evans as a counterspy, traveling as a photographer. Listed also are William Blake, Celine, Ring Lardner, Jesus Christ, and Sigmund Freud, as unpaid agitators.

Many critics considered the book a structural failure. It has no apparent pattern of development. Agee begins by explaining that the project was corrupt, obscene, terrifying, and mysterious. He realized painfully that he was spying into the private misery of these people, that their lives would thus be exposed as passing entertainment to the curious and casual reader, and that he was being paid for doing this. Thus, determined to show the sacredness and dignity of each life down to the smallest detail, he approached his subjects with boundless love and humility.

He records three incidents, called "Late Sunday Morning," "At the Forks," and "Near a Church," so moving to him as to render him almost inarticulate at the time of the event, but about which he writes simply and vividly. In the first, a white foreman intrudes into the Negro community and forces three Negroes to sing for Agee and Evans. At the forks, Agee asks directions of a sick young man, his worn wife, and a mentally retarded older man. Near a church which Evans wished to enter in order to take photographs, Agee frightened a young Negro couple by running up behind them. In each case he empathized so strongly with each individual that he felt sympathy and understanding for the foreman even though he humiliated the Negro singers; he felt sick with joy and gratitude when the wife at the forks showed sufficient confidence in him to smile slightly; he felt the fear of the young couple and the utter impossibility of ever communicating clearly to them his intentions.

A Country Letter, which begins Part I, and which Agee wrote while sitting up late at night, contains some of the most beautiful lyric prose of the entire book. It is unified, developed, and complete in itself. Agee speaks of his tenants specifically, but he places them and their flimsy homes against a backdrop of the earth and the universe so that they and their problems, their joys and sorrows, become representative of all men; and the theme running through the entire piece is of aspirations and ideals dulled and lost, worn down by the hard necessities of living, of the flame of life that sinks down almost to an ember as they ask themselves how they were thus caught.

Parts I and II are primarily factual. The people themselves are introduced and their complex family relationships are clarified. The order of their rising and the getting breakfast are described in detail. Agee explains simply the attempts of the men to find other work during slack times on the farm and the kinds of jobs available to them. The chapter on money is an objective and devastating account of the tenant farmers' financial situation.

The section on shelter is almost a hundred pages long. He details the setting of one tenant home, the surrounding fields, the spring, the garden, and the outbuildings, including the contour and quality of the soil, the angle of the path, the flavor of the water, the shape and size of the building, the boards and nails holding them together, and the odds and ends found inside them. Systematically he examines, as with a microscope, the house itself, its outside structure and materials, the space underneath the house including the dampness, insects living there, the odors; then, inside, the front bedroom, where he himself slept, the rear bedroom, where the family slept, the kitchen and storeroom, and the space beneath the roof. For each room he describes the walls, floor, placement of furniture, the furniture itself and the contents of each drawer down to bits of dust, the items on the furniture and pinned to the walls, the insects inhabiting the bed, the wasps in the beams of the roof, the textures and odors, and the imagined hopes and feelings of the people whose home it is. His description of the house is of a living thing, flimsy and inadequate, but alive and placed, like the people, against the curve of the earth and sky. He describes the homes of the other two families also, but chiefly to point out their differences from the first. The final part of this section is devoted to the life present other than human: the dogs, cats, cows, mules, pigs, snakes, insects, birds, and trees. These lives too are described with respect and consideration, with humor, and with an appreciation of the beauty to be found in them.

Part II is devoted to sections on clothing, education, and work. Agee lists the items of clothing worn by the men and women on Sundays, Saturdays, and workdays. He describes in particular detail a suit of overalls and the shirt worn with them, their cut, pockets, stitching, straps, color, and texture when new, when partly worn out, and when completely worn out, differentiating carefully between the three stages; and again he makes the clothes almost alive, an outer skin, part of the man who wears them.

The section on education, termed brilliant by some critics, is an angry analysis of the failure of schools and teachers not only in the South but everywhere properly to educate the young, of society's forcing on them work which has no bearing on their lives and values which are meaningless and harmful.

In "Work" Agee gives a step by step description of the raising of cotton, from the preparation of the soil through the sowing, cultivating, and harvesting of the crop. This work is extremely laborious and is done with primitive, inadequate tools. The entire family participates in the labor and in the anxious waiting for harvest, which will determine the meager incomes of the sharecroppers.

The next part of the book, called "Intermission," is illustrative of the confused structure of the book. It deals with a questionnaire sent to writers by The Partisan Review and Agee's answer to it.

Part III, "Inductions," goes back in point of time to the first meetings between Agee and Evans and the three families involved in their work. In particular, the section describes Agee's first night in the Gudgers' home, how he came to be there, what they said and ate, and how they all reacted to the situation.

From that point on the book consists of short pieces: descriptions of a graveyard, of Squinch Gudger and his mother, of Ellen Woods; a poem, the first line of which gives the book its title; and a section entitled "Notes and Appendices" containing various notes, chiefly on Margaret Bourke-White, and a listing of Anglo-Saxon monosyllables.

The concluding piece describes a call, possibly of a small furbearing animal, probably a fox, heard one night from the Gudgers' front porch. The call was answered by another animal, and as the two continued to call back and forth Agee and his friend speculated on the animals and their locations. Finally, within himself, Agee experienced the joy of hearing the world talk, of nature talking, as well as the grief that comes from inability to communicate.

The faults of the book arise from its very virtues: Agee's love and compassion for people result not only in vivid, lyric prose but also in verbosity and repetition. When it first appeared, some critics thought Agee's prose arrogant, mannered, precious, nonsensical; others found it confused and adolescent. Obsessed though the author was with his own complex reactions to his subjects and the rest of the world, and his failure to convey all that he felt, he nevertheless gave a picture of himself and of the tenants and their lives in a way that is vivid and overwhelming. At times the writer's sensibility would be almost unbearable if it were not of a high moral order. Like Melville's Moby Dick and Thoreau's Walden, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men breaks through the limits of reality to convey meanings and insights that are rich and strange in its presentation of personal revelation and moral significance.

THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB

Author: Charles Lamb (1775-1834)

First published: Letters of Charles Lamb, with a Sketch of His Life, 1837; The Letters of Charles and Mary Lamb, edited by E. V. Lucas, 3 vols., 1935

Charles Lamb is one of the most pleasant and most companionable figures in English letters. He was the author of several works of relative unimportance, such as his best-known poem "Old Familiar Faces" (published in a volume called simply Blank Verse, 1798), A Tale of Rosamund Gray (1798), the generally ineffective drama John Woodvil (1802), and the farce Mr. H. (1806), The Ad- ventures of Ulysses (1808), Specimens of the English Dramatic Poets Who Lived About the Time of Shakespeare (1808), and others. But he is deservedly best remembered for his Tales from Shakespeare (1807) and the Essays of Elia.

The Tales from Shakespeare consists of Shakespeare's plays rewritten, supposedly for children but actually of such high quality that they have been immensely popular with adults also. For the volume Lamb rewrote six tragedies and his sister Mary rewrote fourteen comedies. They did not include the histories, the Roman plays, and two other comedies. The beauty and art with which these stories recapture the essence and style of Shakespeare's language is remarkable, almost as though the later versions were prose renditions of the plays written by Shakespeare himself. The transition between Shakespeare's language and that of the Lambs is scarcely visible or of varying quality.

The Essays of Elia were first contributed to The London Magazine during the years between 1820 and 1825. Signed "Elia," they were first published as a book in 1823. A second volume, Last Essays of Elia, appeared in 1833. The most famous of these essays are undoubtedly "Dream Children: A Reverie," a magical recreation of youth, and "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig," a whimsical fantasy about the Chinese custom of burning down houses to cook their pork. In these essays Lamb is very consciously a stylist re-creating and revitalizing the language of older English writers, especially Robert Burton, the author of The Anatomy of Melancholy, 1621, and Sir Thomas Browne in his Vulgar Errors, published in 1646. In these works Lamb is relaxed, quaint, archaic, and whimsical. From these essays in particular has come the notion, held in the writer's day as well as since, that Lamb was above all things "gentle," a term he came to detest and to protest against.

Although Lamb was "gentle" in these essays, he was in life quite the opposite.

He was at times somewhat eccentric and given to being different from other people because of a proclivity for the quaint. But he was never a recluse. Instead, he was very much a part of life, which he loved and enjoyed despite the terrible tragedies of his life—the murder of their mother by his sister Mary and the care he gave her during her recurrent fits of insanity.

But Lamb's letters, surely not among the greatest letters of literary figures, reveal a tough little man who affirmed life in the face of many frustrations and misfortunes. He did not whine over his role in life and generally he was willing to accept it on its own terms rather than try to make it over into a more desirable image.

Stylistically the letters are worlds apart from the language of the essays. In his daily—or rather, nightly—writing he reacts to life in language that is simple, direct, idiomatic, at times racy, snappish, and very ungentle.

Lamb was gregarious and congenial with his friends despite the fact that he stammered—an affliction which added charm to his personality—but reticent among persons he did not know well. When relaxed he was outgoing, boisterous, playful, and a grim punster who often did not know when to drop an overworked pun. Though he was not liked by all persons who knew him, his range of acquaintanceship was wide, including some of the leading authors of the day, especially Coleridge and Wordsworth.

Lamb, contrary to the main Romantic impulse of the day, was a city man by birth and taste. Nature to him, as he told Wordsworth, was dead. But London life was his exhilaration. He loved the rattle, the noise, the masquerade, the pantomime. It fed him without ever filling him. He reacted so strongly to the movement that it sometimes filled him with tears merely to know the joy of it. For this reason he was remarkably indifferent to the world outside London. He did not care for the mountains. He cared next to nothing for the momentous events of the Continent during the years of revolution and the Napoleonic wars, nor apparently for the strife raised in England by these catastrophes. Though liberal in his political leanings, he maintained throughout life a marvelous indifference to political events at home or abroad.

Yet his letters sparkle with the matters that concerned him. He was keenly interested in the writers of his day as well as those of earlier times, their ideas and philosophies, their everyday affairs. He was especially interested in the theater, although his own attempts to write for that medium were disastrously unsuccessful, and his criticism, though not of the first magnitude, was filled with insight and incisiveness. The letters reveal also that Lamb was an enthusiastic devotee of "Lords Food and Drink."

Lamb was intimate with Coleridge, whom he had met while both were students at Christ's Hospital. Many of his best letters were written to this life-long friend. Through Coleridge, Lamb met Wordsworth. He also knew William Hazlitt, Robert Southey, Leigh Hunt, and William Godwin, as well as the actress Fanny Kelly, to whom he proposed marriage.

His letters abound with chitchat, the trivial, as well as with serious subjects of much interest to him. He liked Burns, Rousseau's Confessions, the philosopher George Berkeley, (he wanted at one time to become a Berkeleyan), the Quakers William Penn and John Woolman.

He was uninhibited in giving advice. He urged Coleridge to be simple in his writing and avoid elaborateness because simplicity is the very essence of expression. He also urged Coleridge to write an epic because it was the only kind of poem that could accommodate the full genius of a poet.

He did not hesitate to criticize his friends or mankind in general. He reacted negatively to Coleridge's subtitle to his "Rime of the Ancient Mariner," which was called "A Poet's Reverie," because he felt the additional part of the title was a derogation to the full work, a poem that was the most affecting he had ever read and one that kept him upset for many days after reading it. He criticized in strong terms some of Wordsworth's poems in the second edition of Lyrical Ballads, though he thought Wordsworth was the greatest poet then alive. He felt that the Preface to this second edition of the Ballads should have appeared as a separate volume because the comments by the two poets, although they were true, just, and new, tended to diminish the poems in the book.

The letters reveal how, though indifferent to the world, or perhaps because of this indifference, he could be chauvinistic and insist that English life was the best a person could lead. The letters reveal also how he gloried in his food and drink, especially delighting in the food called brawn, a mixture of chopped up parts from the head, feet, legs, and tongue of the pig.

Most poignantly the letters tell the story of the insanity of his sister Mary. Without her and her dreadful deed in killing their mother, his life would surely have been different. In writing of the deed to Coleridge, he stated it directly and candidly. Thereafter the letters abound with the terror of his situation, his dread over the recurrent insanity Mary had visited upon herself, and the delight she and he had during her months of perfect sanity, when they worked together. Their relationship was truly one of the remarkable ones of all time. He cared for her gently, established a pension for her in case she should outlive him (which she did by thirteen years), and during his later years as her fits of insanity came more and more frequently, necessitating her going to a house of detention where she could be better cared for, he accepted his fate with the philosophic resignation that had characterized his behavior throughout life.

Upon his retirement from the East India House after thirty-three years of service, he delighted in his new-found freedom, which he said extended the length of his days to three times their former length, and he hoped that he would be able to adjust to all this new leisure.

On December 22, 1834, Lamb fell in the street, developed erysipelas, and died five days later. The last letter he wrote, on the day he fell in the street, delightfully reveals most of the main interests of his life: he tells how while frying tripe he went out to fetch a book and lost it. He wants the recipient of the letter to locate the book at once or write that she cannot find it. He laments that if the book is lost he will never like tripe again.

THE LETTERS OF EMILY DICKINSON

Author: Emily Dickinson (1830-1886)

First published: Letters of Emily Dickinson, edited by Mabel Loomis Todd, 1894 (enlarged, 1931); The Letters of Emily Dickinson, edited by Thomas H. Johnson, 1958

Fiction, drama, and most poems are the fables of man pretending, living in and expressing himself through the imagination; their symbol is the persona. History and biography are the record of man reporting. Letters are the voice of man speaking and as such the most direct and accessible of all literary forms. But their value as forms of entertainment or revelation is always in direct proportion to the outgoing qualities of the people who write them. In the truly good letter the writer's guard is down. He feels free to speak out candidly, informingly, colloquially, at times indiscreetly, and what he has to say may be passionate or painful, witty or sober, foolish or wise, according to the expression of thought, action, or mood. While we read we stand, as it were, in the presence of a personality. Even where literary skill is lacking, a personal turn of phrase, a touch of humor, some troubled musing on the state of man or flash of insight can convey a sense of life felt in all its immediacy and vigor. This is one reason why a collection of letters is sometimes more interesting and revealing than the most considered or frankest of biographies.

Unfortunately, however, literary men are not always the best letter writers. Their letters may be ponderous, as are Johnson's, sensible but austere, as are Wordsworth's, theatrical and often insincere like Byron's, perversely self-conscious like Shaw's, thin and dull like Joyce's. Frequently, too, writers give the impression that they are addressing posterity, not their correspondents. Keats had the proper touch and tone for self-revelation illuminating more than the events of his life and his literary world, as did Yeats, D. H. Lawrence, Sherwood Anderson, and Emily Dickinson. Her letters, written with no thought of publication, to members of her family and to friends, display a sincerity that is sometimes touching, often painful, always revealing. In them we can trace the growth of the woman, watch the progress of the writer, and peer into the depth insights of a tremendous private sensibility, alert in its poetic responsiveness to life and art.

In 1958, the three volumes of The Letters of Emily Dickinson brought to completion both an extensive and an intensive program of literary scholarship and laid a solid foundation for all future studies of the poet. The overall project, one of the most important in the history of American letters, began in 1955 with the publication of Thomas H. Johnson's definitive three-volume edition of Emily Dickinson's poems, a collection derived from every available manuscript source and including all variant readings critically compared. As a companion work the same editor, with the assistance of Theodora Ward, prepared a similar edition of the Dickinson letters. Except for the not impossible but highly improbable discovery of significant new material, the canon of Emily Dickinson's poetry and prose is now as complete as research and scrupulous editing could make it, and the six volumes with their introductions and notes, supplemented by Professor Johnson's Emily Dickinson: An Interpretive Biography, afford one of the most nearly rounded and informing presentations we have of any American writer.

Although Professor Johnson was aided in part by the pioneer efforts of Mabel Loomis Todd, whose 1894 edition of the Letters preserved in print a number now lost or destroyed, the proportions of this collection testify to his own energy and resourcefulness. It is true that of the thousand and forty-nine letters printed, only one hundred or so appear for the first time; but of the total number about three-fourths have been taken from manuscript, and many abridged or altered in previous editions have now been restored to their proper proportions. As in the case of the poems, the arrangement is chronological, each letter being accompanied by notes giving its source, describing the manuscript, identifying the addressee, and explaining the attendant circumstances of its composition whenever possible.

These matters, however, are for the literary specialist. For the general reader there is the fascination of a character portrait taking shape in brief but revealing glimpses: the high-spirited young girl conscious of close family ties and alert to the bustle of the village scene, the Mount Holyoke student disturbed by religious doubts that were to perplex her all her life, the woman of acute sensitivity withdrawing more and more from the everyday world, and finally the impassioned recluse to whom the world of flesh, spirit, and art were one and inseparable.

Emily Dickinson's letters make clear

the fact that her retreat from the familiar world was more than the eccentric deed of a cranky old maid. To her friend Abiah Root she wrote that the shore was safer, but she preferred to buffet the waves of the sea.

To her, life itself was dedication, in her case to a sense of her vocation as a poet and to an acceptance of the burden imposed by the intense, personal nature of her art. Her "business," as she wrote to Thomas Wentworth Higginson, was "Circumference." Perhaps she dared to venture out into uncharted realms of eternity because she already knew the village with its brisk, practical bustle and concerns. In the later years of her life her letters were almost her only connection with the world on which she had voluntarily turned her back.

The stereotype of the New England nun is so ingrained in the popular imagination that many readers of these letters will be surprised by the variety and range of her contacts. The most interesting and revealing are those written to intellectual and literary friends like Samuel Bowles, editor of the Springfield Daily Republican; J. G. Holland, at one time an associate of Bowles, later the editor of Scribner's Monthly; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, a prolific writer of the period; and her Boston cousins, Louise and Frances Norcross. Perhaps the strangest gesture ever made was her turning to Higginson as her literary mentor. On April 15, 1862, she wrote to ask him whether he was too occupied to pass judgment on her verse. Was it, she inquired, alive? She added that she had no one else to turn to, that she herself was too close to her writing to see it distinctly. With the letter she enclosed four short poems and, in a separate small envelope, her signature in case he should wish to reply. He did. and in answer she wrote to him on April 25, 1862, the most revealing of all her letters:

You asked how old I was? I made no verse—but one or two—until this winter—Sir—

I had a terror—since September—I could tell to none—and so I sing, as the Boy does by the Burying Ground—because I am afraid—You inquire my Books—For Poets—I have Keats—and Mr and Mrs Browning. For Prose—Mr Ruskin—Sir Thomas Browne—and the Revelation. I went to school—but in your manner of the phrase—had no education. When a little Girl, I had a friend, who taught me Immortality—but venturing too near, himself—he never returned—Soon after, my Tutor, died—and for several years, my Lexicon—was my only companion—Then I found one more—but he was not contented I be his scholar—so he left the Land.

You ask of my Companions Hills—Sir—and the Sundown—and a Dog—large as myself, that my Father bought me—They are better than Beings—because they know—but do not tell—and the noise in the Pool, at Noon—excels my Piano. I have a Brother and Sister—My Mother does not care for thought—and Father, too busy with his Briefs—to notice what we do—He buys me many Books—but begs me not to read them—because he fears they joggle the Mind. They are religious—except me—and address an Eclipse, every morning—whom they call their "Father." But I fear my story fatigues you—I would like to learn—Could you tell me how to grow—or is it un conveyed—like Melody—or Witchcraft? . . .

Two Editors of Journals came to my Father's House, this winter—and asked me for my Mind—and when I asked them "Why," they said I was penurious—and they, would use it for the World—

I could not weigh myself—Myself—

This was the beginning of a correspondence carried on until her death. There is no proof that Higginson, a popularizer and a vulgarian, ever understood her or her aims; he later complained that he had never been in the company of one who drained the power of his nerves so completely. At the same time he seems to have realized her need for the kind of assurance he could give. It was he who helped to shape the Dickinson legend when he called her his "eccentric poetess" and said that there was something "quaint and nun-like" in her appearance.

In the light of her seclusion and her evasive attitude toward the contacts of everyday experience, it is not surprising that the great events of her time, like the stir of the village world about her, go almost unnoticed in these letters. Her only comment on the Civil War was to call it an "oblique place" before its violence and horrors were brought home to her by the death of a soldier from Amherst. For her, all experience was personal, immediate, revealing, all the more meaningful if it could be snared in an apothegm. Nature she called a haunted house, art a house wishing to be haunted. On another occasion she wrote that we distrust Christ when he tells us about God the Father and turn away when he tells us about heaven; but we listen when he describes Himself as one "acquainted with grief," for we also are familiar with sorrow. On another occasion she declared that science will not entrust mankind with another world. In aphoristic mood she wrote that our chief tempter is memory.

As time passed, Emily Dickinson's letters tended to become more and more an extension of her poetry, so that it is often difficult to tell where the letter ends and the poem begins, as when she compared the ending of summer to the soft, creakless shutting of a door. Sometimes the two are one, whether it is written in stanza form or in prose. Also, many of her poems went out to the world enclosed in letters dealing at times with the most trivial matters, but more often cryptic with suggestion and meditated wisdom. In some cases the early drafts of her letters have survived, showing that she reworked them as carefully as she did her poems, to match her words to her ideas. Spirit, she said, can be moved or evoked only by spirit, never by flesh.

This edition of the Letters will not make necessary a revision of the known biographical facts or a corrected appraisal of Emily Dickinson's position as a major poet. Rather, these volumes round out the picture of a complex but wholly understandable personality and allow us to trace in clearer outline the successive stages of development which transformed an extremely sensitive yet not remarkable young woman into an extraordinary poet. Whether she wrote in poetry or prose, Emily Dickinson was in all truth composing her "letter to the World." For this reason the best comment to make on her performance in re-creating the spirit in language is the thought she herself expressed after reading of the death of George Eliot, the hope that she who had experienced the eternal in time would receive the gift omitted by time as part of eternity's bounty.

THE LETTERS OF F. SCOTT FITZGERALD

Author: F. Scott Fitzgerald (1896-1940)

First published: 1963

From Hollywood in 1940, the year of his death, F. Scott Fitzgerald wrote to Maxwell Perkins, his editor at Scribner's, that hardly any American fiction published at that time failed to show his influence. For this reason he felt that he was in some manner an original. Two years earlier he had written to Perkins that he felt neglected, that his reputation was being allowed to vanish because all his books were out of print. When Arthur Mizener's biography appeared, in 1951, the situation was little better. Now his books have been reissued and several collections of his letters are in print as the result of a reassessment enshrining him with the giants of the 1920's: Hemingway, Faulkner, and Wolfe. Fitzgerald wrote prophetically when he said that an author ought to write for the young people of his generation, the forthcoming critics of the next, and the teachers of generations.

The years between 1925 and 1929 had a stunning effect upon American fiction with the publication of The Great Gatsby, The Sun Also Rises, A Farewell to Arms, The Sound and the Fury, and Look Homeward, Angel. Also in this decade appeared Eliot's The Waste Land; one may sense the influence of this thematically visionary poem in The Great Gatsby. With Hemingway and Wolfe, Fitzgerald recognized an essential affinity: the attempt to grasp the same feel of an interval in time and place, shown in people. Our picture of this era becomes more intensely fascinating with every new biography and collection of letters about these three novelists and their editor, Maxwell Perkins. Fitzgerald wrote to him once saying that he must have a hard time trying to keep up with them, for Hemingway was in Spain, and Wolfe had reverted to an "artistic hillbilly." In their works and in their legends these writers consciously expressed a dynamic poetic image of their time. Of his own contribution, Fitzgerald wrote to Edmund Wilson in 1918, while still at work on his first novel, This Side of Paradise, and stated that no other person could have written a story of the young people of his generation in such depth; and to Perkins he said later that at twenty-seven he felt that he had used up more of his personal experience than anyone else.

Edited by Andrew Turnbull, whose biography of Fitzgerald appeared in 1962, these letters provide a many-faceted view of that "huge season" and of the man who led "the gay parade." It was a time so bemused by itself that he later said the past was his for eternity. These letters show us the Fitzgerald of the St. Paul, Princeton, France, Baltimore, Asheville, and Hollywood years. As an insider who himself figures prominently in the letters (he was a childhood friend of Fitzgerald and the playmate of the writer's daughter Scottie) Turnbull is well qualified to write about Fitzgerald and to edit his letters. Unfortunately, those to Fitzgerald's father and to his good friend Ring Lardner are not obtainable, but of those which are available, Turnbull has published half.

The organization of the volume is ingenious and imaginative. After a brief personal introduction and an adequate chronology, Turnbull opens with a large group of letters to the callow, romantic Scottie, covering the years 1933-1940. He next presents a brief group to Fitzgerald's wife Zelda (1939-1940). These letters provide an intimate view covering the dark years when Fitzgerald indentured himself to Hollywood to finance Scottie's education and Zelda's confinement in mental institutions. Of Zelda, he wrote to his daughter that the mentally disturbed are only visitors on earth, forever strangers carrying broken commandments they cannot understand. In a different mood he wrote to Zelda herself that he wanted peace and hoped for the right to save her, to allow her a chance. He endured in this same period the "dreary routine" and expense of his own illnesses. He felt that his reason for being in Hollywood was to make one last effort, even though he felt he had done better work. His debts to his agent, his publisher, and others were oppressive. He said that at one time there was always money at hand, but now that it was not seemed to him a kind of epitaph to his era.

In the letters to Perkins, many of which are among Fitzgerald's most provocative, an entire creative span is covered. Both as an artist and as a proficient hack, Fitzgerald discusses in generous detail the machinery of publishing and the stages in the development of his books; and his comments on the personalities and writings of his contemporaries are often brilliant. Much briefer sections are devoted to major literary friends: Hemingway, who finally betrayed him; Edmund Wilson, who set his intellectual standards; John Peale Bishop, who introduced him to modern poetry, and Shane Leslie, who encouraged him to pursue his career as a writer. Other sections bring together letters to Christian Gauss, his teacher at Princeton; to Harold Ober, his friend and agent from whom he eventually became estranged, and to such society friends as Mrs. Richard Taylor; Mrs. Turnbull (Andrew's mother), whom he greatly admired and respected and who gave him the feeling of the continuation of life; and Gerald and Sara Murphy, models for some of his rich, romantic characters.

The volume ends with a section of miscellaneous letters to his family, to his school friends, to strangers who expressed admiration or asked advice about living and writing, to critics (James Branch Cabell, Gilbert Seldes, Alexander Woolcott, Malcolm Cowley, George Jean Nathan, Henry Mencken), to fellow writers (Sinclair Lewis, Sherwood Anderson, Gertrude Stein, John O'Hara, Thomas Wolfe, Budd Shulberg, and S. J. Perelman), and to movie people (Helen Hayes, Joseph Mankiewicz). Many other writers, including Dorothy Parker and John Dos Passos, and movie people, Shirley Temple and Joan Crawford among others, are interesting figures in the letters. This section provides the broadest view, from 1907 on.

By deciding against the strict chronological approach, Turnbull returns us again and again to focal events, and there emerges an impressive image of a complex, dual personality whose dramatic life, romantic in youth, tawdry in some instances, and pathetic in its "dying fall," strained his body and his creative powers to the breaking point. Eventually Fitzgerald came to believe that life cheats and defeats, and that the things that save are not pleasure and happiness but the final results that come out of the conflict. Unlike his other, more nearly autobiographical novels, his masterpiece, The Great Gatsby, is an artistically unified expression of his own disordered character, which could not hold two opposed views at the same time without cracking up. In The Great Gatsby he discovered the depth of art, and the creative process, once mastered, became the most important thing in life after he found it. From one point of view, the letters to Perkins and to Ober constitute a work record that shows how Fitzgerald's mediocre and second-rate stuff (for Liberty, The Saturday Evening Post, and Cosmopolitan) kept him from more important work and detracted from his reputation among serious readers. He felt that in his novel The Great Gatsby there was pure creative work, not the second-rate stuff of many of his short stories but work of fully held imagination of an earnest world.

Most of the letters have a polished literary finish that either proves Fitzgerald's fictive style was really quite spontaneous or suggest that his correspondence was with posterity. In contrast to the stiff letters of Joyce, Fitzgerald's letters run the gamut of human emotions and moods. They are frank, intimate, bitter, warm, gossipy, desperate, self-pitying, stoic, introspective, charitable, compassionate, irreligious, moralistic, kind, apologetic, grateful, and full of bizarre wit and humor. They remind one of the lively letters of John Keats or D. H. Lawrence.

Fitzgerald's disputes with Wilson, Hemingway, and Bishop over aspects of his private life which they publicized, with Perkins over Fitzgerald's estimation of other Scribner writers, especially the later Wolfe, and with Ober over money problems, reveal a great deal about all those involved. He writes often of the direct influences in life and literature upon his writing. He speaks of Compton Mackenzie, Keats, Norris, Conrad, and Kafka with rare discernment, and he never quite recovered from the impact of Spengler, whom he read while working on

The Great Gatsby. Also valuable are his reassessments of his own work; we witness the author's progress from an egotistical confidence in his first novel to a more mature confidence in The Great Gatsby. His various comments on the craft of fiction have a timeless relevance. He offered sound advice to young writers, whom he was always eager to assist, morally, critically, and practically. He once wrote to Perkins about a new writer named Ernest Hemingway.

Although he speaks of her, there are no letters to Sheilah Graham. But there is one moving letter in which he ends a relationship with a married woman. Like most people who squander time, money, health, talent, and friendships, he was lavish with advice. With the authority of failure, but with a Chestertonian aptness as well, he advised Scottie, for instance, about her schooling, reading, writing, and romancing, in effect saying that if she did the things that his generation did not do she would be all right.

His observations on the Hollywood of the 1930's—its writers, directors, stars, producers—indicate that he possessed the raw material to make The Last Tycoon, unfinished at his death, a major novel. Alternately elated and depressed as a script writer who aspired to direct his own movies, it is in one sense appropriate that he died in Hollywood; at his worst he hacked out strips of garish celluloid and at his finest he conjured up the image of America that the movies, potentially, are best able to project.

Reviewing The Last Tycoon in 1941, Stephen Vincent Benét wrote that Fitzgerald was not a literary legend but a reputation. Recent biographical and critical studies, the republication of his fiction, and the collection of his letters suggest that he may be both.

THE LETTERS OF JOHN KEATS

Author: John Keats (1795-1821)

The letters of John Keats begin in 1816 and end with his death in 1821. They are very much a personal record, so much so that their publication in the nineteenth century occasioned notable critical hostility. The Victorians were shocked by these letters. Men like Matthew Arnold and even Algernon Swinburne stated that they were too emotional, and should not be presented to public view. Modern criticism has taken a completely different viewpoint; the love letters are acknowledged to be among the greatest of their kind and the passages on criticism are now thought to be major documents of Romantic aesthetics.

The correspondents of Keats were Benjamin Bailey (1791-1853), a friend to whom Keats addressed a number of letters with matters of importance from a critical point of view; Fanny Brawne (1800-1865), the subject of the famous love letters; Charles Armitage Brown (1786-1842), himself a writer; Charles Wentworth Dilke (1789-1864), a generous friend and admirer of the poet; Charles Cowden Clarke (1787-1877), an early friend and literary influence; William Haslam (1795-1851), a school-fellow friend and a financial supporter of Keats; Benjamin Haydon (1786-1846), a painter much admired by the poet; Leigh Hunt (1784-1859), essayist and an early influence on Keats and other writers of the time; Fanny Keats (1803-1889), sister of the poet; George Keats (1797-1841), a brother; Joseph Severn (1793-1879), the poet and diplomat in whose arms Keats died; and Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822), an admirer of his brother poet.

Throughout the letters there are many references to the great men who created the literature of England. Keats, although not formally educated in literary studies, was conscious of his heritage as a writer. One of the great themes of these letters is therefore English literature itself, and Keats's relationship to it. He mentions the names of Shakespeare and Milton often, and he continually tries to orient his own attitudes and work toward the great works of the past. In writing to his brother he goes through a whole catalogue of poets and essayists, in the process showing his strong sense of belonging to a community of the literate. He reveals that he reads matter outside what might be thought of as the range of poetry: the works of Voltaire, Gibbon, and Rabelais. In addition to these he reveals that he is interested in and indeed familiar with the work of Swift among the older writers, and with the whole spectrum of literature in his century: Wordsworth, Byron, Shelley, Hunt, Scott, and Hazlitt. Keats mentions these men and others often, and generally he reveals the operation of a strong critical sense. He tries not only to understand what these writers represent, but in what ways he himself can come to terms with them as a writer.

Shakespeare is certainly one of the great to whom his letters make important reference. In a significant letter of 1818 he states that he can read and understand Shakespeare "to his depths." The importance of Shakespeare to Keats was profound; he classified him as among those ultimate realities of life, like the existence of the sun and stars themselves.

If the letters have a good deal to say about Keats's vocation, they have perhaps even more to say about his feelings. The letters to Fanny Brawne express many things: perhaps the most constant themes are the depth of his love, his feelings of inadequacy in that love, and the sense he attains of the meaning this love has in establishing new conditions for his existence. Keats admits that his contemplation of Fanny prevents his obsessive preoccupation with himself: with his ego, his work, and, ultimately, with his death. The luxuries over which he broods are, he says, the beauty of this woman and the hour of his death. The letters are not full of elaborate, reasoned, and eloquent statement, but give the appearance of the irresistible, disordered, and even hasty expression of deep feelings. They move very rapidly from expressions of joy to those of sadness, from talk of self to discussion of things more abstract. There is a good deal of news in these letters, even of gossip. Keats's own phrase describing his state is that of "uneasy spirits," and the letters convey these feelings directly and forcefully. There is a strong element of consciousness in these letters. Keats strives to create for the object of these letters the tone and appearance of the world through which he moves, and of the things which he experiences.

The letters to his friends reveal a strong sense of the obligations of friendship. It is one of the great topics to which he returns again and again. He asks forgiveness time after time for putting the demands of art ahead of those of friendship, and he states the impossibility of rationally dividing himself between the art of writing and that of friendship. He writes, with some pride, that he is glad not to be a burden to his friends. Yet, increasingly as the time of his death approached, he did become dependent on them for financial aid and for comfort of a less material kind. That they responded to his need is to their lasting honor.

When Keats writes about his friendships he continually takes a conciliatory and even humble tone. He begins by asking whether he can, in fact, allow himself to intrude upon his friends to the extent of imposing his problems, even his sense of self, upon them. Yet when Keats writes of his art there is a difference in tone. He has a firm conviction of the essential rightness of criticism and, even when writing about Milton and other figures in the Pantheon of letters, he is honest about what he thinks are their failings.

He believes, for example, that in many ways Wordsworth is to be preferred to Milton, because the former supplies a sense of "the human heart." Yet, to balance and give equal critical judgment, he adds that Milton was a much better thinker. In commenting on his own dedication to writing he said very strongly that he preferred his own criticism to that of others. Society mattered very little to him, and its opinions of art even less.

The letters have far more variety in them than the textbooks mention. They are in effect a calendar of events for Keats, in which he brings to his own mind and that of his correspondent the nature of those things which have affected his train of thought. They are in a sense both journals and letters, full of references to the dramas he has seen and the opinions he has formed about them; about the books he has read and the comparisons he has drawn from them; about the people he has met, and the way their characters have engaged him. Perhaps the outstanding trait of these letters is simply their universality: one letter to his brother, for example, covers everything from Freemasonry to fairy tales, and it is written in lively and expressive metaphors drawn from all the experiences of life. In fact, the letters are a kind of factory of language in that they reveal the same kind of experimentation with the possibilities of language as do the poems.

Throughout the letters Keats refuses to deceive himself. He does not hide the meaning of his brother's symptoms, and he acknowledges that this fatal sickness has its own place in the scheme of things. Perhaps the most famous letters deal with his awareness of his own approaching death; their rigorous honesty and insight are, one grants, unique. His wishes for death every day, a letter of 1820 admits, yet he wishes too that the pains of life might continue because they may be all he has. With almost scientific objectivity he considers the thought of his death, but wastes very small self-pity on it. As in most of his earlier letters, those of his later life are centered not on the problem of the end of things but on their creation. The work must continue, and it must endure.

A summary of the meaning of the letters must take account of the complexity of their response to life. They are chronicles as well as criticisms, and they require attention to details as well as emotional responses in their readers. Keats himself remarked that he may not have left anything immortal behind him, except the memories of his friends. He was wrong in his belief and statement. But he was right when he intimates that his friendships, of which his letters are the concrete expression, were themselves of tremendous importance.

THE LETTERS OF MADAME DE SÉVIGNÉ

Author: Madame Marie de Sévigné (1626-1696)

First published: 1697; 1725-1726; 1734-1737; 1862-1865

The letters of Marie de Sévigné are thought of by many as the finest letters ever written. This large body of personal correspondence, about 1,500 letters in all, spreads over the whole of Madame de Sévigné's adult life. The first datable letter was written in 1648 when she was twenty-two, but at least one was written before she was married. Most of the letters, however, were written between 1671 and 1696, the year of her death. In 1671, Madame de Sévigné's recently married daughter, Françoise-Marguerite, moved to her husband's house in the south of France, where he had been appointed to a high governmental post. This was a great disappointment to the mother who with a more than common love idolized her daughter, and who had hoped the girl would live in Paris. During the last twenty-five years of Madame de Sévigné's life she wrote many letters to her distant daughter. Nevertheless, while most of the surviving letters are addressed to Françoise-Marguerite, a substantial number are written to Madame de Sévigné's wide circle of friends.

Madame de Sévigné's letters were much admired even during her lifetime; many were copied in manuscript and passed about privately in fashionable and intellectual society, but they were never published while the author was alive. However, as early as 1697, one year after Madame de Sévigné's death, a branch of her family published its correspondence, and in this work a number of her letters were included. Then in 1725 and 1726 appeared abridged versions, and from 1734 to 1737 appeared a more complete but heavily edited edition sponsored by Madame de Sévigné's granddaughter. Finally, between 1862 and 1865, a complete and well-edited scholarly edition of fourteen volumes was published.

At first glance, the delight we find in the letters is largely a matter of their spontaneous art, their brilliant style, and their vivid reportage of the high society of Paris during one of the greatest periods of French history. Madame de Sévigné was a member of the best society, was an excellent observer, and had a fine eye for piquant detail. Yet if all the letters had to offer was brilliant reporting they would be merely interesting, not literary masterpieces. The quality that turns this body of correspondence into literature is not so much a brilliance of style and mass of detail as it is a matter of Madame de Sévigné's own personality and character, which are beautifully revealed, even dramatized, in letter after letter.

Madame de Sévigné was an elegant woman, a clear-sighted, well-educated, and profoundly sympathetic and humane person. Not the letters alone testify to this fact; all contemporary comment on the woman agrees that she was as attractive and pleasant as she was virtuous. And she had a certain gaiety and charm that was irrepressible even in the most adverse circumstances. She had both a generous nature and a solidly practical sense of business: her heart and her head were in admirable equilibrium. Yet, as she herself said, her head was never the dupe of her heart. These qualities were manifest in her ability, throughout her life, to state and support her opinions and sympathies while remaining tolerant of people and causes with which she disagreed. For example, while she sympathized in her younger years with the rebellious aristocrats of the Fronde, she retained the respect and friendship of her friends at court; and while she read Pascal and the Jansenist theologians with admiration, she also admired the arguments and style of their adversaries; while being perfectly orthodox in her own religious beliefs and practices, she was a friend of the reforming and austere Jansenists. Even though she was an unswerving Catholic, she found it profitable and helpful to read Protestant books.

That the letters live because of their literary and human interest is true. But their historical interest must not be minimized. In effect, Madame de Sévigné's correspondence, particularly from 1655 to 1696, constitutes a kind of newspaper covering the court and high society in the Paris of King Louis XIV. But this record of events was not written by an outsider who observed from a distance. Madame de Sévigné was a woman of the court who participated in much of what she tells. She writes of events at the Louvre, at Versailles, at Saint-Cyr. She describes meetings with the king and his conversations. She tells of the great ladies of the time and of their salons. She has little to say about the political events and wars of the period but of important Parisian events she has much to tell us which can be found nowhere else. For example, she reports in great detail the trial and disgrace of the great Finance Minister, Foquet; the marriage of the Grande Mademoiselle; the deaths of Turenne, Condé, and Louvois.

But it is not only of Paris and the court that Madame de Sévigné speaks. After her daughter's marriage she divided her time between the town and her country estates. Thus she often speaks of the day-to-day life of the people of both the town and the country. The common talk of the common people, and the success or lack of success of new books, what is playing at the theaters—all these things are part of her letters. She tells us about her travels, how friends are preparing a wedding, how a love affair is progressing, and what has happened to a peasant, the king's cook, or a gardener. In speaking of these things, Madame de Sévigné is neither coy, cruel, nor free with other people's reputations. Her object was not to gossip but to amuse and inform her daughter. Throughout the letters is seen her great maternal affection for the girl—an affection that, apparently, was not warmly responded to, and which was sometimes taken advantage of. Françoise-Marguerite was, it appears, quite spoiled.

Another interesting and revealing theme frequent in the letters is Madame de Sévigné's feeling for nature and the countryside. It is not often thought so, but in fact the seventeenth century aristocrat spent a good deal of time on his estates; he had not yet become the courtly lap dog that he was to be in the eighteenth century. It is not surprising, then, that Madame de Sévigné, so sensitive to what happened around her, would note and record the nonhuman world and its nuances and beauties; she did so, however, with a precision that would not become usual until the early Romantic period. She speaks of the changes in the leaves, the subtle passage from one season to another, a delightful reverie under a huge tree, listening to a nightingale in the moonlight, and many other such experiences.

Finally, students will always be interested in Madame de Sévigné's fairly frequent literary criticism. In her remarks we find two things: on the one hand we learn from this fashionable woman just what works were most admired by her age. On the other hand, we have from her an invaluable testimony to what it was that an educated, clever, and intelligent woman of the seventeenth century found at first reading to be good. This was an age when most writers about literature were academic critics who judged not like the general reader, by his tastes, but by the "rules" of neoclassical literary theory. In examining the letters, we find that Madame de Sévigné's taste was not at all academic. She delighted in some work now largely ignored except in literary histories—the gallant novels of Mademoiselle de Scudéry and the charming but shallow verse of Voiture and Benserade. However, she also saw the excellence of Corneille, Pascal, Bossuet, and La Fontaine. Typically, though she did not care for Racine as a person, she was capable of admiring certain of his works in a most enthusiastic manner.

THE LETTERS OF PLINY THE YOUNGER

Author: Gaius Plinius Caecilius Secundus (A.D. 61-before 114)

First transcribed: Letters, Books I-IX, 97-109; Book X, c. 111; Panegyricus, 100

Pliny the Younger, or Gaius Plinius Caecilius Secundus, was the nephew and adopted son of Pliny the Elder, the author of the famous and importantly influential Natural History in thirty-seven books. The younger Pliny, like the elder, was a wealthy aristocrat who devoted himself to a public career. The younger Pliny's surviving literary achievements are mostly a result of his public life as a lawyer, and public administrator, and landed gentleman; he has left us only one of his many now lost orations, and ten books of letters. His letters are one of the three important bodies of surviving Roman correspondence, the others being the letters of Cicero and the letters of Seneca.

The tone of Pliny's letters is in a way a combination of the tone of the other two letter writers, both of whom Pliny admired. Seneca's letters are more like philosophic treatises and moral essays than they are like familiar correspondence. Pliny's letters, like Seneca's, are usually organized around a single serious theme, are anchored by numerous moralizing asides, and were, in the surviving versions, consciously revised for transcription. Cicero's letters, on the other hand, have the familiarity and ease of genuinely personal letters. Again, despite his similarity to Seneca, Pliny often gives us the impression of familiarity—the texts are full of intimate detail and personal observations—yet we always sense that the letters are carefully organized in their edited form to present us with the picture of a dignified, proper public gentleman.

Literarily, Pliny's style is an interesting blend. Pliny was the friend of Tacitus, whose writing he admired, and he was the pupil of the great teacher Quintilian. On the other hand, his literary hero was Cicero and he consciously modeled himself on Cicero. As a result, Pliny's writing is both Ciceronian and characteristic of the prose of the Silver Age of Roman literature. His flowing copiousness and his often classical vocabulary are strongly reminiscent of Cicero. But in expression, use of neologisms, syntax, and figures of speech he is typical of the Silver Age.

The letters have come down to us in ten books. The first nine books, containing letters to various friends, present 247 letters to 105 recipients. These books were probably published in groups of three from A.D. 97 to 109. The order of the letters is largely chronological, and in his first Pliny claims that the texts were chosen at random from among his larger private correspondence. Critics, however, feel certain that the letters were carefully chosen and arranged according to the principle of variety. The tenth book of letters, which was published and has been preserved separately from the others, contains seventy-one official letters to the Emperor Trajan. They were written about 111 when Pliny was Governor of Bithynia. Fifty-one of Trajan's replies are included with Pliny's letters. The tenth book was probably edited by someone other than Pliny. One of the chief values of the letters to his friends as has often been pointed out, is that they show a respectable and civilized and pleasant side of life in the second century that contrasts with the seamy and vicious sides recorded by the satirists Juvenal and Persius and the historian Tacitus.

Among the things Pliny most often discusses in his letters is his own virtue and distinction. He was extremely jealous of his good name and fame among his contemporaries, and was concerned about the opinion posterity would hold of him. We see Pliny describe his consideration for his modest wife (6.4, 6.7, 7.5), and for his slaves, for whose health interests and welfare he is very concerned (5.19, 6.3, 8.16). He is a model landlord (5.15, 9.37, 8.2), and a generous friend, to inferiors particularly. He helps them economically, providing a dowry for the daughter of his old teacher, Quintilian (6.32), and passage to Spain for the poet Martial (3.21) who, by the way, had written one of his most delicate and skilful poems in praise of Pliny. He helps his friends with his influence, soliciting official appointments and other considerations for them. Among his public good works, we find, were the endowment of a children's home (1.8, 7.7), a public library (1.8), and a school (4.13).

Much insight into the style of life of the Roman aristocrat of the imperial period is to be gained in reading the letters. Though wealthy, we learn that Pliny was careful in administering his income and estates (2.15, 3.19, 8.2), and we see his several villas and properties described. In one of his longest letters (2.17), Pliny in great detail describes his house on the seashore at Laurentum.

In several letters, the literary tastes and efforts of Pliny are interestingly described (7.4, 6.17); from these letters we gain a broad view of the literary education and activity of the time. Further, in 8.20, 4.3, 6.31, and 8.8, we see the admiring response of a cultivated Roman gentleman to the beauties of nature—these letters do much to dispel the too common view that the Romans were a no-nonsense, practical race of engineers and soldiers. Finally, many of the letters give us information about Pliny's career as a public servant and lawyer. We learn of the intricacies of important trials and the lives and deaths of many important men he knew. Perhaps there is no better way to get the feel of what the Roman state was like under the emperors than to read Pliny's accounts of his daily official activities.

The tenth book of letters, that containing Pliny's official correspondence with Trajan when Pliny was Governor of Bithynia, holds unique interest. It is one of the best sources we have for the study of Roman imperial administration. Among the subjects of these letters are petitions to the emperor; provincial finances; the construction of public buildings such as theatres, temples, baths, aqueducts; and questions of law and religion that were contingent to Pliny's difficulties of administration.

Taken as a whole, Pliny's ten books of letters contain three texts of especial interest: 6.16, 6.20, and particularly 10.96. The two letters of the sixth book, describe in some detail the eruption of Vesuvius that buried Pompeii. These two texts were written to Tacitus who had requested information about the event so that he might include an account of it in his Histories. Pliny was a distant witness of the eruption, which, in fact, killed his uncle, Pliny the Elder. The elder Pliny's death is the main subject of 6.16. When the mountain began its activity, the older man, who was then admiral of the fleet at Misenum, down the coast from Vesuvius, ordered a ship to row toward the mountain. He wanted to satisfy his scientific curiosity about the volcanic activity: also, he had asked his young nephew if he wanted to accompany him on the trip, but Pliny wanted to complete an essay his uncle had assigned him and declined the invitation. Once the ship reached the area near the volcano, the elder Pliny landed with a small party. Soon, however, they were trapped; the sea was running too high for them to re-embark. After a time the old man was overcome by fumes and died on the beach. Letter 6.20 gives a more detailed account of the eruption itself.

Certainly the single most important and interesting letter in the entire collection is 10.96, with its reply from Trajan, 10.97. Pliny's letter, the longest in the tenth book, concerns the problem the Roman governor had in dealing with the emerging and troublesome Christian sect. Christianity was spreading rapidly in Bithynia. It was an illegal religion because the Christians refused to practice the state cult along with Christianity. Pliny found the problem of dealing with this refusal perplexing, and he decided to write the emperor to ask his advice and to learn what the emperor's firm policy was in regards to Christianity.

Pleading inexperience with the problem, Pliny requested from the emperor information on how far he should go in examining, prosecuting, and punishing Christians; and whether young and adult, and male and female members, of the sect should be treated the same; and whether a recantation was sufficient grounds for dropping charges; and whether the mere confession of Christianity was a punishable offense.

Pliny then described the methods he had been using heretofore. When members of the faith were denounced to Pliny as Christians, he first examined them and if they admitted they were Christians, he asked them twice more if they were Christians, adding each time the threat of death. If they persevered, he had them executed; whatever the nature of their creed, he said, such obstinacy deserved punishment. Next, he described how he had dealt with anonymous denunciations by demanding that those accused propitiate the statue of the emperor and curse Christ. Those who did so were questioned no further, those who did not were punished.

But the Christians were becoming irrepressible, and Pliny could find nothing wicked or truly criminal in their worship. The worst thing about them, said Pliny, is their wild and excessive superstition.

His major concern, however, was the fact that the sect was spreading rapidly and among all classes; many temples were deserted. His opinion was that it might be disastrous to push too far the prosecution of Christians, considering how many people were involved; hence he wanted advice from the emperor.

Trajan's reply is short, terse, and sensible. He approved Pliny's methods, and agreed that it was best to leave a way open for the accused to deny their faith and thus be dismissed. He further recommended that the governor not look for Christians, but that if one were denounced and found guilty, the law must take its course. Accusers, by the way, must make themselves known and stand as witnesses, for to allow anonymous denunciation would be both barbarous and dangerous.
